There was much cry and little wool. There were special meetings and special reports (majority and minority) and lengthy palavars (it is whispered that personal animosities broke out into flame in them). And the result? All things are as they were. Jews' College remains the old Jews' College—a staff struggling under its burden, students working hard and receiving scant attention from the community at large, and the same step-motherly treatment as before. Did we say the same? Not quite the same. For the United Synagogue officers (who settle such matters) had their hands forced at the last meeting to add to their grant to Jews' College. The grant however is an annual one and therefore the victory may possibly be short-lived.

At the same meeting of the United Synagogue the reorganization of the Beth Din was discussed. It was decided to add to the Court two of our younger ministers, possessing the necessary qualification, to the Court in order to increase the total of those who give decisions. One thing deserves praise. The men chosen are, so to say, of home manufacture. Both have been trained in this country and have obtained an English Hatorah. It is true that in the case of one of them the foundations of his learning were laid in Russia, yet, for all practical purposes he may be regarded (and he would, we fancy, regard himself) as an English Rav.

This appears to have met with general favour. Not so another matter. It was suggested that the Chief Rabbi's official residence should be in Whitechapel. In their wisdom, the "honorary officers of the United Synagogue" (this is now a technical term) decided that this would make for the better working of the Beth Din, and would be of great advantage to the Jews in the East End. There seems a good deal to be said for such a view. But in reality it matters little in itself. As though it is of significance whether the Chief of the General Staff has four buttons in his coat or only three! So long as he does something, so long as he is something, nice questions such as these do not seem of great moment. Yet an agitation has made itself heard, protesting against what some people please to call the "degradation" of the Chief Rabbi's office. It has been taken up by the press (that is, by our one Jewish paper which has two voices, one on Wednesdays and the other on Fridays) and made much of. Perhaps it is because the elaboration of the point makes good "copy"; perhaps because it has been engineered. In either case it seems much ado about nothing, and is a reflection of the pettiness which, somehow, is so characteristic of our communal life.

Pettiness seems to dog our footsteps. Take the Board of Deputies. Its meetings, its policy, its methods do not find favour. Take the Maccabeans. It was once the only centre of Jewish "intellectuals' in London. Today it is a survival, jogging on becaue it has been able to accumulate a sum, not large but sufficient for its needs. It is but the shadow of its former self, and most of its members cling to it out of sheer habit. Take the United Synagogue to which most people belong, because, after all is said and done, they desire Jewish burial. Take the Shechita Broad. It is supposed to maintain the standard of Kashrus in London. Yet people who really care for such things are alive to its powerlessness over against the butchers. And so in other directions, whether it be religious education or the administration of poor relief, or the establishment of a Jewish hospital, there are currents and cross currents, pettiness, disagreement, dissatisfaction and lack of unity.

What is to save us? Is there no balm in Gilead? Is there no political acumen in our midst? It does seem that if we could regard ourselves as a unit, as an entity, with large common interests and only small differences which are of no account, we might approach solving the problem. You in America have the Kehilla movement. We require it too. But you in America have that flexibility which is one of the great needs of modern life. We in England are so constitutional, so bound—we might even say hide-bound—by tradition and history. A century ago we required a Board of Deputies. It is not so certain that the Board as it is at present constituted does its work in the best way possible. No matter. It goes on because it has a tradition behind it. The Maccabaean Club was a necessity twenty years ago. Is it a necessity now? We don't discuss the question. It was, and therefore it is, and will be. But despite this attachment to historic survivals, a united Kehilla ought to have so many excellencies as to appeal to all men. We fully appreciate the difficulties of the situation. We are mildly orthodox and strictly orthodox, reformers and liberals, of German and of Spanish origin. But have we not all one bond? Is not our brotherhood large enough to contain us all? And is it too much to ask, in this twentieth century of ours, that some scheme shall be evolved, large and comprehensive enough to enable all sections to enjoy their independence and at the same time present a united front as Jews. We should not then need sectional organizations. If only we reduced the number of our societies, if we centralized more, how much good could be done by economy of work to prevent repetition and overlapping and to avoid waste. If we had a big personality in our midst we should be in possession of a Kehilla before long. But the horizon is clear. Not even the shadow of a man is to be seen.

Dr. Jung's technical school scheme has come to grief. It started out in sunny weather; it was indeed a project of great promise. What did it set itself to do? To teach boys a trade—in this case, tailoring—and at the same time to give them a knowledge of Judaism. Dr. Jung wanted to make his proteges good Jews and good handicraftsmen. But while his desire was finely formulated, there must have been some imperfection in the organization. For the school finds itself practically bankrupt and Dr. Jung has a burden of debt in connection with it. It only proves that modern business principles were not applied to the scheme, which was a praiseworthy endeavor on the part of its promoters. Its failure is to be regretted. It would seem as though a similar project must fail, and besides, it puts Dr. Jung at a disadvantage. Just as nothing succeeds so well as success, so nothing is so deterrent in its consequences as failure. In private life, a man may fail and yet recover; in public life failure is a bad recommendation. Anyhow, Dr. Jung is appealing for funds to be rid of the debt for which he stands responsible. But there are so many appeals just at present before the community that it seems a little doubtful whether he will be as successful as he would like to be.

The history of trade unions is in many respects a fascinating story, but never throughout the hundred odd years of its existence has the movement been brought into the service of religion. We are always told that it is an economic movement, and certainly, its history hitherto has been economic in character. Workers have asked for more wages or lesser hours of work or the recognition of their organization. But now there is something new. The tailoring trade in East London is to a very large extent in the hands of Jews. A large number are Sabbath observing Jews. It is now proposed to form a trade union of these with the sole object of organizing Sabbath keeping tailors to enable them to keep the Sabbath. If that is refused them, they will retaliate by the strike. We are unable to say whether any such organization is to be found in America; here it is distinctly novel. One wonders what success it is likely to have. But it shows some spirit to formulate such a demand, and it certainly is not based on class prejudice. On the question of Sabbath observance, masters and men may usefully combine their forces.

Birmingham is a town which is marked out in Anglo Jewry as the city of unity. Other centres of Jewish life, Manchester, Liverpool, Leeds, have their bethels, their wheels within wheels; almost their opposition and competing religious establishments. No so Birmingham. In the city of nails and watches, the Jewish community has been one for very many years past. Partly this is due to accident (some towns enjoy better luck than others), and partly to design. In so far as the latter factor is concerned, the designer was the Rev. George Emmanuel, who is probąbly the oldest Jewish Minister in England. No matter what movements arose in Birmingham, he sought to keep them within the Congregation. Synagogues in Birmingham therefore, were many; but the community was one. The Rev. George Emmanuel was succeed a year or so ago by the Rev. Abraham Cohen, one of our younger men who was qualified to take charge of so important a congregation. But the old unity is showing signs of breaking up. A demand for reform, long below the surface, has at last made itself heard and only last week at least 100 people pledged themselves to support Reform in Birmingham.

What do we in England regard as Reform? Three principal characteristics determine whether a Synagogue is reform or not. The first is that it has an organ. The second is that it observes (which is to say "officially" as well as actually) only one day of the Jewish Festivals where it is customary to observe two. The third is that it "edits" the accepted Prayer Book and says a goodly number of its prayers in English. Two or three subsidiary characteristics are to be found besides, as, that it reads the Scroll not in the traditional tunes, but as one reading any narrative; that it does not "call up" to the Law; that it reads the Haphtora in English and so forth. We are aware that Reform means much more than this in America. But such is the conservatism of our atmosphere that for us much smaller things suffice for Reform.

The Reform Movement here commenced as long ago as the eighteen-forties, and up to the present we have only three congregations who style themselves reformed. The Synagogue at Upper Berkeley street, in London, is the centre of what we might term the mother congregation, Manchester and Bradford have each a daughter congregation. Now comes Birmingham. The question of vital importance is not the growth of the spirit of reform. The Liberal Synagogue which is thriving splendidly is only just an expression of the same thing and has been several years in existence. The vital thing is, what will become of this reform congregation in Birmingham Will it be part of the larger and older congregation that exists in the city—just an advanced wing of the Old Guard; or will it break away from the older body and become either independent, or amalgamated with the Upper Berkeley street congregation? In the second case, there is no more to be said. In the first, tremendous issues will be raised.

If the old (and nominally orthodox) congregation in Birmingham should work hand in hand with the proposed Reform section, why should not the same thing happen in London? Why, in other words, should not the United Synagogue and the Sephardic Jews work in harmony with Upper Berkeley street in one great Kehilla? This is one point. Another suggests itself also. If the Reform movement in Birmingham is actually successful, will there be Reform movements in other towns? In a word, is Reform destined to experience a new revival in England? The Liberals here certainly think so; the orthodox smile the smile of the incredulous. What will be the turn of affairs? Whatever it be, this stands out. Even if the new move in Birmingham is not generally received with a blessing, it is not received with a curse. And that is much. In the early forties, when the "Congregation of British Jews" came into existence, their brethren uttered threats and regarded them as being outside the pale of Jewry. Such is the whirligig of time. "The old order changeth yielding place to new."

Anglo Jewry has to chonicle several losses of late. The name of Benas is one honoured in Liverpool, and the death of the head of the house (if we may put it so) was a blow to local Jewry and to Jewry at large. If Benas was known in Liverpool, Mocatta was known in London. The late David Mocatta was a man not only interested in history; he also made it. And now his own nephew, Benjamin Elkin Mocatta, head of the famous house of bullion brokers, Mocatta & Goldsmid, has been gathered to his fathers. Finally, in the bounds of the London Lodge, we have to chronicle with great regret the death of Brother Raphael Benzecry. We are a comparatively young body; but already the great Reaper has touched us. We believe that the death of Brother Benzecry is the first in our records (the late Brother Bergel was not an ordinary but an honorary member). Bother Benzecry was not a young man, but when he was last in our midst he did not give the impression of decay. He will undoubtedly be mourned by all those who knew him. There is one other name that must be recorded—that of Samuel Rolles Driver, Professor of Hebrew at Oxford, who is well known to all students of our language. Driver's scholarship requires no commendation; all the world knows of it. But what does require some mention is his sympathy for Jews. He was unlike some of the Herman Hebraists in this respect. Probably his sympathy made him all the better scholar. All those who love Jewish learning will certainly think warmly of Driver.

The London Lodge is progressing apace. The new President has instituted a number of sub-committees who shall report to the Council on their work. This will certainly generate a good deal of activity. Before these lines are in print we shall have honoured our past Presidents—Bentwich, Gaster and Snowman—at the banquet to be held on March 22. The Lodge will utilise the occasion to take stock of its activities in the past, and draw hope for its work in the future.

THE BULGARIAN GOVERNMENT PROMOTES JEWISH EDUCATION.

The Government of Bulgaria has just taken a step which will give great satisfaction to the Jews in that county. It has decided that instruction in Hebrew and the Jewish religion shall be made compulsory for all Jewish children who attend the State schools, and it is about to propose to Parliament that schools maintained by Jewish communities shall henceforth receive Government grants. At present these schools receive subsidies only from municipalities.

LITTLE HOPE IN ROUMANIA.

The electoral campaign of the Liberal Party in Roumania, which has ended in their triumph, has proved that this party has not the remotest intention to modify the constitution—more particularly Art. 7, which the Jews desire to see revised. The Government has issued to the Press an official statement in which it declares, "once for all," that the Liberals will not touch Art. 7 of the Constitution, and describes that provision as the buttress of the national interests. In these circumstances the Union of native Israelites has announced that the memorial voted by the Congress of native Jews in November will be presented to the Government and to Parliament. In addition, public meetings will be held, pamphlets distributed, and a great petition organized.

KING OF SPAIN RECEIVES MOORISH JEWS.

On February 28th, a deputation of Spanish Jewish subjects in Tangier was received by King Alfonso, to whom the members tendered their homage. His Majesty expressed his goodwill, and promised to support the Jews in those parts of Morocco controlled by Spain. This is the first time in modern history that a Jewish deputation has been received by a Spanish Sovereign.

Annual Convention of District No. 5

Silver Jubilee of Atlanta Hebrew Orphans' Home

On Sunday morning, March 29, 1914, the annual meeting of the Trustees and Directors of the Hebrew Orphans' Home of Atlanta was held at the assembly hall of the Home. Representatives of all the states comprising the District were present. Hon. Simon Wolf presided.

The morning session was taken up with the reports of the officers and the message of the President reviewing the work of the Home during the 25 years of its existence. The report of the Superintendent showed 115 orphans cared for by the Home.

At noon a recess for lunch was ordered and the members were the guests of the ladies of the local board, who served a bountiful lunch at the Home.

At the close tokens of appreciation of services rendered to the Home were presented to the following:

Mr. S. Wolf, father of the institution, was presented with a solid silver candlestick emblem as a token of the esteem by his colleagues on the board. The presentation was made with a very fitting address by Dr. Edward Calisch, of Richmond.

Mrs. Joel Hillman, of Washington, was made the recipient of a solid silver tray. Mrs. Hillman is Chairman of the Ladies' Advisory Board, and last year was personally responsible for the raising of $14,000 for the benefit of the Home. The presentation was made by Mr. Wolf.

Dr. George Solomon of Savannah, on behalf of his colleagues, presented a silver tray to Joseph Hirsch, president of the local board.

Max Cohen, Secretary and Treasurer of the General Board, was presented with a silver loving cup. The presentation was made by Milton Hirsch.

The recipients made happy acknowledgments and expressed appreciation for the distinction conferred upon them.

In the afternoon session letters of regret from numerous prominent persons throughout the country were received; among them greetings from Messrs. J. H. Schiff, Victor Rosewater, Adolf Kraus, President of the Order; Harry Cutler, Judge David Leventritt, Jacob Furth, Leon Schwarz, Philip Stein, A. A. Marx, Victor Abraham, Dr. J. L. Levy, Dr. H. Cohen, and Miss Mary Antin. The following letter was presented from President Wilson:

Greetings from President Wilson.

The White House,
Washington, March 26, 1914.

My dear Mr. Wolf:

I warmly congratulate you upon the completion of the twenty-fifth year of the work of the Hebrew Orphans' Home. It is an institution that has done a work of which you have every reason to be deeply proud. How fortunate you are to have been able to do this distinguished work of charity. It must afford you a great deal of genuine happiness.

Cordially and sincerely yours,
Woodrow Wilson.

Mr. Simon Wolf,
2013 Columbia Road,
Washington, D. C.

Hymn by Judge Stafford.

Judge Wendell Phillips Stafford of Washington, D. C. sent the following hymn for the silver jubilee of the Home:

A blessing at His hand we crave
Whose joy is not to judge but save,
Who puts the robe of glory by
To hear the children when they cry.

Upon His tender care we rest
Who brings the robin to her nest,
The good ship through the driving foam,
And star-lit toilers to their home.

O Thou whose current ceaseless runs
Through drops of rain and streams of suns,
Kindling to grace in flower and tree,
But most in hearts that welcome Thee—

Through Thee we gathered all we had;
Thy smile has made the orphan glad;
O friend of greatest and of least,
Both guest and master of the feast.

At our white board wilt Thou not sit?
The wreaths are hung, the candles lit;
The banquet only waits for Thee:
Come, Love, and bless our jubilee!

After consideration of routine matters, preparation of the annual budget and action on the reports of committees, the election of officers was held. Mr. Simon Wolf, who for 25 years served as the President of the Home, declined a re-election and was honored by the election as Honorary President of the Home for life. The officers elected are; Joseph Hirsch, Atlanta, President; Sol. Weil, Goldsboro, First Vice-President; V. H. Kriegshaber, Atlanta, Second Vice-President; M. Cohen, Washington, Treasurer and Secretary.

The annual meeting thereupon adjourned.

Public Exercises.

At the Pryor Street Temple public exercises were held on Sunday evening, March 29, 1914, under the auspices of the Intellectual Advancement Committee of the District, Rev. Dr. David Marx presiding.

Addresses were delivered by Madam Belle Pevsner of Palestine, and Mr. David P. Stern. Musical and vocal numbers interspersed the program and at its conclusion a reception to the delegates and visitors was held at the vestry of the Temple, where refreshments were served.

Opening of Convention.

The convention of District Grand Lodge No. 5 was called to order at the assembly room of the Hebrew Orphans' Home at Atlanta on Monday morning, March 30, 1914, with about 60 delegates in attendance, representing the lodges located in Georgia, North and South Carolina, Virginia, Maryland, and District of Columbia.

Rabbi Dr. E. N. Calisch offered prayer and was followed by Dr. David Marx, who extended greetings on behalf of the B'nai B'rith of Atlanta, and Mayor James G. Woodward, who delivered the address of welcome on behalf of the city. A response to the welcome by Hon. Simon Wolf completed the preliminary exercises.

Mr. A. B. Seelenfreund, Secretary of the Order, was thereupon introduced. In addressing the convention he extended greetings on behalf of the Executive Committee of the Order and congratulated the District upon its growth and improvement. He then launched upon a recital of the Order's activities throughout the world and closed with an appeal emphasizing the need of reawakening the Jewry of the land to its duties and obligations as Jews.

A roll call of delegates was then had and at the conclusion the degree to the new members was conferred, whereupon Mr. Lionel Weil, President of the District, read his annual message, recounting the activities of the District during the past year, and among the many things he cited the creation of the Anti-Defamation League organized to eradicate the defamation of the Jew on the stage and in the press; the opposition to the pending immigration bill; and the progress made among the Jewish people in the matter of enlightening them as to the real aims and objects of the Order.

At noon a recess was taken, during which lunch was served the delegates and visitors in the hall of the Orphans' Home by the ladies connected with the board of the institution.

At the afternoon session reports of various officers and standing committees were received and considered. All reports were referred to special committees of the convention for consideration and report at the Tuesday meeting.

Report of the Secretary showed the District in a healthy condition, both from the standpoint of membership and finance. Several new lodges were instituted during the year and the membership of the older lodges was materially increased.

Reports of the Chairman of Propaganda and Intellectual Advancement were replete with activities by the committees during the past year in the matter of strengthening the District and increasing its efficiency.

Anniversary Celebration of the Hebrew Orphans' Home.

On Monday evening, March 30, 1914, at 8:00 o'clock, the celebration of the 25th anniversary of the Hebrew Orphans' Home of Atlanta was held at the auditorium of the Home.

The celebration consisted of exercises by the children and distribution of prizes by the superintendent. The principal feature of the evening was the address of the Chairman, Hon. Simon Wolf, who made a strong plea for greater effort on the part of the Order and its agencies toward the solution of many of the economic questions confronting the Jewish people. Mr. Wolf was followed by Mrs. Joel Hillman, who in her address reviewed the life and history of the orphanage and urged those present to take an active part in its management and assist in the raising of a special endowment fund to be known as the Simon Wolf Endowment Fund, so as to perpetuate the stability of the Home. At the close of her address Mrs. Hillman presented to the Board of Directors the sum of $14,000 collected by her and to be used as the basis for the Simon Wolf Endowment Fund.

During the address she was interrupted for a moment by Mr. Simon Wolf, who in a fitting speech presented Mrs. Hillman with a gold jewel suitably inscribed and expressing the well wishes of the Order for her labors on behalf of the Home.

Appeals were then made by Messrs. Jos. Hirsch, A. B. Seelenfreund, and Max Cohen for contributions to the newly created endowment fund, and as a result of their efforts more than $8,000 was subscribed by those present.

At the close of the affair an informal reception was held, during which refreshments were served.

Tuesday's Session.

Tuesday's session of the convention was opened with prayer by Dr. E. A. Landau, and the morning hours were devoted to consideration of the reports of the Standing Committees. The special order of business was also the discussion as to ways and means for the completion of the Simon Wolf Endowment Fund, and a campaign has been started under the direction of Joseph Hirsch, President of the Home, and contributions will be solicited from the Jewry of all over the south.

The election of officers resulted as follows: Rabbi F. L. Rosenthal, Columbia, Ga., President; Rabbi I. E. Marcuson, Charleston, S. C.; First Vice-President; Harold Bloomberg, Richmond, Va., Second Vice-President; Milton Klein, Atlanta, Sergeant-at-Arms; Dr. Geo. Solomon, Savannah, Secretary; H. Sternberger of Greensboro, N. C., Treasurer. Mr. Lionel Weil, the retiring president, was elected representative of the Grand Lodge on the Board of Directors of the Orphans' Home.

After various appropriations to charitable institutions the convention adjourned sine die.

During the afternoon the visitors and their ladies were entertained with an automobile ride through the city.

Class Initiation.

In the evening a largely attended meeting of Gate City Lodge No. 144 was held at the vestry of the Pryor Street Temple. The special order of business was the initiation of a class of candidates in honor of the Grand Lodge officers and visiting delegates.

Addresses on the good and welfare of the Order were made by several of the visitors, whereupon refreshments were served by the lodge.

THE LITERACY TEST.

All good Americans will approve the reported intention of President Wilson to veto the new immigration bill if it comes to him with the literacy test clause attached.

In all Washington there is possibly no greater or more sincere advocate of education for the masses than the President himself. His long indentification with college life would naturally lead to the supposition that he would place educational qualifications on a very high scale, and doubtless he does. But evidently the President is not quite ready to take the position that they are all in all; that they offset good character, a strong body and a determination to "get there"—qualities that a very large number of our illiterate immigrants unquestionably possess.

Such a test as those who are back of the clause in question propose might bar from our shores the father of a Lincoln. It would certainly keep out hundreds and hundreds who are looking to this country as the haven of their hopes, as the one spot in all the world where their children may have the education and the opportunities for advancement which they themselves have never known.

The United States is not in need of clerks or bookkeepers from abroad. We have an overstocked market of this kind at home. But we do need sturdy men to till our soil and strong muscles to take up the manual labor that our own people decline to do, and we ought to stand ready to exchange for these the advantages of our country to the individual and the educational facilities of our schools to his children.—Harrisburg Telegraph.

JUDAISM BY INTUITION.

In many cities the Protestant denominations occasionally conduct a house to house statistical canvass. All householders in a city are listed according to their religious affiliatons. One appalling fact revealed by these statistics is the vast number of Jewish children who do not receive religious instruction, either at Jewish religious schools or at the hands of private instructors. The same fact has been ascertained in other ways. The numbers reported by organized synagogs and schools do not form one-fourth of the total number of Jewish children in America. This fact should give us pause. Three-fourths of the next generation of native American Jews will attain manhood and womanhood without religious education.

We have survived under many adverse circumstances. We have kept up a religion without a hierarchy, a people without rulers, but to keep up knowledge of Judaism without instruction may well tax the ingenuity of miracle workers. We can not rely altogether upon the influx of immigrants to supply the proportion of the well-informed persons on things Jewish. Each year the immigrants form a smaller and smaller proportion in comparison with the native American Jews. What are we going to do about it?

This is without doubt the most distressing problem that confronts us. Every Jewish agency shauld endeavor to shoulder part of the burden of this solution. We have no organized Jewish Synagog of America, with accumulated riches for missionary work. Local autonomy curbs the power of every national organization, and "lack of funds" completes the description of our helplessness. It will be many years before we will develop a sufficient sense of mutual helpfulness and co-operation, that we can attack this problem from a central point. For the present, all efforts must begin and end—locally.

The Department of Synagog and School Extension can give direction, can organize, can supply each community with the accumulated wisdom of other communities which have tried and succeeded—but each locality must supply the sinews of war. We have suffered much because the non-Jewish world has been ignorant of our religion. The ignorance of Jews about Judaism presents a new problem, which will be much harder to combat. And unless we declare the war against ignorance and wage it with courage and self-sacrifice, we will be utterly routed by the blind cohorts of ignorance. The attention of the reader is called to the report of Rabbi M. Reichler, in charge of the People's Synagog and the schools of the Union in New York City. The money for this work is contributed in New York, and the evident success of the undertaking may well be an incentive to other cities to do likewise.

The duty of the congregations is not completed when it provides a school for the children of its own members. Every congregation should organize at least one school in a district where there is a dearth of religious instruction. The duty of a sisterhood is not completed in striving for the religious improvement of its own membership. It owes a duty to the children of sisters not so well organized or situated.

This humble piece of advice applies equally to every lodge of the I. O. B. B. and every section of the Council of Jewish Women and every local branch of every national Jewish organization. Modesty forbids our urging too pointedly the application of this principle. It is, however, doubtful whether any organization has the right to call itself "Jewish" that does not do its meed of service for the conservation of "Jewishness."

Our present attitude reflects a far too satisfied state of mind. We evidently think that our young men and women will absorb Judaism from the atmosphere. If there is any hope in this viewpoint, we are willing to be persuaded. This way—Miracle Workers!

NEW HUNGARIAN JEWISH PEER.

Baron Bela Deutsch de Hatvany has been appointed a member of the Hungarian House of Magnates. The Baron is one of the most energetic Jewish workers in Hungary, and heartily supports every movement tending to the welfare of Jewish institutions.

A "MAX NORDAU" STREET.

The Municipality of Janina (Greece) has given the name of Max Nordau to the street in which the Synagogue is situated. This step is an act of homage to the Phil-Hellenism of Dr. Nordau.

BANQUET BY LOUISVILLE LODGE OF LOUISVILLE, KY.

Sunday, March 22, 1914, was one of the auspicious days in the history of Louisville Lodge No. 14, of Louisville, Ky., for a class of 30 members was added to the roster of the Lodge. The meeting was held in the assembly rooms of the Temple and was honored by the presence of District Grand Lodge officers. The work of initiation was in charge of a degree team composed of Brothers Harry Simon of St. Louis, President of District Grand Lodge No. 2, Rabbi Jacob Mielziner of Cincinnati, Victor Abraham of Cincinnati, Secretary of District Grand Lodge No. 2, and Arthur Frank of Cincinnati. Immediately following the ceremonies the members and guests were escorted to the Watterson Hotel, where an elaborate banquet was spread.

Alfred Seligman acted as toastmaster, and in his usual clever manner introduced the speakers. President Harry Simon, of St. Louis, spoke on the "Work of Our Order." President Joseph Greenabaum, of the local lodge, responded to the toast, "Welcoming Our New Brothers." Magistrate Ben Schulman responded for the class in a speech on "How it Feels To Be a Ben Brith."

Toastmaster Seligman then departed from the prepared program and in a brilliant talk replete with fond memories introduced Sam Grabfelder, formerly one of Louisville's oldest and most beloved Jewish citizens, who is now a citizen of Philadelphia.

Mr. Grabfelder told of the work of the Louisville Lodge in past years and explained how it was really the founder of the great National Jewish Hospital in Denver.

Mr. Grabfelder's story was a revelation as to the work of the order and the new members were given a real insight into the good being accomplished by the B'nai B'rith.

Mr. Grabfelder was followed by Arthur Frank, of Cincinnati, on "The Young Man's Duty to the B'nai B'rith."

Mr. Frank was followed by Rabbi Mielziner, of Cincinnati, who in a talk sparkling with humor explained the works of the Order in Europe.

Rabbi Rauch, of the local congregation, followed with an impressive talk "The Honor of Being a Ben Brith."

The speaking was concluded by Victor Abraham, of Cincinnati, who has been secretary of the Grand Lodge for twenty years and a member of the Order for more than forty years. The officers of the local lodge, to whom much credit is due for the success of yesterday's large class are: Joseph Greenabaum, president; Louis Hirsch, past president; Joseph Lazarus, vice president; Harry Horn, Jr., secretary, and Louis Grossman, warden.

CLEVELAND, OHIO.

At a regular meeting of Cleveland Lodge No. 16, of Cleveland, Ohio, held on Sunday, March 8, 1914, the following resolution was adopted:

Whereas, the Anti-Defamation League of America, founded under the auspices of the Independent Order of B'nai B'irth, is the result of a demand by the Jewish people for concerted action against the efforts to traduce the good name of the Jew; and

Whereas, Cleveland Lodge No. 16, of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, located in this city, contains among its members a large percentage of the Jewish population of Cleveland, who are also members of the Anti-Defamation League, and

Whereas, we have upon occasion while attending the various places of amusement in this city been subjected to mortification and embarassment by the false, untrue and frequently ridiculous characterizations of the Jew upon the stage and in the motion picture films; therefore,

Be it resolved, that we respectfully request the managers of the various theaters and motion picture houses of this city to do all within their power to prevent the performance of acts and the exhibition of such films as contain malicious and scurrilous caricatures of the Jew.

Be it further resolved, that we respectfully request the managers of the various motion picture theaters to notify the film exchanges and manufacturers, from whom they receive films, that they do not desire pictures of the character referred to, to be sent to them.

The members of the Lodge have pledged themselves to act as committees of one and report such theaters and moving picture shows as produce offensive acts and films.

At the close of the meeting an entertaining address by Mr. David Gibson on "Joseph Fels" was delivered, explaining the doctrine of single tax.

MACCABEE LODGE, NEW YORK.

On Tuesday, January 20, Maccabee Lodge held a public installation of officers. The ceremony was particularly interesting by reason of the fact that it was the duty of the installing officer, Simon M. Roeder, to install his son as President of the lodge. Three hundred and fifty people were present on that evening. After the installation Brother Roeder delivered an address, tracing the history of Israel from the dawn of civilization down to the present day, pointing out through each epoch the "dreamer" of Israel, whose genius guided the destinies of the people.

The newly installed President made an appeal for new members. The retiring president, Brother Clarence Y. Palitz, was presented with a fob, as a token of appreciation for his work during his administration. An entertainment was provided for, and the ceremonies were followed by a dance.

The annual ball was held this year on Wednesday evening, February 11, at the Hotel Bretton-Hall. The affair was both a social and financial success, and a souvenir program was presented to each guest, which contained the history of the Order and the Preamble to the Constitution.

Immediately after his installation to office, the President appointed the following committees:

Committees on Finance, Laws, Membership, Sick and Relief, Propaganda, Entertainment, Press and Social Endeavor. The chairmen of these committees compose the executive committee of the lodge known as the Advancement Committee.

The committees commenced work at once with excellent results. The religious school maintained by the lodge and the question of the Jewish Big Brothers Association were immediately taken over by the Social Endeavor Committee, and Brother Abraham Koch was elected Superintendent of the School, and Brother Harry G. Fromberg as a member of the Board of Directors of the Jewish Big Brothers' Association. This committee has also discussed means whereby the lodge meetings could be made more interesting, and it was resolved that the following members of the Lodge deliver lectures during the year:

Hon. Otto A. Rosalsky, Justice of the Court of General Sessions.

Hon. David Leventritt, ex-Judge of the Supreme Court of the State of New York.

Hon. Henry M. Goldfogle and Hon. Jacob A. Cantor, both members of Congress.

The Propaganda Committee has had printed literature to interest the Jewish youth in the work of the Order, and is making a systematic campaign in the settlements and colleges in and about the city of New York. A number of open meetings will be held at prominent institutions, to acquaint the public with our activities.

The Entertainment Committee arranged a Purim Celebration, which was held at the "West End" on the evening of March 17. Music and recitations were rendered, and short addresses were delivered, and some of the work of the Hebrew School was exhibited. An informal dance followed the entertainment.

Owing to the fact that a desire has been expressed from some of the younger members of our lodge to study Jewish history and the Hebrew Grammar and Translation, a study circle is about to be formed for the study of Hebrew and Jewish history and also a systematic study of the Bible. This circle will not be confined to members of the lodge but to members of other lodges and friends who are not members. No charge will be made for this instruction, and it is hoped that many members will avail themselves of this opportunity. The instruction will be conducted by an experienced teacher, and discussion will be had at all times.

MEMORIAL SERVICES BY LOS ANGELES LODGE.

Highly impressive and unusually interesting were the memorial exercises commemorating the anniversary of the death of Moses held on Thursday evening, March 6, last, by Los Angeles Lodge No. 487, I. O. B. B. The celebration took place in the spacious B'nai B'rith Temple, which was more than comfortably filled by our co-religionists and others. This was the initial affair of this character held by the lodge and although the time was too short to prepare an elaborate program, so well did the committee of arrangements acquit themselves that nothing but praise was heard on all sides for the excellent manner in which the celebration was arranged.

The memorial exercise began with an organ prelude. There were several other instrumental selections as well as vocal numbers. The opening prayer was by Rabbi S. Hecht of B'nai B'rith congregation. "Imperishable Monuments," was the subject of the address by Rabbi R. Farber, of Sinai congregation. Rabbi Isidore Myers delivered an address on "Moses and the Sons of the Covenant," and an address was delivered by Rabbi Hecht on the "Life of Moses." "The Mosaical Law" was interpreted by Brother Maurice Salzman, past president of the lodge. The exercises closed with a benediction by Rabbi Farber.

An added feature of the affair was the presence of Hon. Nathan Straus, of New York, philanthropist of world-wide fame, who acceded to the request to act as chairman of the occasion. Mr. Straus, upon being introduced by Mr. H. A. Hollzer, said that he was not a public speaker but that he endeavored in a small way to devote his energies in doing some act for the alleviation of humanity. He stated that he and his wife would now be en route to Palestine, were it not for the latter's illness. He told how he had already made two journeys to the Holy Land and said that the wonderful climatic conditions of Southern California are practically reproduced in Palestine. He spoke briefly of his accord with the back-to-Palestine movement. Among other things he urged Jews not to be ashamed to acknowledge their religious faith, and called attention to the Rothschilds of Germany, France and England, who he said are influential not only because of their riches, but because they are good Jews and not afraid to make the fact of their Judiaism known at all times.

Following the exercises President Rubin appointed a special degree team, the members of which will be instructed in the initiatory work so that they will be able to act as substitutes whenever any of the officers are absent.

The lodge has the distinction of having one of the oldest living members of the Order in the United States. He is Leopold Veith, who on March 9th, celebrated his 91st birthday anniversary. He is still hale and hearty and while he seldom attends lodge meetings he is a regular attendant at the Sabbath services at B'nai B'rith Temple. This committee which arranged the memorial exercises consisted of Harry A. Hollzer, chairman; Maurice Salzman, J. A. Frankel, Daniel M. Potter, Max Loewenthal and H. A. Goldman.

Silverman, who delivered a very interesting lecture, at the close of the initiation, upon the work of the Order and its accomplishments. The Lodge was also honored by the presence of the Past President of the District, and Honorary Member of Jordan Lodge, Brother Charles Hartman and Brother Herman Asher, First Vice President of the District.

OAKLAND LODGE PAYS TRIBUTE TO MORRIS N. SCHNEIDER.

The Forum was the scene of a large gathering of members of Oakland Lodge No. 252, of Oakland, Cal., on the evening of Feb. 26, 1914, assembled at a banquet in honor of one of its members, Brother Morris N. Schneider, elevated to the high position of President of District Grand Lodge No. 4. Practically every member of the Lodge was present, as well as many visitors, and guests from surrounding cities. Mr. A. J. Simmonds acting as toastmaster, and Brothers Geo. Samuels, Isadore M. Golden, A. Jonas, and Otto Irving Wise, Past Presidents of the District Grand Lodge; Grand Secretary I. J. Aschheim, Rabbi M. Friedlander, and the honored guest, were the scheduled speakers of the evening.

The affair was one of the most elaborate ever givein by the Lodge and many toasts were pledged to the guest of honor, who was elected to the office of President in recognition of his services to the Order.

"Progress" was the topic of the evening. Grand President Schneider, in his opening remarks, summarized the situation with the one word that stands for achievement and announced as part of his plans for the greater growth of the District the inauguration at once of a spirited membership campaign. "In members lies our strength," President Schneider said shortly after his election. "In workers lies our success and the realization of our ambitions. It shall be my aim, then, to secure not only members, but working members. I hope that every man present will work for progress, first, last, and all the time.

"We are entering, in Oakland particularly, into a great era of future activity. The city, growing by leaps and bounds, and rapidly taking its place as one of the greatest in the United States, is your field of action. Here must you labor. You have tools. The splendid new clubhouse being erected, and soon to be our home, will be the most imporatant of these. With the many features which will be ours in the new headquarters we will be enabled to carry on our aims as never before.

"To upbuild and grow is not only our ambition—it is our necessity. We cannot permit ourselves to stand still, even if we would, and allow the city to outgrow us. We are growing with the fastest growing city in the United States—and, as I look about me, I feel that here are men who can and will keep pace with it. I have no fear for the future. I predict the greatest of our successes in the years to come.

Speaks for Coast.

"Of course, I should speak for the coast, but 'My city, Oakland,' is still in my mind, and, besides, I am speaking tonight principally to you of Oakland. However, this city's growth is dependent on a greater region, the coast, which soon, through the completion of the Panama canal, is to leap into its place as the commercial center of the country, where rail and ship will meet and where the great influx of shipping from the canal will find its distribution points. Wherefore, while I am speaking of Oakland I am also speaking of the whole district over which it is my honor to preside.

"Here's to the coast—and to Oakland! Work! Live and boost! Success is already ours. Our inanition cannot stem the tide of progress, but our labors can hasten it."

The other speakers also urged work and action, and predicted a future rosy in its outlook. The gathering broke up at a late hour.

What Our Lodges Are Doing

WORCESTER, MASS.

Under the auspices of the Educational Advancement Committee of Worcester Lodge No. 600, of Worcester, Mass., Brother I. Irving Lipsitch of New York, Chairman or the Educational Advancement Committee of the Grand Lodge and representative of the Hebrew Sheltering and Immigrant Aid Society at Ellis Island, gave a stereopticon lecture on "Immigration" to an audience of more than 200 at the Hebrew Free School Hall on March 23, 1914. Mr. M. L. Katz and Mr. A. M. Hillman, president of the lodge, spoke briefly of a membership campaign in which they are the captains of two teams striving to secure the highest number of candidates for admission before the close of the season. Mr. Lipsitch was then introduced by Mr. Katz.

In opening his address, Mr. Lipsitch spoke of the conditions which prompt many aliens to leave the land of their birth to seek their fortune in the United States. The principal reason he explained, is the periodical times of depression in foreign countries and the vast prosperity of the United States. He presented figures to show that in times of the greatest prosperity in the United States, the influx is greatest, while in dull times such as that incidental to the panic of 1893, it is at low tide.

"The Jews,," he declared, "are the only people who do not depend on business conditions in their emigration to the United States. So long as there are pogroms, massacres and persecution of the race in general in Russia and other countries, so long will Jews continue to come to the United States, whether business in the United States is good or bad," he said.

Mr. Lipsitch showed pictures on the screen of the different types of immigrants and of the many buildings at Ellis Island. He explained in detail how much red tape an immigrant is obliged to wade through before he is finally permitted to land. He told of the cautious measures in the way of medical inspection that have been adopted by the government to prevent physically unfit or mentally deficient persons from landing. Interesting pictures were shown illustrating how the inspection work in this respect is carried out.

The speaker paid a tribute to the Council of Jewish women for its noble work in assisting young women in reaching their destination and preventing them from falling into the hands of unscrupulous agents of white slavery.

On his arrival in Worcester Mr. Lipsitch was met at the Union station by a committee of Worcester lodge and escorted to the Bancroft hotel where he was entertained at a luncheon.

Each member of the Lodge had been asked to contribute to the Anniversary Fund, as much as he felt he could, and each contributing member received two cards of admission, in addition to which he had the right to one vote for each dollar he subscribed, to determine to which charities the surplus should be distributed, as it was arranged that all moneys left over from the Celebration should be given to charitable institutions. BANQUET BY HARMONY LODGE, BRIDGEPORT, CONN.

The banquet which Harmony Lodge No. 711, of Bridgeport, Conn., tendered on Feb. 26, 1914, in its club rooms in honor of Dr. Stephen Wise, of New York, was largely attended and was an eventful occasion. The dinner began at 5 o'clock and lasted until nearly time for the evening's lecture, when the diners accompanied the guest of honor to the Casino, where the lecture was given.

Dr. Wise gave an after dinner speech at the banquet which lasted nearly half an hour and was in a measure an introduction to his lecture of the evening, "The Jew and the Christian." He said in part:

"The position that the Lodge represents the Jew should take in the moral uplift now existing all over the country. It is a duty of the B'nai B'rith as of every well meaning citizen and public spirited citizen to aid in stamping out not only existing evils in the moral sense, but aid in eliminating suggestion, such as certain pictures presented in the movies—sex problems, white slave pictures—which supposedly educate people to these evils, but as a matter of fact merely whet the appetites of the young and unsophisticated to go there and sharpen them."

He urged the members of the Lodge in the performance of their civic duties and social relations to be themselves and told them not to imitate but carry out the ethical principle which was the ideal of Israel. In that way they would find themselves running in a parallel path to the Christian who is doing the same thing. This was much better he said, than trying to imitate the Christian even to the point of joining their churches.

He said that Judaism is the mother and Christianity the daughter and that there should be the same sort of affection between them. Each maintaining its own sphere they would be carrying out the ideals laid down at Sinai.

He recalled with pleasure the keynote struck by Dr. Brown of the First Baptist church at the banquet a year ago when the latter said it was the desire and hope of the Christian that the Jew be and remain a profound thinker and Jew according to the moral and ethical standards and ideals laid down by his forefathers and that he knew by so doing the Jew as a man on one hand and the Christian as a man on the other hand would be going the same way hand in hand. In reality both would be believing in the same father and would of necessity be devoted brothers.

He told of the great work that has been done by the B'nai B'rith and of the great work that is yet to be accomplished. Judaism, the Mother of Religions, is the source of inspiration from which all orders draw their ideals, and an order so intimately bound up with this great religion ought to foster each of these ideals and bring them to life. The Elks, with their spirit of Benevolence, the Knights of Pythias, with their idea of Loyalty and the Masonic Order with its tenet of Charity, should be surpassed by the B'nai B'rith, for it is their religion that gave these ideals to the world at large. It is their religion that taught the Unity of Mankind and the Fatherhood of God and it is therefore their duty to show by their lives that these are not mere empty words. Dr. Bottigheimer's address was highly appreciated by a large audience. A musical program was given by Miss Ethel Lynn Ross, and Mr. Albert Guest, organists, and Judge Clark B. Schipp. tenor. The speaker compared the order to Mordecai, who is designated in the book of Esther as "The Jew," because he was the ideal Jewish leader and the welfare of the Jewish people was the great aim of his life. On Sunday evening, March 22, 1914, Montefiore Lodge No. 70 of Buffalo, N. Y., initiated fifty new members into the Lodge and Order, and celebrated B'nai B'rith day with a banquet at the Apollo Club, which was attended by 150 of Buffalo's most representative Jewish citizens. The initiation was the first in a campaign for membership whereby it is planned to bring every representative Jewish Buffalonian into a united body aiming to preserve the ideals of the race.

Encouragement and enthusiasm for the campaign was instilled by officers and members of lodges in other cities who presided over the initiation ceremonies and were guests of honor at the banquet.

The speakers included Rabbi Louis J. Kopald of Temple Beth Zion, Brother Herman Asher of New York, First Vice-President of District No. 1; Samuel J. Witz, President of Horeb Lodge No. 25 of New Haven; Samuel Campner, member of Horeb Lodge's Degree Team, and Brother Charles Hartman, member of the Executive Committee of the Order. Brother Herman Asher said, in part:

"Zangwill said there are two kinds of anti-Semites, the rich Jew and the poor Gentile. This assertion contains the general truth that the enemies of Israel are not all without. Race prejudice is, I believe, much exaggerated. Our great danger does not lie without, but within. It lies in those who would desert us and those who would disgrace us; with members of the so-called upper class who have deserted the faith of their fathers and with those of the lower class who have dragged the fair name of Judah into the mire.

"The only way we can attack these influences is by uniting and fighting them as a body. B'nai B'rith is the only unifying Order of all Judaism throughout the world. Under its banner Jews of every land, every degree of religious belief and every social grade are banded for the protection of the Jewish people and the preservation of the Jewish faith."

The initiation ceremony was conducted by the Horeb Lodge Degree Team, winners of the prize for the best initiatory work for the year 1913. This team is made up of Brothers Samuel J. Witz, Samuel Campner, Benjamin B. Lubinsky, Robert E. Hyman and Joseph Levy.

"Much praise is due to Samuel Cristall, President; Michael Cohen, Secretary, and David Ruslander, Past President of Montefiore Lodge, through whose indefatigable efforts the recent acquisitions are mainly due."

After the entertainment the floor was cleared and dancing continued into the wee hours of the morning.

Recitations were rendered by the pupils and compositions were read, showing the rapid progress of the pupils. Brother Abraham Koch, the superintendent, Mrs. Leerburger, and Brother Isidor Enselman each briefly addressed the gathering. Past President Leon Forst delivered an address which was heartily applauded by the children and visitors. Each child was then presented with a gift and a box of candy. CLASS INITIATION AND DINNER BY MINNESOTA LODGE, ST. PAUL.

Minnesota Lodge No. 157, St. Paul, on the evening of March 26 held a class initiation and dinner. The meeting was attended by over one hundred members of the Order and many of the Minneapolis brethren were present as well as members of other lodges of the Order. Besides others taken into the Lodge on demits, a class of twenty-nine was initiated by the Degree Team of the Twin City B'nai B'rith Council. The initiatory work was splendidly conducted and made a most marked impression upon candidates and members alike. The address of the evening was delivered by Dr. S. N. Deinard, member of the General Committee of the District, who dwelt principally upon the essential need of the Order as a medium for uniting Israelites in accomplishment of its purposes; the Order was described as a common ground upon which unanimity of action could be formulated.

To each of the newly initiated brethren was presented, by the President of the Lodge, a Menorah button. In addition to those initiated, thirty-three new applications were received at this meeting. A dinner was served after the Lodge was closed in due form, at which toasts were offered to the President of the Order, the President of the District, and to Minneapolis and St. Paul Lodges, and brief remarks were made by Sylvan E. Hess, President of District Grand Lodge No. 6.

It is expected that another class initiation of approximately fifty will be had during April. An appropriation of $100 to the proposed B'nai B'rith Library at the University of Minnesota was made by the Lodge, and an appropriation of like amount to the Immigration Committee work of the Lodge. A quartette was in attendance and furnished music and vocal selections, and the members of the Order at the dinner joined in the songs. The meeting was assuredly a red-letter one in the history of Minnesota Lodge.

KOENIGSHUETTE, GERMANY.

Michael Sachs Lodge No. 560, of Koenigshuette, had at its installation in 1903 thirty members, of whom 19 still belong to the Lodge. During the first ten years of its existence the Lodge initiated 53 additional members. The average attendance at regular meetings is 23. Newspapers and magazines are to be found in the lodge rooms, a library has been established comprising Jewish and general literature, and the interest of the ladies has been aroused in the work of the lodge. The ladies have taken part in the debates which were called forth by the lectures delivered in the lodge. Since May, 1912, a ladies' auxiliary lodge is connected with Michael Sachs Lodge, which promises a considerable increase in membership. During the last ten years the lodge has received 45303 marks, of which 4861 marks were sent to Berlin as Grand Lodge dues, 1857 marks were expended for intellectual and 1680 marks for social purposes. 2983 marks were appropriated for the support of different deserving institutions, such as the Employment Bureau in Berlin, Soldiers' Home in Metz, Children's Home in Jastrzemb, the raising and educating of a pogrom orphan, etc., etc. The total funds of the lodge now amount to 10618 marks, including 2978.95 marks of the Widows' and Orphans' fund, and 107.25 of the special fund placed at the disposal of the President.

The Lodge is an important element in the life of the members and is growing more so. It has good prospects of becoming a strong pillar in the noble edifice of the Order.

FAIRMONT, W. VA.

Under the auspices of Fairmont Lodge No. 726, of Fairmont, W. Va., a Sabbath School is being maintained in that city, which has an enrollment of 25 pupils. Nearly all the Jewish children of the city are enrolled and the teachers' staff is composed of Miss Edith Klaw and Miss Sadie Oliker, who are giving much time and service to the cause.

The Aims and Problems of the B'nai B'rith

(Delivered at Temple Emanu-El, San Francisco, Cal., April 17, 1914, by Rabbi M. Friedlander)

The purpose of this assembly this evening is to present the aims and problems of the B'nai B'rith to the Jewish intelligence of this community. And a more fitting time for this purpose could not have been chosen than the evening which closes the celebration of the anniversary of the first declaration of humanity's independence, the anniversary of the solemn proclamation on the banks of the Nile of the inviolable principle on human freedom, human eqaulity, and human dignity. And while the general conscience of enlightened humanity of the God-given right of the liberty and security of man has grown out of that divine proclamation, while every struggle and every triumph in the cause of liberty in the past 3,000 years has drawn inspiration from Israel's struggle and triumph which Passover commemorates, Israel to-day is still groaning under the burden of oppression and intolerance; one-half of our people are still suffering from the wicked denial of liberty and security in unenlightened lands, and the other half are often made to feel the smart of indignities and incivilities laid upon them by the hand of prejudice even in enlightened lands. This is the problem of the B'nai B'rith, and this must be the problem of every Jew.

Then again, while in the more enlightened lands, where liberty rules and freedom is guaranteed, and here we specifically refer to this blessed United States, where every honorable career is open to us, where the pursuance of our own conscience is not hindered us, where the conservation and promulgation of our high religious and ethical ideals are free to us, many among us fail to appreciate this blessing of equality and freedom of opportunity. Many among us are lax in their civic and ethical obligations as citizens and negligent in their moral and spiritual responsibilities as Jews. This is the problem of the B'nai B'rith, and this must be the problem of every Jew, especially of every American Jew.

The aims of the B'nai B'rith are to awaken in humanity a conscience of justice and fairness towards the Jew and thus bring alleviation of suffering to our co-religionists in other lands and raise the respect for our people in this country, and to awaken in the Jew, especially the recent immigrant, to the shores of this free land, a high sense of duty he owes to this government, which, in return for liberty and security, it requires industrial uprightness, moral rectitude, personal dignity and loyalty to American institutions. These are the aims of the B'nai B'rith, and these must be the aims of every Jew.

Every Jew, and every Jewess, whatever his or her position in the community may be, must feel the burden of these problems, and must aid in the attainments of these aims. For a Jew is not one who only admits as being of the "Jewish persuasion" and has his name on the roster of financial supporters of the synagogue or the temple, but one who feels, and thinks, and lives with his people, with all his people.

We need never fear a decline of Judaism because of a departure from orthodox forms and ceremonies. The lessening or change of external practices is no symptom of spiritual weakness. It is the lack of Jewish sympathy which gives warning of serious disorder in the union of Israel. It is the aloofness of one Jew from the other Jew because the other is less aesthetic, or less successful, or because he hails from a different part of God's footstool, which threaten the oncoming of anemia in the blood-course of the Jewish spiritual body. Judaism, like Americanism, does not recognize an aristocracy of privilege. Judaism, like Americanism, recognizes only one guiding principle—right. We, like all other people, have our great men, and our leading men, whom we must regard as the flower of our racial tree. But we, like our fathers, must recognize only one Source from which the flower, the branches and the roots draw life, the health of the root and the strength of the branches being indispensable to the beauty and fragrance of the flower. It is time that we learn the lesson of history that our racial and spiritual safety is anchored in the people, or to use the happy American phrase, the common people. The B'nai B'rith is the institution of and for the people, and it should have the support of every leading man in the community.

Some of our brethren in this or in other communities may have had some excuse for their aloofness from the B'nai B'rith years ago, when the institution was in its formative state, and to make its existence and growth possible, it was compelled to hold out material inducement in one way or another. To-day all inducements of a material character have been eliminated, and the heretofore grounds for any excuse for staying out of the B'nai B'rith no longer exist. The B'nai B'rith to-day stands for the sole and altruistic aim and object of bettering Jewish conditions, of fostering Jewish ideals, of preserving Jewish individuality, of forestalling and providing a vindication and defense in united influence and concentrated action against any malicious attack on the fair name of the Jew and Judaism.

But the scope of the B'nai B'rith of to-day is broader than that: the B'nai B'rith is the missionary and propagandist of the synagogue and the temple missionary, not to win recruits from without, but to preserve our forces within. It aids the temple in keeping God, Judaism, uprightness, continually alive among the feverishly busy and pleasure-seeking generation of the present. In the B'nai B'rith our youth unconsciously imbibe and refresh that power of fervor which strengthens in them our historic trait, our hereditary and ineradicable tenacity to the ideal of indissoluble Jewish unity.

And I take occasion here to say, that we must not be misled by the so-called new prophets and proletarian seers who, in a hysteria of "newness" preach chaotic religion and fantastic liberalism. According to them, Judaism is obsolete and the distinctiveness of the Jew is unserviceable. Three thousand years of wandering and vicissitude, of threats and persuasion, of revolutions and evolutions left Judaism unscathed and the Jew unmaimed, and the revolutions and evolutions of as many, and more, cycles will not displace the Jew nor supersede Judaism. We admit the world can easily dispense with the Jew who is only a Jew in name, but it cannot spare the Jew who lives and believes in the religion of Israel's Prophets, Psalmists and sages, for he stands to the world for what is holiest in the human soul and noblest in the human heart—Godhood and manhood. Winston Churchill, one of the keenest thinkers, and the most popular novelist of to-day, recently said in a Jewish pulpit: "It is as a spiritual people that the Jews have impressed themselves upon the world. And as such they have done more than any other people in raising the world to the moral height it has attained.

Houston Stewart Chamberlin, the most refined and the bitterest anti-Semite, who deplores the preservation of the Jewish individuality, and sees danger to civilization in Jewish influence, devotes the longest chapter in his book, "The Foundation of the Nineteenth Century," to the question: "Who is the Jew?" and the question remains unanswered. Chamberlin does not understand, or refuses to acknowledge the core, the vital point, of the problem. Ethnology and archeology will never answer that ages-old question. To answer the question,

What Zionism Has Given the Jews

By Dr. J. L. Magnes

Zionism is the name of the attempt on the part of the Jews to bring the Land of Israel into the center of Jewish life. The modern Zionist movement is about a generation old and the first Zionist Congress was held only seventeen years ago. Yet Zionism has penetrated the life, the thought, the very phrasing of the modern Jew. This attempt to establish the Jewish Center in Palestine has of itself already enriched the Jewish People with an increase of character, of ideas, and of actual achievement.

The main contribution of Zionism to the modern Jews is the conception of the Jews as a People. The Jews are not a "gypsy camp" nor are they only one of a number of religious sects, such as Baptists or Unitarians. The Jews are a People, with a national past, a national present and a national future. Zionism is based upon the idea of internationalism, i. e., the preservation of nations—the Jews among them,—the development of their distinctive characters and their peaceful interaction one upon the other. Zionism opposes a vague cosmopolitanism that would reduce all men and nations to one type. As a consequence, it opposes the assimilation, the absorption of the Jews, by the peoples among whom he lives. Zionism is the expression of the Jew's belief in himself, in his power to be of service to humanity as a Jew. The whole literature of Zionism and all of its practical achievements can be understood on the basis of these central ideas.

Almost synonymous with the idea of a People is that of a Land and Language. The Jews have always cherished these fundamental conceptions,—the land of Israel and the Hebrew tongue. But in the intoxication of the new-found political emancipation of the 19th century, many blunderingly imagined themselves compelled to give up the tradition of the ancestral soil and the ancestral speech. Zionism has given back to the Jews these sustaining elements.

As to the Land of Israel, Zionism has emphasized the fact that it is today and has never ceased to be the center of Jewry. It contends further that with the breakdown of the great reservoirs of Judiasm in Eastern Europe, it is all the more necessary for all the Jews together definitely to establish the national Reservoir in its natural place—the land of our origin, the land in which our Bible was produced, the land toward which our People has turned throughout its entire history. Here, Zionism contends, Judaism may develop in its own atmosphere and upon its native soil. Here, at least, the Jews may be a majority and not as everywhere, a minority. Here they may be concentrated and not dispersed. Here they may have a territorial center with some degree of political autonomy and with a farming population, as the backbone of the domain. Here they may have a spiritual center, and the Judaism here developed may in many ways be authoritative for, and enrich the Judaism of, the Jews in other parts of the world.

That Palestine is such a center is shown by the growth of the Hebrew language as a living tongue. Under the influence of Zionism, numbers of enthusiastic young men and women have settled in Palestine and have succeeded in making the language of the fathers live again in the mouths and hearts of the children. New methods of teaching the language have been devised there, and the Jews all over the world have not been slow to take advantage of these methods in order to stimulate interest in the national tongue. We are witnesses of a revival of Hebrew literature. We have our poets, our essayists, our story-tellers, our journalists. The history of modern national revivals shows no more remarkable achievement than this of the old People and the old Land and the old Language become young again.

Zionism has given birth also to the idea of a Jewish Culture that can be estimated, if need be, apart from religion, in the narrower, technical sense of this term. Jewish art, the Jewish drama, Jewish handicrafts, are largely in their beginnings, and the Jewish music of an older day, folk music as well as sacred, has been made available for further development. This idea of a national culture has given many a Jew his place in Jewry. If the Jews were merely one of a large number of religious sects, a Jew, unsettled in his theology, would not know where or if he belonged within the Jewish Denomination. The Jews as a People, however, have a place for every one born a Jew and desirous of remaining a Jew, quite aside from the intensity of his religious ideas or observances.

But it is in the domain of religion itself that Zionism has exercised the greatest influence. It has given emphasis and a modern turn to the thought of a medieval Zionist, Jehuda Halevi: that it is not so much through the individual soul or the processes of nature, as it is through membership in the Jewish People and through their history, that the God of Israel may be known. Furthermore, it is largely due to the influence of Zionism that many of the oriental aspects of Judaism, and many of the religious customs, observances and traditions of the Jewish People, have become endeared to an increasing number of young Jews and Jewesses. It is the experience of Zionism that once the Jew becomes loyal to Israel, he becomes a devotee of Israel's religion. His early ardour may be for the Jews alone; thus aroused, it strengthens into interest and affection for all things Jewish; increasing knowledge and intimacy lead inevitably to the climax—devotion to Jewish religion.

Zionism has been a great destroyer of sham and cant among the Jews. It has insisted that the Jew be frank and proud about his Judaism. It introduced the custom—still horrifying to crypto-Jews—of holding mass-meetings and of discussing Jewish topics in the open. Jews who "resign" from their race or their people have been branded with shame. By means of these meetings, Zionism has been able also to heap scorn and ridicule upon a so-called Jewish "mission" that has no missionaries and that sighs for a Messianic day when Jews will be no more. The opponents of Zionism cannot forgive it for confounding them and their pretensions. But the real effect of this has been an increased self-respect. Many a runaway Jew has been brought up with a halt by Zionism, and has been given back to his people, and has been made everlastingly grateful for this strengthening of his moral fiber.

Zionism has taken a unique attitude toward anti-Semitism. Unlike other theories of Judaism, Zionism insists upon the very premise of the anti-Semites, that the Jews are the people among the Peoples, a Nation among the Nations. We have no desire to hide this fact or to explain it away. But we ask: shall we, because we are a distinctive and stiff-necked People, be persecuted and beaten from pillar to post? We confidently await the verdict of the Twentieth Century, that the rights of minority nationalities, wherever they may be, must be recognized, just as the rights of minority religions are coming to be recognized among civilized men.

As a practical contribution to the solution of the so-called Jewish Question, Zionism has insisted that this question be brought frankly within the range of international politics. The Alliance Israelite Universelle was the first Jewish organization that apprehended the Jewish Question in its political aspects. All international Jewish organizations are now engaged in the solution of the political phases of the problem. But the Zionist organization is perhaps the only one openly declaring that political means must be employed to secure the the end in view. This unique position of the Zionist organization is due primarily to its democratic character. It speaks not with the voice of the few, but with the voice of a People. For the expression of its aims and the formulation of plans, the Zionist movement created a Jewish Congress. This is the first Parliament that the Jews have had since the destruction of their political independence. The Congress is that forum where all questions affecting the Jewish People may be discussed by duly-elected representatives of the People. The Congress has become the symbol of the better organization of the Jews for self-help. It is the highest expression of Jewish brotherhood.

It is due largely to the influence of Zionism that the Jews in various parts of the world are beginning to organize for the advancement of Judaism. In a conglomerate of nationalities like the Austro-Hungarian Empire, it is due to Zionism that the Jews are insisting upon the recognition of Jewish nationality and upon due representation as a nation in the imperial Parliament. In the Ottoman empire likewise, Zionism stands for the right of all nationalities of the Empire to develop their national soul, while maintaining at the same time the political and territorial integrity of the Empire. Although the policy of the Young Turks has been favoring the compulsory Turkification of all the nationalities of the Empire, signs are not lacking now that the policy for which Zionism stands among the Jews will be applied to all of the component Peoples of the Ottoman State. A similar process will in time, let us hope, make of Russia an Empire that recognizes the equal rights of all its numerous nationalities. In America, where the grouping of Jews politically has no place, it is primarily for religious and cultural purposes that the Jews are beginning to form themselves into organized Communities.

With a Center in the Land of Israel and well ordered Communities among the Nations, the Jews will be on the road to realizing the ideal that Zionism places before them.

In addition to the general idea of comprehensive and statesmanlike organization, the Zionist movement has given several institutions to the Jewish People. Above all, the Jewish National Fund contains the idea, for the first time expressed in modern Jewish life, that the whole People must raise a Fund which shall be the inalienable possession of the People and which shall be used for the great national purpose of acquiring and developing the National Center. This fund enjoys the widest popularity among the Jews. It is a genuinely national institution. Moreover there are Zionist banks, said to be owned by a larger number of shareholders than any other banking institution. In Palestine itself the Jews have proven conclusively their ability to become farmers. The story of shopkeepers and tailors and students who have made the desert to blossom as the rose, is a romance in which the heroism and devotion and hard labour of the Jewish national frontiersmen may be found in generous measure. Whatever occurs in Palestine is of importance to all of the Jews. For, Palestine is the national center, and for this reason the success there of farmers, co-operative settlements, of schools, of banks, has a national significance which does not attach to the activity of the Jews in any other land.

Above all things, Zionism has brought out the Jew's love of freedom and his native courage. Zionism means that the Jew is not willing always to be a guest of the nations, however welcome, but that, on the contrary, he wishes somewhere in the world to be a generous host. Zionism has inspired many Jews and Jewesses to become pioneers in the land of Israel and to stand up in defense of the Jewish name wherever the Jew may dwell. It has made heroes and heroines of modern Jews. It has given the Jew a great cause for which to sacrifice himself. It has straightened bent backs and given dignity to a whole People. It has been, in its short existence, a moral a cleansing, an enobling movement, and we believe that it will have the power to carry its splendid mission to fulfillment

Some Facts in the History of the Jews in Switzerland

On the 27th of August, 1863, a resolution of the Great Council of Aargan completed the partly existing emancipation of the Jews of this canton by granting them the active and passive electoral right in affairs of the canton and of the confederacy. Aargau was the only canton where they had the right of domicile, and even there they were allowed to live in two villages only. The Jews of Switzerland considered the fiftieth anniversary of that day worthy of a celebration which took place in all synagogues on the following Saturday.

There are several phases in the history of the Jews of Switzerland which are different from their history in all other lands. It is believed that the Jews lived in the country which is now known as Switzerland before the founding of the Waldstaette, that is, prior to 1291. Even if this belief is not based upon direct sources of information, still it is assumed by tradition that Jews dwelt here at the time of the Roman settlement. But the first documentary evidence confirming the presence of Jews in Switzerland relates to the fourteenth century only. They appear here and there in the land, mostly in cities, carry on commerce, are antagonized when they do not wish to do it without profit, and bear the same ahasver fate, which was the portion of all the Jews throughout the middle ages. They passed through the entire chain of those bitter sufferings, the reports of which can only let us guess their terrible inhumanity. From the occasional ritual murder accusations and the temporary outburst of the hatred of the masses to the nasty spot of shame in the history of mankind in Europe, the persecutions of the Jews on account of the black death.

Until the end of the fifteenth century the number of Jews was very great. Documents of that time record repeated petitions for permission to build houses of prayer and to establish cemeteries. These documents also report complaints from those who were hit by Jews demanding usurious interest. In the last decade of the fifteenth century the Jews disappear entirely during the whole century of the Reformation and counter reformation. Not till the following century, which is so rich in mediaeval sentiment, which the religious conflicting parties of Switzerland continued to maintain, do the Jews reappear. It is possible that they sought to save themselves there from the misfortunes of the thirty years' war, which made the Swiss country appear like a paradise. Since that time Jews were always to be found in Switzerland, but they preferred to avoid the cities and to settle in villages where they could gain more freedom and were not so quickly exposed to the hatred of great masses of the rabble. What we learn from the records is that in the pursuits which were left to them they always had to suffer from the displeasure of those who were dependent upon their money; that they were often punished or expelled for taking usurious interest; that the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries proved to them that the feeling of humanity which permeated mankind offered them the same cruelties as in the middle ages, and that they were still being driven hither and thither like a band of gypsies, pushed from one to another, while the revolutionary cry of the rights of man across the Vosges found a mighty echo also in Switzerland.

Whether it was by accident or intention the fact is that from the previous century the Jews concentrated in the county of Baden, a part of the canton Aargau of to-day, and they gradually retreated to two villages near Baederstadt, Lengnau and Endingen.

From there they wandered through the land on account of their business, where they could not show themselves without the badge of distinction, always having to pay the Jew toll, and were always in fear of their lives. The German condition of the "protected Jew" (Schutzjude) existed also in Switzerland, and so-called safe conduct was furnished to the Jew by the Swiss government in consideration of certain taxes paid by the Jews. There exists plenty of evidence to show that in many cases different canton governments did that which was self understood, namely they really accorded to the Jews police protection and severely punished any mean act committed by the rabble or soldiery. But the actual exercise of such assumed protection became rare, the same conduct might have been useful, but it remained an empty formality. The Catholic cantons more than anybody recognized in the chased game a means of propaganda for their aims, and they did not omit the least opportunity to punish the Jews; if they at all granted them the right of settlement or even to pass through. Many cases are known where the Jews were punished for usury where they only wanted that which was rightly due to them from prominent persons. Envious competition and religious hatred harmoniously worked hand in hand.

With pride and joy the Jews of Switzerland state that as early as the eighteenth century some voices were heard in protest against the undeserved harsh treatment of the Jews. Even if these protests were only few in number and they, too, were decried by opponents, they were nevertheless appreciated, for any one who is able to look back into those times will admit that to assume an attitude free from prejudice toward the Jewish question was a very difficult thing. The Jews not only carried externally the marks of a foreign race, but everything, language, religion and mode of life, pointed to their foreign origin for the eradication of which no attempt was made. It was only natural that the Semitic traits which favor merchandising and the compulsion to engage in it developed the ability for a commercial occupation. But only a few possessed sufficient ability to think historically in order to comprehend this. The general feeling was that the Jews were nothing but an Asiatic people of traders, whose ancestors crucified their own great fellow tribesman.

The Jewish question must also be considered from the Helvetic standpoint. It remains an open question how far the Helvetic leaders were induced by their own desire to treat the Jewish question or to what extent they were forced to do it under the pressure of Napoleon. During the short duration of its activity the Helvetic by no means accomplished any positive work. In that time of mediation and reaction it had other things to do. At any rate, the first quarter of the century did not pass without fruitful steps being taken by the authorities of the Aargau canton. A law of the year 1809 makes the Jews of Aargau citizens of the canton without granting them the rights of members of other faiths and only with less hard obligations than their ancestors had to assume. (The Jews of Aargau only are considered here as Lengeman and Endingen were the official places of Jewish settlement and they belonged to the new canton of Aargau.) In 1824 both places of Jewish settlement were raised to corporations with autonomic rights. In the following decades the government organized the Jewish communal life, the system of the poor laws, etc. In 1846 the right of settlement was extended to the entire canton. Had a motion been offered to the deliberative body during the following two years of the constitution of the confederacy, the settlement right would perhaps have been extended through the whole of Switzerland. In the middle of the '50s the restrictions of commerce, which consisted of the unattainable "Jewish Patents," were abolished. Then the Jews gained enough feelings of independence to take up the fight for equal rights. First it was necessary to raise the Jewish corporations to the position of local communities of citizens. They were fortunate to find co-fighters in the liberal-minded statesmen of Aargau: above all in Emil Welte, who later became president, and in the distinguished Augustin Keller, who always interceded for the Jews just as he thundered against convents and Jesuits. A B'nai B'rith lodge established in Zuerich in 1909 justly honored his memory by assuming the name of Augustine Keller Lodge.

But in spite of Welti, Keller and others, the bringing about of equal rights did not proceed without difficulties; history even records a revolution in miniature. Through a referendum a pressure was brought to bear upon the government of Aargau to annul the newly promulgated favorable law. Now it was a matter for the confederation. It did not do it of its own free inclination, but upon the desire of the French government. The question was about the renewal of the settlement agreement the government of Napoleon III, wished it to be interpreted to apply also to the French Jews. The government of the Confederacy found itself placed before the alternative either of abandoning the agreement, wrich was not advisable, or of granting a right to foreign Jews which it had refused to those who lived in the Aargau for centuries. It did the only correct thing when it induced the government of Aargau to annul the restrictive laws concerning matrimonial alliance, settlement,, right of election and military duty. This was accomplisred by the mentioned law of August, 1863. On that day the complete emancipation of the Jews of Aargau was proclaimed and it required only one more short step to extend these rights to all the Jews in entire Switzerland, the last inducement for which was found in the new settlement agreements.

Since then the Jews settled in all the cantons and their number has increased five fold during the five decades. With the acclimatization of the Jews the real equalization proceeds parallel with the official one. Slowly the Jews separate themselves from the trades which they followed for centuries and which to their regret have put their stamp upon their life and upon the views in the midst of the people. But united with the numerous Jews, who emigrated from Eastern and Northern Europe, and naturalized in Switzerland, they begin to conquer a respectable position. Numerous university professors, gymnasium teachers, prominent physicians and advocates, earnest co-workers of the commercial and manufacturing classes demonstrate to their Christian fellow citizens that the horizon of the Jews can expand beyond the limits of exclusive money lending and cattle dealing. Foreign and native Jews enjoy in every way the prerogatives and beauties of the democracy and the Jewish citizens are inspired by the earnest wish to prove worthy of the attained equality. Also for this, rewards beckon to them more than anywhere else. We find Jews in the communal offices and administration as well as in the canton governments and in the list of officers of the army of the Confederacy many a Jewish name is entered. The Jews of Switzerland also have at heart the liberty and the future of the Confederacy.*—Allgemeiue Zeitung des Judenthunes.

*—To the above article should be added the interesting fact that the great council of Switzerland on December 11th, 1913, elected the former vice president of the national council Dr. Arthur Hoffmann of St. Gall, who is our coreligionist, as president of the republic for the year 1914. Dr. Hoffmann is a lawyer by profession, and is fifty-six years old. Switzerland is the first country in Europe to elect a Jew to the highest executive office of its government.—(Editor B. B. News.)

REFLECTION ON JEWISH RACE CAUSE OF NEW TRIAL.

Remarks meant to be humorous made by a lawyer in summing up a case before a jury in the Fifth Avenue Municipal Court, in Brooklyn, on Dec. 14, caused the Appellate Term of the Supreme Court to reverse a judgment for $213 awarded to his client. A new trial was ordered.

Floyd Martin Sheffield, a lawyer, brought suit against Cohn, a former client, to recover for legal services. In summing up the plaintiff's attorney told a story reflecting on the Jews as a race. The Appellate Term in its decision said:

"We think juries are not usually influenced by such methods unless their outraged sense of propriety inclines them against the perpetrator. Decency and ordinary courtesy should characterize a lawsuit. There is no reason why the defendant's character should be attacked. Neither a witness nor a party on the witness stand is subject to insult and base insinuations. Nor should any attacks upon any creed, race or sect be permitted to counsel."

JEWISH RIGHTS IN THE ANNEXED TERRITORIES.

The bill for the organization of the new Dobrudja has been distributed to the members of the Rumanian Chamber of Deputies. The clauses affecting the civil and political rights of the populations in the territory annexed by Rumania enact that Bulgarian citizens who, on June 28 last, inhabited the new Dobrudja, become Rumanian citizens, enjoying all the civil and political rights provided by the Rumanian laws. They may acquire immovable rural property, but only in the annexed territory. The Christian orthodox religion of the Rumanian state is to be the dominant religion in the new territory; but liberty of conscience is to be absolute, and the liberty of all religions is recognized, in so far as external manifestations are not opposed to the law of the country and to public tranquility.

THE KEHILLAH

BY PROF. GOTTHARD DEUTSCH, Ph.D.

VII.

One of the greatest difficulties in writing history is the proper division into periods. For the sake of our orientation it is necessary to stop at certain milestones in history and to regard certain leading personalities as the exponents of what is the most potent factor in making up the history of their age. We all agree that this is the case of George Washington or of Abraham Lincoln. But where do we draw the dividing line? That Thomas Jefferson belongs to Washington's age is clear, though he was born ten years later, and survived Washington by twenty-seven years. We might regard Andrew Jackson as Jefferson's contemporary, and Lincoln as the contemporary of Jackson, and thus we would reach the illogical conclusion that Washington and Lincoln were contemporaries. We therefore must make up with the necessity that dividing history into periods will cause a certain arbitrariness in individual instances.

Applying this principle to our Jewish history, we must regard the year 1830 as epoch-making. The French people whom already Julius Caesar has characterized as always desiring something new, had on July 29, 1830, driven away their king, whose dynasty had been reinstated only 15 years before with great pomp by the combined powers of Europe. It was a severe shock for the sovereigns by the grace of God. About ten years before they had felt themselves so strong that they could adopt the resolutions of Karlsbad, going so far as to express covert threats against America and thus paving the way for the Monroe Doctrine. I take it for granted that not even in Prague were these events fully understood in their influence on Jewish affairs. Yet they were the leaven to change the condition even of the Jews of Kanitz. Wise statesmen recognized at once that a return to the principles, prevailing previous to the French Revolution, was an impossibility. Concessions had to be made to the spirit of the time just in order to preserve the rights of sovereigns. Any change of the constitution of the states was bourd to affect the Jews. They were kept in some countries in mediaeval conditions. There was a restriction on the right of residence, which forbade the Jews to settle in any place in Saxony outside of Leipsic and Dresden. In our dear Moravia this restriction comprised all cities of any consequence, like Bruenn and Olmuetz, and at the same time the Jews were not permitted to settle in villages unless they were the tenants of a great landed estate owner, who was a sort of a sovereign on his estates. The next serious disability was the restriction on marriages, which I have already characterized in a previous chapter. It was outrageously anomalous, although it existed not merely in Moravia but in a great many German states, especially in Bavaria. Finally there were the numerous restrictions on occupations. On all sides the complaint was heard that the Jew was not a producer, that he contributed nothing to the wealth of the country from which he drew his livelihood, and yet the exercise of manual trades and the acquisition of rural land was rendered very difficult, often impossible for him. In Saxony a Jewish boy was to be apprenticed with a tailor. The master had to report this fact to the office of the guild, but the latter refused to register the apprentice, and it took a special order from the king to compel it to do so. It was still more difficult for a Jew to enter some of the professions. All offices under the state were closed to him. This excluded a Jewish graduate of the Law school from all executive and judiciary offices. But even the practice of the law was hardly accessible. He first of all could not act as notary public, because this was a judiciary function, and as the number of lawyers was limited, and the right to open a law office depended on a permission, given by the minister, this right was tantamount to an appointment to an office, and practically inaccessible to the Jews. What good did it therefore do to the Jews if the law permitted them to enter universities and if benign statesmen declared that they should be encouraged in taking up agriculture and manual trades. In individual instances local laws presented a condition which became directly ridiculous. In Vienna Jews were not permitted to reside. Of course there were numerous exceptions in favor of bankers, manufacturers and their employes, war veterans, secret service agents, and even of regular crooks who had bought this privilege by informing against co-religionists for infringing on restrictive laws. A Jew, not possessing the right of residence in Vienna, could only enter on a permit issued by the police and entitling him to a two weeks' sojourn. He had to pay a fee for this permit which practically was a "Leibzoll," though the name had been abrogated by Emperor Joseph II. Now it happened that Giacomo Meyerbeer, the famous composer. came to Vienna to supervise the production of one of his operas. All of Vienna, including the court, was in a state of excitement. The Maestro, however, was a Jew, and as such would have to pay a fee for a special permit to be obtained at the "Judenamt" of the police. The court, including the Philistine emperor, Francis, saw the ridiculousness of the situation. An artist of international fame had been invited to produce one of his works at the Imperial Opera, and at the same time he had to report to the police like a suspicious character. The bureaucrats finally found a way out of the difficulty by declaring that Meyerbeer, as possessor of some Prussian order, was a cavalier and as such not a Jew.

Instances of this kind could be indefinitely multiplied. They show that the Government itself was convinced of the necessity of a change in the legal condition of the Jews. Such an event as the French Revolution, which suggested concessions to the spirit of the age, was a pressing call for action. It could not remain without influence on the internal condition of the Jews. The more the cultured Jews enjoyed the advantage of the exception from restrictions, the more the Yeshiba became deserted and secular culture general.

Thus the February Revolution became an epoch-making event even for Kanitz. The generation whose activity lies before 1830 is different from that which guided Judaism in the second third of the nineteenth century. As far as Moravia is concerned the generation before 1830 is represented by the already mentioned Landesrabbiner Mordecai Benet, or by his official name, Marcus Benedict, who died August 12, 1829, not quite a year before the event in Paris which had such a powerful influence on the condition of the Jews. Contemporaries of his who represent the same ideas, are Akiba Eger, like Benedict a native of Hungary, 1761-1837, who as rabbi of Posen tried his best to preserve old Polish traditions in an environment that had become German; Eleazar Fleckeles, acting chief-rabbi of Prague, 1755-1826, a mild retiring nature perfectly satisfied to let the world move on as long as he was not disturbed personally; Meshullam Zalman, the last Orthodox rabbi of Fuerth, 1740-1820; the strongest character of this period, Moses Sofer, born in Frankfurt a. M., 1762, who from 1806 to his death in 1839, was rabbi of Pressburg. The principle for which these men stood was the maintenance of the complete spiritual isolation of the Jews. Outside of that training which was necessary for a man to earn a livelihood, the study of the Talmud was to be the sole occupation of the Jews. Merely out of deference to the government, they were willing to allow a modicum of secular education. In the province of Posen which Prussia had reconquered in 1815, the government went to work in that systematic way typical of Prussian bureaucracy. An order was issued in 1825, requiring that every Jewish child receive secular education, either in a Jewish school, or, where such was not found, in the communal school.

Solomon Plessner, 1797-1883, one of the few very cultured men of orthodox inclinations, drew up a curriculum for the Jewish schools upon the request of the orthodox rabbis. In his plan Bible and Talmud were given considerable consideration by the side of the regular subjects taught in primary schools. Akiba Eger, to whom this plan was submitted, was provoked. This was treason to the cause of Judaism. How could we expect to educate good Jews, if, after being exhausted by their secular studies, they would devote an hour or two to the Talmud? His idea was that Cheder and Yeshibah should occupy the time of the boys every morning, while in the afternoon they might learn the "three R's" which was all that a Jew needed for making a livelihood, and which the government had a right to demand. Similar may have been the position of Marcus Benedict. It does not seem likely that there were any regular schools in Moravia before 1830. Emperor Joseph II had issued a law, enforcing secular education, but it was only enforced so far that the children went for an hour or two every day to the Christian teacher of the town or that they received some secular instruction in the Cheder. The somewhat better situated families kept a private tutor for their children. Besides, there was always a great difference in Austria between a law and its execution, as we can see in Galicia today, where the law requiring secular education is not carried into effect yet. When the government demanded secular education of the rabbis in 1820, Mordecai Benet advised adversely. A rabbi had no time to study philosophy. In other matters he was already willing to make concessions. He indorsed the text book of Jewish religion, written by Herz Homberg under the title, Bene Zion, which was done in order to satisfy the government which demanded that every child receive religious training, just as he was willing to indorse the Pentateuch with the heretical translation by Mendelssohn, because the government desired that this popular book be printed in Austria instead of being imported. He showed, however, a real willingness to meet the demands of the age, when he indorsed a German catechism, written by his own son, Naphthali. The Heder was doomed. The tragedy of the old-fashioned Melamed is touchingly and at the same time humorously presented by Aaron Bernstein, in his novel, "Voegele der Maggid," where the poor Melamed, deprived of his job, expresses his bitter feelings against the "antisemite," Herr von Altenstein, the minister of education, who out of sheer "Rishus" had deprived him of the means of livelihood. We may take 1830 as the critical period. Shortly afterwards the largest congregations created systematic schools and the small ones followed within fifteen years.

The period of political struggle for emancipation is characterized also by a constant friction between rabbi and teacher. The former is the conservative and the latter the progressive element. As such and because his activity means an improvement in economic conditions, the teacher is popular with the young people. In addition he is very often allied with the anti-religious element. Such examples we find in Peter Beer, 1759-1838, and Herz Homberg, 1759-1841, both teachers in Prague, during the first half of the 19th century. Homberg once proposed to the government to prohibit the appointment of rabbis, for instead of teaching people ethics their only concern is how the mazos should be baked. They curse the people for carrying a cane on Sabbath and, exalting the Talmudic studies, they implant in the hearts of their flock contempt for manual labor, and hatred of other peoples. Herz Homberg, who had the ambition to obtain a leading position as civilizing agent of the government, once asked for the right of residence in Vienna, stating in support of his petition that four of his five sons were baptized, while of the fifth he was not quite sure. It is rather probable, however, that he did not know that this fifth son, Friedrich, who was then lieutenant in the Austrian army, was for some unexplained reason not yet baptized. He converted later, rose to the rank of captain, and died in high old age, leaving a son who was also an officer in the army, but did not even reach the rank of his father, although he was born and raised a Christian.

Leopold Zunz, 1794-1886, one of the greatest scholars whom Judaism produced, and a lover of Jewish literature even to the extent of partiality, was carried away by his bitter animosity against the rabbis, when at the opening of the Jewish normal school of Berlin in 1840 he raised his hands, thanking God that the days of the dominion of the rabbis were over. The acting chief rabbi of Berlin, Jacob Joseph Oettinger, was present. In this case there was also another reason for the antipathy. Oetinger, like all the rabbis of his school, had only a smile of contempt for the literary work of Zunz. History meant nothing to him. What difference did it make whether a certain work of rabbinic literature was written in the 18th or in the 12th century?

Our little Kanitz was not spared the conflict between teacher and rabbi. After the death of Rabbi Joseph Spiro, the congregation elected in 1830, Rabbi Mordecai Tritsch, as its spiritual head. His official name was Marcus Trieschet, the name pointing to the city of Triesch, where his family had originally come from. He was what was called a Tritscher Familiant, which meant that his marriage license had been issued for Triesch, where his family originally was domiciled, although his father was rabbi in Weisskirchen, another Moravian town. The poor man was never in his life in a happy condition. He expected to succeed his father in the rabbinate of Weisskirchen. I remember dimly that as a boy I saw in my father's possession a batch of papers referring to this incident. Marcus Trieschet appealed to the government to compel the congregation to elect him in his father's place, for according to Rambam and many other authorities the divine law of the hereditary right of kings (Deut. XVIII, 20) was applicable to the rabbinical position also. Similar cases occurred quite often, and are recorded in our casuistic literature. Rabbi Mordecai lost his suit, and was elected rabbi of Kanitz, where he held office for thirty-six years until his death in 1866. He came simultaneously with the July revolution, and lived through the memorable year of 1848 which changed the whole condition of Jewish life. There were no more Familianten, there was no demand for a Yeshibah, the Ghetto was a fading memory, the Kehillah slowly moved to Bruenn and Vienna, the teacher, formerly the idol of the congregation, began to yield his place to the rabbi, who wore a long robe instead of "Shubitza" (gaberdine) and a hat like the Roman Catholic Biretta instead of the fur-trimmed velvet "Streimel," and he addressed his flock not as "Rabbossai" or "Yiddishe kinder," but as "Meine Andaechtigen Zuhoerer."

THE JEWS OF BUCHARA.

The present Senate has rendered a decision which affects deeply the life of the Turkestan colony. The so-called Bucharian Jews, who have settled outside of Buchara, will from now on not be considered as Russian subjects but as foreigners, and as such they will not have the right to own land in Russian Turkestan. The Bucharian Jews are natives of Buchara, where as descendants of the Jews who were led as captives to Babylon, they lived a tolerable life, even if not on a basis of social equality, and if they did not emigrate to Russian Turkestan they still enjoy this life. For centuries they have been natives in the cities of the Fergana territory and since the land was conquered by the Russians they were the most enterprising element in commerce. They have advanced business in general to a higher point than the one it reached before the conquest. The great cotton factories were all established by Bucharian Jews. First in line is the joint stock company of Wodjajew Brothers, in Kokand and there are many others. They will now have to leave the Russian country in which they had a right to live unhindered for so many years. Why? Because the Russian civil population has complained that they can not thrive on account of the competition of the Bucharian Jews, as these make it impossible by the peculiar ways of their race for the true believers to get ahead. If this argument were to be found in an anti-Semitic paper only, it would not deserve any consideration, but that a decision of the Senate approves of it is indeed surprising. About 11 per cent of the entire population of Fergana valley will be hit by this measure in case it really is enforced and is not introduced only to be evaded like so many other laws against the Jews. The Bucharians have lived together with the Jews for thousands of years and one can not find in the whole history of the country a single statute which distinguishes the Jews by exceptional laws as a race. The Russian colonization work has now carried this beautiful acquisition of European intolerance to the farthest corner of the earth.—

THE ANTI-JEWISH BOYCOTT IN GALICIA.

While the two Galician nationalities, the Poles and Ruthenians, haggle with one another about the adjustment of the election reform question, the economic boycott against the Jews is being carried on to such a fearful extent that a great, deeply penetrating catastrophe becomes inevitable, if steps are not taken immediately to prevent the same. From all parts of Galicia, especially from the little towns and villages, come the sad complaints that the Jews are there helplessly exposed to a boycott movement on the part of the chanvinistic Poles, and that this boycott must the surer bring about the ruination of numberless Jews, the more the agitators see that their agitations encounter nowhere any hindrance. It seems that in Galicia, like in Russian Poland, the ruin of Jewish existences shall be the price through which the renitent Poles shall find occupation.—.

ANNUAL CONVENTION OF DISTRICT GRAND LODGE NO. 7

Address of President Kraus

District Grand Lodge No. 7 convened in 41st annual session at the Hotel Youree, Shreveport, La., on Sunday morning, April 26, 1914. Over 130 delegates and a large number of Past Presidents of the Grand Lodge were in attendance.

The convention was called to order by the President, Mr. Arthur L. Kramer, who requested Rabbi J. Pollak of Monroe, La., to deliver the invocation. This was followed by welcoming addresses by Brother Harry M. Weil, president of the local B'nai B'rith Lodge, by Brother E. R. Bernstein, former mayor of Shreveport, and by Lieut. Governor Thos. C. Barret. An original poem dedicated to the B'nai B'rith by Mrs. Wm. Winter was read by her daughter, Miss Mabel. The response on behalf of the convention was made by Rabbi Martin Zielonka of El Paso, Texas.

The convention was also honored by the presence of the President of the Order, Brother Adolf Kraus, and the Secretary of the Executive Committee, Brother A. B. Seelenfreund, who delivered addresses on the aims and objects of the Order.

ADDRESS OF MR. KRAUS.

"Brother President and Brethren:

"I realize that I am in our Southern District, where every delegate is an orator and eloquence in speech a native grace. To deliver to such an audience an address which would be entertaining is a task to which I am not equal. I will therefore confine my remarks to a statement of what I deem should be the nature of our work in the future, at least in this country.

"What the Order has accomplished in this country you all know; what it is doing in other lands Brother Seelenfreund, who will follow me, will inform you.

"I listened with much pleasure to the very interesting and eloquent address just delivered by the Lieutenant Governor of this state and the praise he bestowed on our people for their good citizenship, for the generous way in which they take care of their poor, was gratifying, as was also his statement that there is only one Jewish prisoner in the state prison and he only for a minor crime. I congratulate the Jews of this state upon that statement and wish that we could show a similar record in every other state in the Union. Unfortunately that cannot be done. Jews are not exempt from having amongst and of them offenders against the law.

"Our aim should be to reduce the number of such offenders to a minimum and eliminate them entirely if possible. There was a time when Jews were compelled by law to live in a Ghetto. In those days whenever a Jew committed an offense or was suspected of having committed an offense, vengeance was visited not only on the guilty or suspected Jew but upon all of the Jews in the community. Similar conditions exist even now in certain half civilized governments, and where such conditions exist it is but natural that for reasons of self preservation our people were not over eager to bear witness against one of their number. Our country being a civilized land, the people desire to do justice. Therefore the theory "one for all and all for one" has not been and should not be permitted to gain a foothold. In order that the innocent should not suffer for the guilty, the guilty should be brought to justice. Immunity from punishment breeds criminals. The punishment of each guilty person is a lesson to others not to violate the law and operates as a powerful restraint against such violation. I deem it one of the duties of our organization to aid the authorities in the enforcement of all laws, especially against offenders in our own midst. If a Jew commits a crime he alone should suffer the punishment.

"Some years ago one of our monthly magazines charged that the White Slave traffic was largely in the hands of Jews, especially in the city of Chicago. This statement caused us to make an investigation. We found that the report was very much exaggerated, but to our surprise we found also that some Jews were engaged in that infamous traffic. At that time there was no law against pandering in any state in the Union. We promptly drew up a bill making pandering an offense, presented it to the Illinois Legislature, where it was promptly and unanimously enacted into law. Other states followed the example of Illinois and subsequently Congress passed the Mann Act. In the city of Chicago we appointed a committee composed of persons of different faiths, which undertook to see to it that the pandering laws should be enforced. They employed an attorney and detectives, and at my request an order was given to catch guilty Jews first. Several panderers were caught, convicted and punished. The rest either got frightened and stopped trafficking in women, or reformed, so that the city of Chicago is now almost clear of such offenders. What was accomplished in that city can be done in every other city.

"When I stated that there are in the prisons of the different states inmates of our faith, I did not wish to be understood as saying that the number of such is by any means large. On the contrary, our percentage of convicts is much smaller than that of any other faith, but I consider that one Jewish convict is just one too many, and one Jewish prostitute in a city is one too many.

"It is a credit to our Order that it has established orphan asylums, hospitals, homes for aged and kindred institutions, but it is of greater importance and in fact the paramount duty of our organization, in my opinion, that it should exert all its power towards protecting the Jewish name and keeping the record of our people for good citizenship clear of the violations by Jews of the law of the land.

"That a certain prejudice exists against our people in the minds of some of the people cannot be denied. To check, and ultimately to destroy entirely such prejudice, should be one of the aims of our organization. To aid in this task the Anti-Defamation League was formed and it is doing excellent work. We must, however, bear in mind that it will not do for us to be super-sensitive, to take offense where none was intended, or to consider an innocent joke at our expense as an insult; but malicious ridicule or the portraying of Jewish character in such manner as to produce contempt and hatred against our people, whether by the means of moving pictures, the stage, newspaper articles, or other means, must and will be resented in a dignified and manly manner. The time of the bended back is gone. Blows will no longer be received meekly. An appeal on our part to reason and a demand for fair play has in most instances been successful. Some of the attacks against us are, however, prompted by motives having their origin in the box office or at the cashier's desk. Where such motive prevails reason vanishes, but in such cases the attacks have ceased when after some well directed attention was given the matter, there was a falling off in the cash receipts!

"We come to the relief of all of our suffering brethren. Our aim as an organization is to be sort of an advance guard for the Jewry of the world; in short, to be the first to note danger or distress and promptly to give the alarm and such assistance as we can. Our organization was the first to furnish money to the sufferers of the San Francisco earthquake, the Constantinople fire, the cholera sufferers from the Balkan war, and in several other instances. In each case money was sent by wire. Assistance from us reached the Orient several days before any European organization attempted to furnish any relief to the sufferers. I do not deem it necessary to call your attention to our numerous efforts to aid the victims of the elements, pestilence and persecution, for you have been kept advised from time to time by the reports published in our official organ, and the lodges of this District have been most generous in contributing to each appeal for aid. That our work of late years has met with the approval of our co-religionists is evidenced by the fact that our membership has increased nearly 50 per cent. We have now practically ceased to be a mutual benefit association. To some extent our organization is destined to remain fraternal. Much good has been done by it in the past. The present is full of necessity and opportunity, and the future will bring forth new duties. There is much to do and many ways in which the great objects of our organization may be pursued. One of these ways, and by no means the least important of them is for it to become a teacher of those who inherit the prejudice of the dark ages. This can be accomplished by such conduct on our part as will compel the respect of our fellow men and by a courageous and manly fight in the open for justice and fair play, not only for our people, but for all those of the human race who are still victims of persecution."

Afternoon Session.

The first business of the afternoon session consisted of the reading by President Kramer of his annual message covering the activities of the District during his administration, which was received with marked approval.

The election of officers was then declared the next order of business and the following were thereupon duly elected:

Leo Goodman, Memphis, President.

Nathan Cohn, Nashville, First Vice-President.

E. R. Bernstein, Shreveport, Second Vice-President.

Ralph J. Schwartz, New Orleans, Third Vice-President.

Nat Strauss, New Orleans, Secretary.

Archibald A. Marx, New Orleans, Treasurer.

The business session of the first day was then concluded by adoption of a motion authorizing the sending of a message of condolence to Brother M. H. Frolichstein of Mobile, Ala., upon the death of his son, who was a victim of Mexican bullets at Vera Cruz in the first engagement between the United States and the Mexican forces.

Intellectual Advancement Exercises.

A combined literary and musical program was carried out on Sunday evening at the Travis St. Auditorium under the auspices of the Intellectual Advancement Committee of the District Grand Lodge. The affair was the first of a series of entertainments arranged for the delegates. The special feature of the evening was the address of Rabbi Wm. H. Fineshriber of Memphis on the subject, "Ideals." Rabbi Fineshriber charmed the audience with his eloquence, with which he urged the young men of Israel to bend their thoughts and works to high and noble ideals. The musical numbers of the program were thoroughly enjoyed. The exercises were presided over by Mr. Joseph Hirsh of Vicksburg, chairman of the committee, and the benedicton was made by Rabbi S. W. Kory of Vicksburg, Miss.

Monday Morning Session.

Invocation by Rabbi Faber of Tyler, Texas, opened the Monday morning session. Brother Sylvan E. Hess of St. Paul, President of District Grand Lodge No. 6, was thereupon introduced to the convention.

A resolution signed by numerous delegates was presented and unanimously adopted, conferring upon President Adolf Kraus and Secretary A. B. Seelenfreund honorary membership in District Grand Lodge No. 7.

Various standing committees for the convention were then appointed.

Address on "White Slavery."

Hon. James Bronson Reynolds of New York, former Assistant District Attorney of New York, addressed the convention on "White Slavery." He credited the B'nai B'rith with valuable assistance to the authorities, financially and otherwise in this movement and urged the need of awakening the general public to the importance of fighting this evil.

Following the address, which was received with much approval, resolution was offered providing for the election of delegates to the Constitution Grand Lodge, declaring the same as special order of business for the Tuesday morning session. This precipitated a warm discussion, with the result that the resolution allowing all lodges to have candidates before the convention, irrespective of the fact whether such lodges had neglected to make their nominations before the convention assembled, was adopted.

During the afternoon the local ladies' committee entertained the delegates and visitors with an automobile ride to the country club and luncheon at Scheer's Pavilion for the ladies attending the convention.

Afternoon Session.

The afternoon session was occupied mainly with the presentation of reports of officers and also committee reports and attention to routine business. A special feature of the session was an address by Mr. Morris Epstein, manager of the Jewish Immigration Bureau of Galveston. Resolutions were introduced making appropriation for the benefit of the National Jewish Hospital for Consumptives at Denver, also one calling the attention of the District Grand Lodge to the vast territory of unoccupied lands in the southwest and urging the advisability of diverting immigration to that land.

Report of the Secretary showed that the membership of the Order in the District had grown to almost 6,000. The District was also shown to be in excellent condition as far as finances are concerned, and all the charitable and benevolent institutions supported by the District were reported in first-class condition.

Tuesday Session.

The election of delegates to the Constitution Grand Lodge and the question of distribution of Jewish immigrants were the two principal questions presented for the consideration of the convention at the Tuesday morning session. The recommendation of the Immigration and Agriculture Committee referring to the establishment of a Jewish farming colony within the territory of District No. 7, also attracted much attention.

Communication was also presented from the Secretary of the Order, calling attention to the B'nai B'rith Kindergarten at Constantinople, and requesting recognition on the part of District Grand Lodge No. 7. Communication was referred to the Finance Committee.

Mr. Emil Nathan, chairman of the Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital Fund Committee, submitted report regarding the building and its equipment, advising that the committee will find it necessary to issue debentures for about $20,000 to cover all outsanding obligations. Several subscriptions for those debentures have already been received.

Greetings from Mrs. Leo N. Levi of Dallas, expressing her appreciation of the District's continued reverence of the memory of her husband received much applause.

A trip to Cedar Grove to afford the delegates an opportunity to see how Shreveport utilizes its natural gas supply along industrial lines was arranged for in the afternoon.

The election of the delegates to the Constitution Grand Lodge Convention to be held in San Francisco in 1915 closed the morning session.

The delegates and alternatives chosen were as follows: Leon Schwarz, Mobile; Emil Nathan, Memphis; Henry Cohen, Galveston; Nathan Cohn, Nashville; Joseph Hirsh, Vicksburg; Henry Dannerbaum, Houston; Ernest R. Bernstein, Shreveport; Chas. F. Moritz, Montgomery; A. A. Marx, New Orleans; George Pfeifer, Little Rock; Arthur L. Kramer, Dallas; Ralph J. Schwartz, New Orleans; Leo Goodman, Memphis; Chas. Rosen, New Orleans; Charles Frenkel, Galveston; M. Zielonka, El Paso; B. Wadel, Tyler.

Afternoon Session.

The afternoon session was devoted exclusively to the reading of various committees' reports. The committee on President's Message commended President Kramer on the thoroughness of his review of the condition of the District. The committee on State of the Order laid special emphasis on the fact that the younger generation in Israel is taking a far greater interest in the affairs of the Order than in past years and recommended that the lodges provide more social activities as a means of encouraging them to affiliate with the Order.

Co-operation with the Galveston Immigration Bureau was recommended and all the recommendations of the committee were concurred in.

The committee on Charitable Institutions recommended the continuance of relationship with the Touro Infirmary at New Orleans and recommended the continued support of the Grand Lodge. Recommendation was enthusiastically applauded and adopted.

The Endowment Committee reported condition of that fund in excellent shape.

A telegram to President Wilson commending him for the stand he has taken in the Mexican crisis was authorized in a special resolution adopted by the Grand Lodge shortly before closing.

Various donations by lodges to the charitable institutions of the District were announced. The convention then adjourned to accept the invitation of the Shreveport Chamber of Commerce to visit Cedar Grove.

During the morning the ladies attending the convention were the guests at a reception and musical given for them at the residence of Mrs. E. R. Bernstein, and in the evening the entire convention attended an amateur minstrel and vaudeville performance at the Columbia Club, which was followed by an informal dance in the club's ball room.

Wednesday Session.

With the invocation by Rabbi Brill

Russia and the Jews

RUSSIAN SENATE REFUSES TO LEGALIZE AN ANTI-SEMITIC ORGANIZATION.

Defends Honor of the Jews.

The Senate has refused to legalize the society organized by Dr. Dubrovin, the notorious Real Russian leader, for the purpose of studying the "Szidovsky Nation." The senate declared that the constitution of the proposed organization emphasized the belief that Jews used Christian blood in food, and that, moreover, the term "Szid" as applied to the Jew was offensive to the Jewish nation. This courageous action of the senate is quite unique in recent times, and it is all the more welcome in view of the fact that Jews are not in a position to take legal proceedings against traducers of their religion and race.

In order to defend the honor of the Jews, the Conference of the Rabbis at Kieff has also resolved to ask the government to delete from the oath taken by Jews the offensive words to effect that a Jew has "nothing hidden in his mind, and means the same as the one who administers the oath."

FIVE THOUSAND JEWS TO BE EXILED FROM KIEFF.

As a result of the decision to include the suburb of Dimievka in the "holy" area of Kieff (where Jews are not allowed to live), the authorities have resolved to exile 5,000 Jews, who constitute the non-privileged Jewish population.

JEWISH SUCCESSES IN DUMA COMMITTEES.

The Interpellation Committee has condemned the exile of Jewish workmen who are on strike in non-Pale cities, recognizing that Jews, too, have the right to do so. The decision not to allow Jews to enter training colleges has been so amended that it will not apply to the Colleges in the Pale. Furthermore, it is intended to allow Jews in the Pale to elect the Municipalities instead of leaving the Governors the choice of appointing them.

RUSSIAN MINISTER OVERRULES ANTI-SEMITIC GOVERNORS.

In harmony with the Tsar's Rescript and the recent action of the Senate, the Minister of the Interior has issued a circular ordering the Governors not to expel Jews who possess the right to reside outside the Pale. The same Minister has also cancelled the illegal expulsion of one hundred and fifty Jewish families from the villages in the province of Lomza.

THE JEWISH QUESTION IN THE DUMA.

The Duma Committee has resolved to press the interpellation against the ballot system for Jews, which has been illegally introduced into the educational institutions in Russia. The motion that Jews should not be allowed to become police officials was also rejected by the Duma Committee, although the Government has decided that not even converted Jews should be permitted to become gendarmes.

ENACTMENT OF NEW RESTRICTIONS AGAINST JEWS.

The campaign of the United Russian Nobility against the employment of Jews in the army, and for the further restriction of the admission of Jews and Jewesses into schools, culminated not only in the adoption of those principles, but in a representation to the Government in favor of the taxation of rich Jews and the extensive employment of poor Jews on the lines of communication instead of their serving at the front, on the ground that Jews were revolutionaries and bad soldiers.

THE BLACK HUNDRED PRESS.

The Zemschina has come to the conclusion that the secret funds are no longer to be depended upon to ensure a profitable career for the Black Hundred Press. The journal now advocates a more regular method of subsidy by means of a Government monopoly of advertisements. These would be distributed among the papers concerned, so that each publication should get an equal amount of advertising matter every month.

"This," declares the Zemschina, "would strengthen the whole Russian Press. which is now placed in a most humiliating position by its dependence on Jewish advertisers."

KIEV JEWS MENACED.

Over Five Thousand Threatened with Expulsion.

The governor of Kiev has asked the central government not to expel the Jewish inhabitants of several suburbs which have just been incorporated with the town of Kiev. The "holy city" itself is not recognized as part of the Pale of Settlement, in the midst of which it is situated.

According to the official reports, the suburb of Demievka contains 1,184 Jewish families, comprising 5,048 souls, and the suburb of Shulavka 120 families, with a total of 556 members. The local authorities have recommended the Ministry of the Interior, in the event of the suburbs being incorporated with the township of Kiev, to attach the Jewish residents of Demievka to the present Pale district of Kiev that bears the same name, and those of Shulavka to the Lukyanovska district, which is also within the Pale.

The Kiev police have started an inspection of the permits of residence of Jewish musicians performing at restaurants and various places of entertainment.

MEASURE AGAINST SHECHITA.

An Anti-Shechita bill has been recently introduced in the Douma, which has aroused much alarm not only among the Jewish communal workers of St. Petersburg, but also the Mohammedans living in the Russian domain, as they are by virtue of their religious practices also affected by the bill. The Mohammedan faction in the Douma is making a strong attack on the measure and there is doubt whether the government will be willing to embitter its Mohammedan subjects for the sake of inflicting another restriction against the Jews.

JEWS AND THE ARMY.

The Russian Nobles have made a representation to the government in which they demand the exclusion of the Jews from the Russian army, which apparently is receiving the support of the chief of the general staff. This new method of Jew baiting on the part of the aristocracy has aroused criticism in various circles. Recently a strong article in one of the leading papers appeared, calling attention to the heroism displayed by the Jews in the last two Russian wars and denying the alleged revolutionary activity of Jewish soldiers.

BEILIS' DEFENDER.

Advocate Margolin Expelled from the Bar.

On April 4 the general meeting of the Departments of the High Court of Kiev, after a somewhat stormy discussion, rejected, by 17 votes to 11, Advocate Margolin's appeal against the decision of the court striking him off the roll of the bar on the ground that he made a journey to Kharkov in connection with the Beilis case for the purpuse of obtaining an interview with Vera Tcheberyak. Several judges considered the decision of the court to be absolutely unjustified, while others, though of the opinion that M. Margolin acted wrongly in traveling to Kharkov, considered the sentence too severe and proposed to exclude him from the bar for the term of one year.

The latest member of the bar to be prosecuted for his interest in the Beilis case is Advocate Wilensky, who is charged with having received at his residence, at the time of the trial, MM. Brazul-Brushkovsky, Margolin and Krassovsky, and two of the expert witnesses, Professors Pavloff and Troitsky.

ANNIVERSARY OF KISHINEFF.

With solemn ceremony and worship, the Jewish community of Kishineff marked the eleventh anniversary of the anti-Jewish massacre in that city. The massacre took place April 3, 1903 (Russian calendar), and was the beginning of a series of pogroms throughout Russia. Forty-eight Jews were killed and several hundred were wounded. Prayers for the martyred dead were recited in all the synagogues in the city and a procession of Jews marched to the cemetery where are the graves of the massacred, as well as the resting place of many scrolls of the law destroyed during the massacre.

THE VALUE OF A JEW.

What the South-Russian Metallurgie Company has failed to achieve has been forced on the Russian Cabinet by foreign financiers. The company applied for permission to elect a Jew on the management of the company and received a categorical refusal. The company then represented to the Cabinet that it was in need of a loan of ten million roubles and that the foreign capitalists who were in a position to advance the money had declined to do so until one Jew at least had been given a position on the management. The Cabinet reconsidered the matter, and permitted the company to invite a Jew to join the managing body.

THE EXCLUSION OF JEWS FROM LEGAL PROFESSION.

The Russian minister of justice, M. Tcheglovitov, has refused to consider the many petitions that have reached him from various legal organizations in behalf of the Jewish advocates who have been excluded from practicing their profession by an arbitrary law, passed last year. Even the efforts of the Jewish deputies, who received the assistance of sixty-three other deputies in this matter, proved of no avail.

Tragic scenes were witnessed in Odessa, where of a hundred and twenty-two Jewish advocates, only three were authorized under the new regulations to conduct cases. The disappointed Jews included many old, prominent lawyers who learned of their misfortune with deep grief.

NEW MARRANOS IN RUSSIA.

Converts to Be Watched.

The governor of Kharkoff has issued a circular ordering the police to keep a strict watch on the mode of life of Jewish converts to Christianity, and report to him whether the converts observed their new religion. In his circular he stated that a suspicion existed that the converted Jews remained true to their former faith, and only nominally changed their religion for the sake of obtaining equal rights. The Archbishop of Odessa has issued a circular expressing similar doubts as to the attachment of converted Jews to their new creed, and directing that Jewish applicants for conversion shall be tested for six months before their request is granted.

SCIENCE IN FETTERS.

How Russia is Being Deprived of Her Leading Scholars.

In the course of a Duma debate on the Government's proposal to found a special Agricultural Institute for the North-Western provinces, M. Roditcheff (Cadet) vigorously attacked M. Kasso's educational policy.

"It is easy," he said, "to decree the establishment of a higher Agricultural Institute; but such an institution needs professors. Now have the necessary conditions been created in the country for securing a supply of teachers? Have you already forgotten that the chair of physics at Moscow University was taken away from a great scientist of European reputation and entrusted to a Land Captain? The most pressing necessity for the present is to restore in Russia the possibility of superior instruction and scientific work at the Universities. I heartily cheered the speech delivered by the Minister of Education at the opening of the French Institute in St. Petersburg, when we welcomed free scientific research. It turns out, however, that the Minister of Education is an advocate of free research only in the French language and only for France, while at home he advocates the free, unchecked, and shameless coercion of the scientific forces of Russia. How is science to prosper when, under the plea of benefiting instruction, prominent savants are transferred to places where they cannot instruct? Do you think it is easy to find scientists and scholars when they are treated as Professor Grimm was treated?

"Remember that in the first place it is necessary to bring back to Russia those scientists whom the Minister of Education, whose very name stands for indecency, has expelled from the Russian Universities."

M. Roditcheff's speech was repeatedly interrupted by the Right, whose leader, M. Zamyslovsky, was so obstreperous that he had to be excluded from the Duma for two sittings.

The New Forces at Work in Israel

(An Address Delivered by Rabbi Dr. D. E. Hillel Kauvar, before the Denver Lodge 171, I. O. B. B., March 8, 1914)

In a Yiddish drama called "Die orshim" ("The Heirs"), the playright, Sholom Ash, pictures a Jewish ome, typical, somewhat, of the twenti-h century. In that home, divided gainst itself, two religions were strug-ling for supremacy—the religion of the ather's fathers and the new-fangled aith of the children.

The father is a banker. His heart is oined into gold. His business is all in ll to him. His Judaism played little art in his life. He had set for him-elf the one aim, the summum bonum of is life—the making of money. Jewish deals, the heritage, the Yerusha from is father's he bargained away for suc-essful deals. If asked to describe his eligion, he might have characterized or aricatured it in the clever phrase of Dr. Emil G. Hirsch as a "money-theism." And because his whole heart and soul were centered in the race for gold, he ad no time for his children. Their wel-are was not his concern. He cared as ittle for their future as he was mind-ul of his past, typied by his old father, iving his lonely life, shut in a room of he spacious mansion alone with his dreams, his ideals, his father's God.

In the religionless atmosphere of the banker's home his little girl grew up. Her Christian nurse was father, mother and teacher to her. Now, scratch a Christian and you will find a missionary. And the nurse played the part of a missionary to the child, a coming Mother n Israel. Knowing nothing of Judaism, her own faith, Christianity, the religion of the majority, appealed to her. Blossoming forth into womanhood, she falls in love with a Christian youth, and to satisfy his folks, she is willing to accept his religion. Boastfully she proclaims herself a Christian from conviction. Her father is shocked! He can understand the philosophy of Shemad, Conversion. It is all right for money, for a career; but from conviction, this is beyond his comprehension. The story is told of a Meshumed who once said that he became a Christian from conviction; he was convinced that he would never become a professor at the university unless he became an apostate and accepted the dominant faith. The old banker can understand no other convictions; his daughter's decision is sheer madness. Then she turns upon her father, charging him with his responsibility, in the stinging rebuke: "You have made a Christian of me. Have you taught me a better religion? This house is empty, stripped of all spirituality, barren of ideals. Shall I accept Judaism, my grandfather's religion? Look at the recluse; his room is his world. He does not eat with us, he wants kosher. He shrouds himself in his tallith, praying morning, noon and night, dead to the world!' In your house the Jewish God is dead. I leave you!"

And the old grandfather had also become discontented with the anomalous conditions round about him. He has been watching and studying and his heart rebels against remaining longer in a home that has become a stepping stone to the church. He will rather die a beggar in the streets, or pass his lingering days in a Moshov Zekenim than eat of his son's bounty. This heroic decision to sacrifice convenience and comfort for convictions appeals to the chivalry of the young woman. For the first time in her life she is attracted to the old man. She admires his heroism, she plies him with a thousand questions concerning the centuries old heritage named Judaism. Studying and thinking, she gets a glimpse of the beauty, the strength, the sweetness, the nobility of the grandfather's ideals. She that walked in darkness saw a new light. In doubt as to her future course, she confides in her brother, who passes judgment upon her lover's religion. Mercilessly he covers the sham, the mockery, the hollowness of the pretended idealism of the dominant daughter. Religion, whose followers have love upon their lips and hatred in their hearts. Because of Russia's injustice, he became a revolutionist. Side by side with his Christian brothers, he fought for Russia's freedom, and his tragic experience has taught him that the Christian will call you brother when he needs you and then he will turn on you, trample you underfoot, and hunt you like some wild beast of the forest. More than that, he opens her eyes to the new awakening in the household of Israel, the spiritual rebirth of the Jew, the new Jewish forces at work in the world. Her slumbering idealism is roused up; her heart is touched for her ancient people; her enthusiasm is kindled by their age-long struggle against the world's unreasoning hatred. At once she discovers new beauty, a new meaning in the grandfather's old-fashioned faith. Until now she was a Jewess by the mere accident of birth, and henceforth she will remain a Jewess from choice. She and her grandfather are "Die Yorshim," "The Heirs" of the patriarchs and prophets, poets and philosophers, saints and sages, martyrs and heroes. Gladly she joins her people; their God is her God; from now on she will march onward with the heroes of her people, the immortals of history.

In a measure this drama portrays the changed and changing conditions in the camp of Israel. Everywhere we see the signs of an awakening of our slumbering spiritual forces. Long enough have we been lulled into the belief that our "mission" is to ape the ways of our neighbors. Just one concrete illustration. Would the Jews pray without hats in their synagogue if our neighbors were to pray with hats on! For a century and more we have acted on the theory that we have nothing to teach the world. When we hear a word about the Bible in a Jewish pulpit, we hear what the latest non-Jewish commentators and critics tell us. Our views of Judaism, of our history, of our people, we borrow from the Goyim, we have little love for anything Jewish. We were neglecting our Yerusho, our spiritual heritage. We were indifferent to our past, unmindful of our future. Unconsciously we played the part of the boy in the Bible story of Elisha. For nineteen centuries the world diagnosed incorrectly the Jewish malady and pronounced the Jew dead. And for nineteen centuries, while the world was busy building a monument for the dead Jews, the report of our death, to borrow Mark Twain's familiar phrase, "was very much exaggerated." Nevertheless, the modern Gehazis, the would-be prophets in Israel, ignorantly re-echoed the refrain, the child Israel is dead. Then began the deadening process in our own camp. For more than three generations, the Era of Death, in Israel's history, had full sway. We live in a new day, a glorious day was the party cry of a dying cause, and we need no longer be swayed by the Ghetto Judaism.

The laws of the Bible were characterized as obsolete, while the Talmud, Israel's second Bible, was branded as a dead book. Hebrew, our sacred tongue, was spoken of as a dead language; there was no room for the language of our fathers in the text book of the school, or the prayer book of the synagogue. We were dead to the land of Israel, the cradle of Judaism. It was Mr. Samuel Strauss who once said that as a boy he attended an American synagogue, where he was taught that in this enlightened age, the Jew need no longer remember Jerusalem, or consider Zion his chief joy. However, as he grew up and read his Bible he discovered that our prophets weep for Zion, that our poets and psalmists sing of Zion, and he wondered why his prayer book has not a word of Zion. Then he knew that one book is defective, inaccurate, and making his choice between his American prayer book and the Jewish Bible, he decided to stick to the philosophy and theology of the Bible. What we need, he said, is not Reformation of Judaism but Information in Israel. Not yet informed, we were dead to the law, Israel's proudest possession. And the children growing up in Jewish homes that were stripped of spirituality, barren of ideals, imagined that the Jewish faith was bankrupt. Openly, without the slightest compunctions of conscience, they voiced the fear that the Jewish God was dead. He was dead to them.

Now, the God of Israel be praised, there is a stirring of dry bones; the valley of desolation is transformed before our very eyes into a fragrant garden, the Jew is like unto a tree that once more blooms and blossoms and is filling the face of the earth with fruit. There are new forces at work in Israel, new agencies called into action, that spell, in my humble judgment, a new hope for Judaism transforming Israel's pitiful present into the promising more glorious future. One of the most encouraging signs of the present day is the new enthusiasm for things Jewish, manifested by the young Jew. It is noticeable everywhere. The Jewish youth is awake. Our young men are moved by the appeal sounded in the name of our religion, our history, our common heritage. You can see this awakened loyalty for things Jewish in our American colleges. The Jewish students are filled with a new pride in their past. They respond to every Jewish call. Not so long ago and you could not find two Jewish students talking together on any college campus. They were afraid that even a casual conversation might give them away as Jews. To-day there are Jewish clubs and fraternities like the Menorah Society and the Zeta Betha Thau organization that hold their meetings openly and boldly, even defiantly to discuss Jewish questions. They are not afraid, neither are they ashamed. This is a healthy sign. For the Jewish university students are the barometers of the Jew. Judge Mack once said that the Menorah Society is the most hopeful thing in the life of American Israel. And we might say the same of the Young Israel and the Young Judaea movements that are winning back for us the young Jew, and the same signs are made manifest in Europe. In our universities abroad it is still unpopular to be a Jew. Nevertheless, the Jewish youth flies the Jewish flag with a courage that proclaims a loyal love and sincere conviction. In Germany there was held recently a Shomre Shabbos convention and the greatest enthusiasm for the Shabbos ideal was voiced by the young Jew. During the past year the Jewish youth of Italy gathered to voice their faith in their people's future and the Jews, the world over, caught their optimism and rejoiced with them. Let the young Jew show his enthusiasm for all things that belong to his people, let him live loyal to his religion and make sacrifices for his ideals and indeed there is hope for the Jew. In every phase of life it is the old man's world no longer. In the Jewish world the young man always had his chance. He was always welcomed in the synagogue. Many a precious law ordained in the much misunderstood Shulchan Aruch was carried out in the same beautiful ceremony at home or symbol in the synagogue, all for the sake of the child. And we rejoice to know that the Jewish child is awake—awake to the need of Jewish culture. He responds to the sweet influence of Israel's holy ideals, lives the life that is Jewish.

Next to the awakening of the Jewish youth I would single out our love for Jewish learnings. At all times, learning was the patent of nobility for the Jew, and yet, but a generation ago, and we were despairing of the Jewish sciences. They were being crowded out by the public school education, the college courses, the university training. Now, however, in every large university, there are chairs for Jewish learning and literature. It is a commonplace to have a professorship in Hebrew. Some day, perhaps, some public-spirited Jew of Colorado may endow a chair for Jewish history or literature in one of our state universities.

Once upon a time we were satisfied with Sunday schools, now we want more than that. We recognize, of course, the good they do. Something is better than nothing. But do you not realize how inadequate a Sunday school Jewish education really is! In the training of two hours a week can you hope to influence twenty-four hours a day. Even the public school with its splendid facilities, its perfect equipment, ideal text books, trained teachers and long hours does not graduate perfect scholars. What can you expect from poorly built class room, text books that are antiquated and opportunities that are limited? No wonder that the generation trained under such inhospitable auspices was being estranged from everything Jewish. A once-a-week-school-Judaism starves the soul of the Jewish child. Fortunately the American Jew is no longer satisfied with a Sunday school; he wants a daily Jewish school. Hardly a week passes by and some new Hebrew school or Talmud Torah is dedicated. There is a change for the better in our attitude to Jewish learning. A few weeks ago Mr. Jacob H. Schiff attended an annual meeting of the Brownsville Talmud Torah and he rejoiced to see the new Jewish life in that splendid community as a result of this spiritual center in their midst. At the annual meeting of Uptown Talmud Torah Judge Rosalsky said that Talmud Torahs are preventive institutions. Build more Talmud Torahs and you will not need a Hawthorne School (a Jewish school near the city of New York similar to our Golden Industrial School). Hebrew is no longer put down as a dead language. There is even a Hebrew Speaking Society in our own city. It is still fashionable in some quarters to sneer at the Talmud; but the remarkable thing is that men who cannot read the Talmud in the original are the ones most ready to fling stones at it. But even the Talmud is being treated with a great deal of reverence. It was Reuchlin who once explained that burning the Talmud is not one-half as profitable as studying it. Fire is a poor argument when matched against its indestructible ideals, its unanswerable logic. Happily, the same forces that once organized mobs to burn the Talmud now welcome chairs for the study of it in their seminaries and schools. Even the seminary at the Vatican has its courses in Rabbinic literature; and the love of learning that was dormant in many a Jewish heart is now a waking power. For this reason I blush with shame when I take up the American Jewish Year Book and find that only thirty-three Jewish families in Denver are interested in Jewish literature. The $3 a year membership dues paid to the Jewish Publication Society of America is not charity! A member gets more than his money's worth in books during the year. For it is well to remember that Jewish learning is like a wondrous stream that makes fertile with ideas every Jewish community where its blessed waters flow.

Some one defined education or learning as a feeling that cannot be bought or sold. Learning, if I may be pardoned the slang, is an "eye opener," and the new Jewish learning has opened our eyes to the fact that there are new forces at work in the Jewish world. Some of these forces are best exemplified in Palestine, "the historic cradle of our race." There we see the new physical forces that are changing the Jew in Eretz Yisroel you behold, in many respects, the ideal Jew. Reared on the sacred soil, he is getting back some of the Maccabean spirit. He is no longer a coward; his back is bent no more; he can defend himself if need be. That the ideal Jew was a student, a lover of books, we all know. That he can also be a farmer we have to be told; some in our own midst are sceptical of his ability in agriculture. But the colonies that are springing up on our old Fatherland are more convincing than the strongest arguments. Men who have never visited Palestine tell us it is a desert land; but men who are trained students of agriculture, like the scientist Aaronsohn, the discoverer of the wild wheat, say that it can be what it once was, a land flowing with milk and honey. "You are a Zionist," said Dr. Klausner, the Hebrew journalist and editor of the Hashiloach, to Dr. Magnes, whom he met in the Holy Land a few years ago, "and you see all things with the eyes of an optimist. But Mr. Strauss is a practical American business man, what does he think of Palestine?" and Dr. Magnes replied, "These are his exact words: 'They are singing in the land of Israel. Wherever I came I heard Zion's songs from the lips of young and old; and wherever there is singing there is life.'"

I need not tell you what Zionism stands for. There are as many varieties of Zionism as there are men. There is a religious Zionism that still says, "From Zion must come the law, even as the prophets thundered their messages upon its hills." This Zionism is more than two thousand years young. Some there are who cling to this Jewish hope for cultural reasons. With the birth of modern Zionism came the new renaissance of the Hebrew language. Professor Franz Oppenheimer, who is visiting America these days, said recently: "Whoever behold the Renaissance of this race of sorrows—these steel-hearted men, these blooming young women, and above all, these vigorous, radiant children; whoever hears with his own ears the Holy Language, dead these two thousand years, again alive as the language of the home, the street, the school and of the children's games, he will believe that a withered staff can blossom into a fruitful tree."

Again there are Jews who want a home of their own. They are the political Zionists who are anxious that the rights of the Jew be protected by a Jewish country. The Jew wants Jewish ambassadors all its own. Then there are also the sentimental Jews, who love Palestine because the blood of our heroes have made red its rivers and the bones of our martyrs have whitened its soil. Finally, there are the Jews who are the practical Zionists, because they want to give a home to millions of homeless Jews. They feel the kinship that links Jew to Jew; they understand that all Jews are brothers. And this feeling of Jewish solidarity is gaining ground. We want to forget our Jewish hatreds, our Jewish prejudices, our Semitic anti-semitism. What the Denver Central Jewish Council tries to do for our city—to cement the different elements in our community, to unite the various strands in our midst, to usher in the new era of Jewish brotherhood, the Zionist movement has attempted on a larger, world-wide scale and achieved wondrous results. Zionism bids every Jew the world over be a brother to every other Jew. Once this Zionist movement was tabooed in this country. The Jewish Publication Society of America for years refused to publish a single book or essay on Zionism. It was called a Russian movement and some declaimed against it as un-American. To-day men like the philanthropist Strauss and the people's attorney, Brandeis, splendid citizens of America, publicly join its forces. Even Mr. Jacob H. Schiff, the prince of American philanthropists, speaks kindly of the Zionist movement. Though not yet a Zionist, he admits in a recent address, printed in the February issue of the B'nai B'rith News, that the Zionist movement "has quickened the efforts to rehabilitate Palestine," that "it took hold of the Jew of every shade of belief and unbelief," bringing "under its banner old and young;" that it "awoke a new Jewish consicousness and self-respect;" that it has become a "unifying force" in Israel. Zionism is oft spoken of as a plea for the past and a hope for the future. It is more than that. It brings a message for the living present, telling the children of Israel that they must be heroes, loyal to our holy ideals. In the words of the immortal leader, Theodore Herzl, a paraphrase by the way of an old Jewish thought, Zionism is the call to the Jew to return to Judaism. Before there must be a return of Israel to his God.

The finest evidence of the new forces at work in Israel is the religious awakening the world over. What is the meaning of the attempt to bring together, from every corner of the globe, the leaders of Judaism into conference, convention and congress, but this: that the lovers of Judaism are planning for the future of our faith and uniting their strength for the conquest of the Jewish heart. Nothing gladdens the weary heart of Israel more than a Kattowitz conference in Europe or a United Synagogue Convention in America. Loyalty to Judaism there always was; but it was a silent loyalty. At best our voice was heard within the four cubits of the home. Now our teachers and leaders come out into the open; they lift their voices like a trumpet and their message is: "We need not be ashamed of the religion of our fathers. It can still save the world." And if the remarkable achievement of the new Jewish translation of the Bible into English by a board of editors, representative of every phase of life in American Israel so suggestive of "Catholic Israel" scattered everywhere, has any message for us, it is that no matter what our individual differences be, we must all work for one purpose as Dr. Schechter, the president of the Jewish Theological Seminary, "the Nestor of international Jewish savants," said, "that the Torah or the Sacred Writ, should not be forgotten from Israel."

Our sages tell us again and again that Judaism may be symboled forth by wheat. The world can get along without flowers; it must have wheat. The world can do without the culture of the Germans, or the sculpture of the Greeks; it cannot do without the religion of the Jew. But like unto the wheat, Judaism must be sown. Ours is the privilege to plant our truth into the lives of our children. There is a story told of the Pious Pinchas ben Yoir, that two strangers once accepted his hospitality over night and when they departed in the morning they left behind them two sacks of grain. As the guests were unknown to him, he could not restore it to them, so he sowed the corn and it prospered. For six consecutive seasons he reaped rich harvests. One day he accidentally came across his guests and reminded them of the long forgotten sacks and urged them to come and get their corn. "Our corn," said they. "why, they must be rotten and worthless by now." "Yes," he replied; "corn kept in sacks rots away; planted in the soil it ripens and blesses the planter with rich harvests."

Long enough have we kept our Judaism in sacks; we have labeled the sacks, "our grandfather's Judaism," "our mother's religion," "Ghetto customs," "oriental synagogues," and we have neglected our precious treasures. And because we were indifferent to our father's faith, our children were slipping away from us. Now we must plant our Judaism. We must tell our children that they are the Yorshim. It is for them to reap the spiritual harvests of the seeds sown by our sires. Let the new forces at work in Israel become facts for us. Translate the new tendencies in the camp of Israel into deeds. Then will our homes become in very truth sanctuaries in miniature; our synagogues Jewish in aspiration, in ceremonial, in doctrine; our Judaism a "living flame," our lives will be holy, divine.

We have a wondrous history. It tells us of suffering, of struggle, of persistent survival. We have taught the world the meaning and the moral significance of religion. "The call of America, the call of the world to the Jew is to justify his Judaism." To the founder of our faith, Abraham, came the command, Veheyeh Berocho, Be thou a blessing and we the children of the patriarchs the countrymen of the prophets, the heirs of heroic, immortal Israel can only then be a blessing when Judaism, the religion of our fathers, is handed forward as the heritage of our children.

FOREIGN JEWS IN TURKEY.

"Aurore" reports that the Turkish government has decided to make it much easier for foreign Jews, who come to Turkey for the purpose of settling there, to obtain the right of citizenship. This new attitude of the Turkish government can be greeted only with joy. Even if it was not caused by a feeling of justice only, but is to be ascribed to the need of gaining new citizens for the weakened country, every measure must be welcomed which opens a new fatherland to those who are enslaved elsewhere. The Jews should emigrate to Turkey, where they have been respected and honored for centuries. not in the hope of forming a separate nation, but with the determination to gain a new home and to become faithful citizens with equal rights in a country which accepts them as its own.

DISTINCTION TO THE CHIEF RABBI OF BULGARIA.

The King of Bulgaria conferred on Dr. M. Ehrenpreis, Chief Rabbi of Bulgaria, the cross of Commmander of the National Order of Civil Merit. In transmitting the insignia the chief of the King's private cabinet said that his Majesty had conferred this honor "as a token of his good will to you and in recognition of your faithful activity as the Chief Rabbi of Bulgaria and of all you have accomplished for our country and its cause."

A few days afterwards Dr. Ehrenpreis received the appointment of Chief Rabbit of Stockholm, Sweden, which came as a shock and surprise not only to the Jewish community but non-Jews also, for Dr. Ehrenpreis enjoyed the utmost esteem among Jews and Christians.

CRUCIFIXION NOT JEWS' DEED.

In a recent sermon Rev. Dr. Geo. Chalmers Richmond, Episcopal minister in Philadelphia, speaking on converting the Jews to Christianity, said the following:

"In both the Catholic and Protestant churches there is still a strong belief that Jesus was killed by the Jews. This, of course, is not so. There were Jews present, to be sure, when Jesus ascended the cross. There were Romans there, too, and the ancestors of many people whom I meet today.

"From what I know of Philadelphia I judge that some of our leading financiers and politicians can trace their ancestry back direct to some of those men of Jerusalem who stood consenting at Jesus' cross. And these men are not Jews, but corrupt and immoral citizens of Philadelphia and members of so-called Christian churches.

"Yet such are the men who contribute toward the work of converting the Jews to Christianity. Now this whole work of seeking to convert the Jews to the religion of Jesus as we find that religion confined in our modern churches, is all rot.

A MEMORIAL TO BENJAMIN DISRAELI.

It is proposed to erect at Aylesbury a statue of Benjamin Disraeli, who from 1847 to 1876 was a representative of the county of Buckinghamshire in Parliament. The Marquess of Lincolnshire is Chairman of the Executive Committee, and the project has received the support of Lord Rothschild, Lord Burnham, Viscount Hambleden, Lord Rosebery, Mr. Coningsby Disraeli, Mr. James Griffin, Mr. Leopold de Rothschild, Mr. H. L. W. Lawson, Mr. Alfred de Rothschild, Lord Cottesloe, Sir Arthur Liberty, Mr. Lionel de Rothschild, the Earl of Buckingshamshire, Lord Parmoor, and Mr. W. Baring Du Pre.

MAYOR MITCHELL ON JEWISH CITIZENS.

At the anniversary exercises of the Free Synagogue in New York, held recently, Mayor Mitchell was one of the principal speakers. In the course of his address he spoke of the Jewish citizen as follows:

"In the seven years of its life the Free Synagogue has come to occupy an important place in the life of this community. Its fine organization, with its uptown division at Carnegie Hall, its downtown branch on the east side, and the new branch in the Bronx, has done splendid work in impressing upon the minds of your young people the ideals of civic devotion and civic service.

"I say to you from my observation that there is no more vigorous force for progress in our city government than the public-spirited Jewish citizen. Here the Jew has his greatest opportunity. We are losing age-long racial consciousness that for centuries kept Judea apart from the national and community activities of the Western nations.

"In America the Jew has become primarily an American citizen and a Jew afterwards, and so, when it came to my hands to organize the city government, I sought out the men most fitted for the headship of the departments. Among those I selected were several Jews, but I selected them not as Jews, but as fine-spirited, able and vigorous men.

"Here is the door to the new leadership of the Jews in the promotion of civilization—the door to public service. The idealism, the sanity, the brilliance of the Jew are forces needed in our American life. I am glad that it has come about in my administration that men such as Goldwater and Moskowitz are taking the part of leaders in the city government.

"It is in the building up of the civic idealism of the young Jewish men and women of New York that the Free Synagogue is making a priceless contribution to the welfare of the city.

"We cannot overestimate the value to us of the contribution which Jews may make to our national treasury of ideals. We are carrying the conscience of the church and the synagogue out into the affairs of our common life. This is the new spirit of the last decade."

SPANO-JEWISH CONGRESS.

Spain is making preparations to celebrate on a grand scale a Cervantes Jubilee in 1916. The "Vossische Zeitung" publishes the following about it:

The Cervantes Jubilee is to assume the form of a pan-Spanish character and all Spanish speaking peoples in the old and new world are to take part in it. Several prominent Spanish publicists like Dr. Pulido, Saturnino Jimenez, Calvo Iriarte and others have now suggested that the Spano-Jewish communities abroad, the descendants of the Jews who were expelled from Spain, who to-day still speak the historical language of Cervantes, should be invited to participate in the jubilee. These publicists state that the times of religious fanaticism are past and Spain is willing to atone and to again open her arms lovingly to the children who were once cast out. These advances have not been without success. From Morocco, Algeria, Egypt, Minor Asia, Turkey and the Balkan lands, also from England and Holland, letters of acceptance are arriving from prominent Sephardim, as the descendants of the Spanish Jews are called. Expression has also been given to the thought of connecting with the Cervantes celebration a Spano-Jewish congress, the sessions of which should be held in the old synagogue at Toledo.

JEWS ATTACKED IN PERSIA.

The Jewish quarter at Kazerun (in the Province of Fars), has been plundered by Persians, who abducted five Jews. Their captors demand a large sum for their release.

BULGARIAN GOVERNMENT FAVORS JEWS.

The Government of Bulgaria has just taken a step which will give great satisfaction to the Jews in that country. It has decided that instruction in Hebrew and the Jewish religion shall be made compulsory for all Jewish children who attend the State schools, and it is about to propose to Parliament that schools maintained by Jewish communities shall henceforth receive government grants. At present these schools receive subsidies only from municipalities.

B'NAI B'RITH'S GOOD WORK.

The Order of B'nai B'rith has been the ministering angel to many of the Eleemosynary institutions of the country. It first threw its protecting arm about the orphan and made him feel the warm touch of its sympathetic soul. It then gave of its substance to aid the work of the National Hospital for Consumptives at Denver. It has done good work in times of emergency when the hand of the oppressor was hard upon the Jews. Then its good offices were called into requisition and no organization was more active in alleviating the distress of the hunted and dogged Russian Jew than the Order B'nai B'rith. When the cry of starvation comes up to us from remote corners of the earth, the B'nai B'rith has always answered that cry. When fire and desolation have played havoc with house and home of the poor Jews the exchequer of the B'nai B'rith was called on to do its share in aiding in the hour of dire calamity. In this way it has become the almoner of all worthy causes. Of course we have not begun to enumerate the many avenues of activity in which the Order B'nai B'rith has been helpful and operative; suffice it to say that it has never turned a deaf ear when the cry of Jewish anguish was heard, and there have been instances in which other causes than Jewish causes were helped. Nor is the sphere of its usefulness bounded by merely helping and encouraging along charity lines. In recent years attempts have been made in many quarters to revive interest on the part of Jews in farming and agriculture. The charge is so frequently made against the Jew that he is a consumer and not a producer that whatever can be done to silence this charge, should be done. There is no more effectual way of doing this than for the Jew again to become a farmer. There are a number of agencies at work seeking this end. Among these agencies is the National Farm School. It is gratifying to note that at the recent meeting of the Executive Committee of the B'nai B'rith held in Chicago the following statement relative to the National Farm School was adopted and ordered transmitted to the lodges of the order: "The Executive Committee of the Constitution Grand Lodge I. O. B. B. regards the National Farm School as an important factor in the solution of the social, physical and economic problems that confront American Jewry. It, therefore, indorses and approves of the work of that school." Such an endorsement may ultimately mean pecuniary assistance from the various lodges and this is what it should mean. There can not be too many agencies at work co-operating with the National Farm School in its laudable endeavor to restore the Jew to the farm as in the early days of history.—Dr. T. Schanfarber in The Chicago Israelite.

JEWISH AND CHRISTIAN STUDENTS SEPARATED IN LEMBERG GYMNASIUM.

An extraordinary order was issued by the authorities of the State Gymnasium at Lemberg, Galicia. The effect of the order will be that henceforth Jewish students will be separated from the Christian students and be assigned to special "Jewish benches." Much indignation has been aroused among the Jewry of the city and it is proposed to to present a protest to the government.

THE AIMS AND PROBLEMS OF THE B'NAI B'RITH.

"Who is the Jew?" we must go to the Torah, Israel's heritage; we must go to all the wisdom of the past, to the fiercest battles of the ages, to the most thrilling martyrdom in history. The Jew is he who taught the world the conception of one fatherhood and one brotherhood. The Jew is he who stimulated in humanity a zeal and capacity of self-sacrifice for an ideal. The Jew is he who believes that God's covenant with Israel shall not be removed even though "the mountains shall depart and the hills shall be removed." The Jew, the helping Jew, the true Jew, is he who shares in the Jewish burdens, who feels for the Jewish shortcomings, who rejoices in the attainment of the Jewish hopes, and who helps every movement, every institution, which aims at raising his people to a higher and happier plane spiritually, morally and economically; and one of the great and world-wide institutions of such noble aims is the Inpendent Order B'nai B'rith, in behalf of which we appeal to every family of every position in this community.

OUR PART IN THIS LAND.

Judged by numbers, we are an infinitesimal part of this country's population. If we were spread proportionately over the continent's area and similarly if we were represented equably in all the various occupations and professions, one would scarcely know that we were here at all. We concentrate in the cities and we crowd certain trades or professions. The causes are manifold. The force that impels us is rarely of our own making. What time and circumstances have created time and circumstances will undo. The will to be agreeable to our neighbors cannot be questioned. We come here to stay. If we build up wealth through thrift and zeal and industry, it remains here as an asset of national riches. We bring with us a foreign tongue and foreign manners. But the environment which is so predominantly fixed acts as a leveller. The children whether born here or reared here are American in language, in character, in mode of life.

A writer in the Hibbert Journal who is apparently a college professor of the metropolis testifies to the part taken by the immigrant population of New York City in the upbuilding of the national energy, mental or physical. He admits that the influx of the alien may mean a modification of the assumed national type. He grants that the immigrants maintain a high birth-rate. But he emphatically denies that they are inferior in capacity for development. "The immigration authorities report venereal disease as rare among immigrants, who come quite generally from small towns. Their physical condition in other ways averages good. In mental capacity which of them is inferior? The German? The British, who are still a very large element? The Italian? The Jew? The Greek? The Scandinavian? The Slav? . . . It would be hard to name an inferior white race represented largely among our immigrants." "For some years," he continues, "I have had to do with the award of a number of collegiate scholarships among deserving youth graduating from public (free) high schools in this city. Nearly thirty candidates each year from among the finest pupils of more than a dozen great high schools are personally examined. Their physique has rather improved in the past ten years. Their wonderful mental alertness is confined to no race; the British stock shows scantily in the number—in part for lack of the qualifying poverty; but other races are well represented. College professors tell the same story of eager students of the immi-[illegible] races. The census shows that the [illegible] of immigrants are illiterate in a smaller percentage than the children of native whites—mainly because of more concentrated distribution. Their racial energy is indubitable. Capacity for absorption differs in degree, but exists in all."

When the misstatements of alarmist restrictionists are remembered, it is well to place this testimony on record. The Jewish population looms up large in New York. A million or more souls cannot all be blameless. But it is safe to say that the physically, mentally or morally deficient are the fewest. We are rather sensitive about our delinquents, more so than other elements of the general population. It serves probably a beneficent end that we should be so. It constitutes the measure of our own public opinion. It is an expression of what little authority we possess in directing those of us who are in need of correction. Lapses are met with in the best regulated households. Every people has its scapegraces. We have all of our rightful share. The criminals even after condign punishment is meted out to them are a source of disgrace to those near to them. They besmirch the fair name of the Jew. We lament the loosening of the bonds that unite parents and children. The home influence is on the wane, and the street associations do their worst. But all of that is a mere episode of short duration. It looms up large for the moment. But the general tone of American Jewry is in no wise affected. We still compare favorably with other elements of the population. We still can hold up the head erect and the brow high.

Among the first victims at Vera Cruz the other day there fell a Jewish lad, member of the United States navy. Many more there undoubtedly are enlisted in army and navy who are of our faith. And many more still will flock to the colors as volunteers to execute the President's orders for the vindication of our country's prestige. In joining with our fellow citizens in the hour of national endeavor we are doing no more than our bounden duty. We ask for no praise, for no slap on our back. But when the Jew generally speaking is inured to the ignominious slap on the face, he may be pardoned for directing public attention to his share in patriotism, to the part he willingly takes upon himself to uphold the dignity of this country. Whether as soldiers or sailors or as plain citizens in the pacific avocations, we Jews take rank with all others who make up this country's growing population and contribute our share to the upbuilding of the future American nation, to the developing of the great and rich resources of our land, to the improvement of our civilization, to the happiness of all. With brawn and brain we stand ready to do this country's work, that its task among the nations of the world be accomplished.

A SOUND COUNSEL.

A creditable pamphlet it is, the one published by the Intercollegiate Menorah Association. Whether as a statement of the nature and purposes of the Menorah movement or as a report of the work carried on by the general body or the constituent societies, it is lucid, dignified, and withal inspiring. There may still be a goodly number of Jewish college men who brought up in the mode that prevailed in the past misguidedly believe that the best policy is to "lie low," to make as little noise as possible about one's Jewish antecedents and just as noiselessly to disappear. But it is a sign of healthier conditions, of courage and manhood and of a desire to be Jews, that the Menorah movement has taken root in some thirty colleges and universities of this country. These Jewish young men (and young women), as you meet them face to face, show on the one hand the marvelous transformation of sons of immigrants into American gentlemen (and ladies), and on the other hand that fidelity to Judaism is consonant with Americanism.

It is likewise gratifying to note the support which the movement has received and is receiving at the hands of the college authorities. Really, it could not be but thus. College presidents have a great responsibility with the thousands of young people committed to their care. They naturally welcome any agency that will stiffen the backbone and build character. Coming as they do from different homes and strata of society with their varying traditions, the sane educator must ere long have recognized that the college atmosphere needs the fulcrum of a variety of influences to set the student straight and to turn him into a useful member of society. If the missionary with his sensational lingo and somewhat vulgar appeal can be turned to good purpose in warning college students off the path that leads downward, he is cheerfully given a hearing and a place on the university rostrum. Where the college is an unsectarian institution maintained by the people's money, theological teaching is out of the question, but student organizations to foster the religious spirit are wisely encouraged. It could not long escape the intelligence of the authorities that Jewish students could not be left to shift aimlessly, and that when an organization turned up which offered to take care of the spiritual life of the Jewish student it deserved generous support.

The support that was requisite was not of a financial kind. The wide and statesmanlike outlook of a few Jewish gentlemen took care of that end, nobly, thoroughly, manfully. But the moral support was tacitly or avowedly asked for and readily granted. The second part of the report makes pleasant reading. President Emeritus Eliot's address rightly occupies the first place. It is brimful with wise observation and offers sound counsel. "There are many universities in the world at which your race would not be welcome; there are some universities in the United States where your race would not be welcome." Alas, these words are but too true. He hopes for much out of the contact between members of different branches of Jewish students. It has not escaped the Christian's notice that the Jew is guilty of intolerance toward his brother-Jew. The great educator does not for a moment consider that Jewish success is to be paid with the price of ceasing to be a Jew. "The development of the power of the Jewish race in this country entirely within my remembrance has been most striking. How can it be furthered and promoted? What can you do for the strengthening of your race in this free land?"

President Eliot counsels education, the highest possible education for Jewish youth. Education in the ordinary understanding of the term, it may be granted, has always been cultivated by the Jew. Perhaps that it was a bit overdone. The training of the mental powers has not kept apace with the physical training. The tendency of the race to nervous affections to which the professor alludes has in no small measure been due to the excessive mental training. Hence it is with good reason that the eminent educator directs the attention of the Jewish student to the necessity of physical culture. The stunted body should be no measure of the trained mind. There should be an equilibrium between mental and physical training. "There is a certain physical decline or reduction in vitality, vigor, and stature, apparent in any large group of Jews, perhaps as a result of long physical hardships to which the race has been exposed. You can take active measures, wherever you live, to redeem the race from that situation by careful attention to the physique of the race; by attention, also, to the modes of life which develop the physique, for instance, the out-of-door habit. The race, it seems, is not sufficiently attentive to that mode of developing a hardy and vigorous population. Your race is sure to have the means of healthy and comfortable living in this country in the future. You have your choice, therefore, to make the great experiment in the physical development of the Jewish race in the next thirty years." Coupled with this exhortation is the advice for Jewish young men to enlist in the militia. "The Jewish race has for centuries not been permitted to bear arms, and it has not been a martial race, though thousands of years ago the Jews were an intensely martial race. . . . Wherever you settle to live, you should take an interest in that remnant of physical force which is essential to the preservation of peace and order in American cities."

A Jewish renaissance is here advocated by a Christian gentleman. Such a renaissance has been going on for the last decade or so in Europe where the conditions are far less favorable. The upbuilding of the Jewish physique, the straightening of the Jewish spine, the stiffening of his backbone in the most literal sense, will serve to show the great wrongs to which the Jewish race has in the past been subjected. Certainly, in this free land with its favorable opportunities the Jew should be glad to listen to this piece of wise counsel. And if the Menorah movement can be developed as an agency for bringing about this rejuvenation of the Jewish race in physique and mentality, the "community" will be well repaid for whatever assistance, financial and otherwise, it has seen fit to render it. Faithful Jews and able-bodied Jews, such should be the motto of Menorah activity. To keep the heart warm for Jewish interests, and the mind alert to the diverse elements of Jewish culture, and the body strong for perfecting the race in its service of humanity, will constitute a programme comprehensive in its scale and productive of most beneficent results. In the end it will make for peace with honor between the Jew and his neighbors. The world will respect that Jew who in splendid bodily strength and mental vigor will co-operate with all mankind in the improvement of the human race, who in a pride that is not vain-glorious but founded in honest work and endeavor will maintain Jewish individuality and with offense to none accentuate the Jewish contribution to the sum total of human culture and virtue and happiness.

CENTENARY OF EMANCIPATION OF THE DANISH JEWS.

Danmark Lodge No. 712 of Copenhagen published a beautiful memorial volume on the occasion of the 100th anniversary of the emancipation of the Jews of Denmark. It is to be regretted that the book is in the Danish language, which precludes the possibility of its being read by the Jews of the world. The book is replete with historical facts and data regarding the Jews, and aside from its literary merit is an ornament to any library. Much credit is due to Danmark Lodge for undertaking this important work.

PRO-JEWISH BILL.

Seventy-six Russian Deputies have introduced a Bill providing for the abolition of all restrictions against non-Christians in the legal profession in Russia.

OBITUARY.

Again District No. 4, is called upon to mourn the sudden departure of a faithful son and staunch supporter. Past Grand President, Wallace A. Wise, suddenly received the eternal summons at at the early age of forty-six, on Thursday, last, April 9th, 1914.

Scarcely six months ago, Dave Hirshberg, a pillar, in B'nai B'rith life on the coast, fell, a victim of an untimely call and now poor Wallace Wise, follows him to the realms of eternity. Different in temperament and decidedly contrasting in style and manner, their B'nai B'rith activity, ran to a great extent along parallel lines. Both, native Californians, served the District as President, at an early age; both continued to show an ardent devotion to its success after they retired from the chair; both died as members of the District Court and of the Library Committee, and the obsequies of both were splendid testimonials to the high esteem in which they were held by their friends and admirers.

In religious sentiment both incarnated the American Jew as he is expected to develop along the lines of American patriotism and Jewish piety. Their lives demonstrated beyond a doubt, that Americanism in its highest form and Judaism in its profoundest aspect may go hand in hand in perfect harmony.

When Brother Wise spoke, he impressed one, above all, with his deep sincerity, especially so when the subject was one affecting the Jewish people. He served during the year of the Kishineff horror and it goes without saying that he proved himself equal to exigencies of the hour. As a member of the Library Committee, expense was not considered by him, when it was a matter of obtaining a rare book for the enlightenment of the Jewish student.

Brother Wise was the office associate of Brother Lucius L. Solomons, the First Vice President of the Constitution Grand Lodge, ever since they both joined the legal profession. His loss is keenly felt by Brother Solomons.

The widow and son, both of whom the deceased idolized beyond measure, deserve our deepest sympathy. May they find consolation in the good name they inherited. May the earth rest lightly on poor Wallace. I. J. A.

OBITUARY.

On April 16, 1914, died David Cohen, a member of California Lodge, No. 163, San Francisco. He was buried by his Lodge Sunday, April 19th. Brother Cohen held no high office in the Grand Lodge and never aspired to one, yet he was one of those who by their fidelity and unremitting work contribute as much to the success of an institution such as ours as many who may shine by their sparkling qualities. To him our Order was something more than a mere aggregation of men. It stood for a holy cause and he considered himself a soldier in its ranks. He hardly ever missed a meeting of his Lodge and always looked forward to a session of the Grand Lodge as an epoch in his life. He was an intelligent sharer in the debates of that body and he could always be listened to with profit, for he knew his limitations and never ventured beyond them. He came to this city when he was four years old and received his education in our public schools.

David Cohen will always be remembered as a man of more than ordinary common sense, a sympathetic heart and of untiring devotion to the ideals of the Order to which he was wedded. May his soul rest in peace.

I. J. ASCHHEIM.

SON OF BEN B'RITH ONE OF VERA CRUZ VICTIMS.

Following the reading of a patriotic message of confidence, which was forwarded by the delegates of District Grand Lodge No. 7 in convention assembled, to President Wilson, at the sessions held recently in Shreveport, La., a delegation from Mobile brought to the attention of the convention the fact that the first American boy to give up his life in the conflict was a Mobile boy and the son of an old member of Beth Zur Lodge of Mobile, Ala. The convention then ordered the following message sent to the father:

"Nathan H. Frolichstein, Mobile, Ala.:

"District Grand Lodge No. 7, Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, in convention assembled, tenders to you and family its heartfelt sympathy, and prays that your sorrow may be tempered by the knowledge that your son, in giving up his life for our beloved country, brought undying honor to himself, his family and to every son of the covenant."

The B'nai B'rith Gold Medal

Letter of Acceptance by Dr. Stern

Appreciation by District Grand Lodge No. 9

Nice, February 15, 1914.

Highly Esteemed Grand President.

Dear Colleague and Brother: Not till today did I receive the information that you have awarded me this year's medal. This high distinction filled me with joy and pride. It is not only a recognition of my humble efforts but also a mark of honor for our beloved order. For my first teacher was my never to be forgotten noble friend, Benjamin Franklin Peixotto, who was Grand Saar of the Order B'nai B'rith, and the Order has pointed out to me aim and direction for my life's work; it has given me inspiration and courage to take up the fight for freedom and justice. The Order which is a practical school of idealism furnished me instruction, example and suggestion. In the Order I find the quickening springs of my strength. The possibility of the individual man to be a necessary factor in the historical development of progress depends upon the social expedient, and this expedient is formed by our Order, which establishes a new, fruitful principle of human progress and unity by welding together our coreligionists of all lands, not for the purpose of exclusion and to work against humanity, but to join in its endeavors.

Thus I become the humble instrument for conferring honor upon the Order.

And still another thought may have guided you. The medal may be intended to serve not merely as a recognition of my activity in the past, but also as an encouragement to continue the work in the future.

In that sense I accept the medal. As it honors the fighter, may it also prove a symbol for the victorious ending of the fight!

Accept highly esteemed Grand President and dear Brother, my sincerest thanks and my fraternal greeting.

Your faithfully devoted Brother,
DR. ADOLPHE STERN.

District Grand Lodge No. 9.

Bucharest, March 30, 1914.

Mr. Adolf Kraus, President of the Order B'nai B'rith, Chicago.

Highly Esteemed Brother President. The fact that the Executive Committee of the Order has awarded to our revered Grand President, Brother Dr. Adolphe Stern, the highest mark of distinction which the Order can bestow, the gold medal which until this time graced only the breast of the distinguished ex-president of your great country, is not only an honor for our Brother Grand President, but is also a sign of respect of extraordinary significance for us who are fortunate to have him at our head for nearly a whole generation.

This significance consists for us not only in the fact that this award expresses a pleasant worldwide recognition of the merits of our highly gifted and fully deserving leader, who has grown gray in the service of the noblest aspirations of humanity, but more so in the fact that this honor comes at a time when the demands which we have become accustomed to present to our leader have grown much greater and more pressing than ever before in consequence of the desperate fight which the Jews of Roumania must now carry on for human rights of the most elementary nature. We can give to our leader nothing more than a feeble, though determined following as an encouragement to bear the heavy burdens which the leadership imposes upon him. Now that the Executive Committee has demonstrated by this mark of honor its recognition of Brother Stern's activity it has materially strengthened his confidence in the ultimate success of his endeavors. For the honor shows that he can figure upon the aid of the Executive Committee. And the increased self-confidence of their leader is a gain of endless value for the Roumanian Jews. We can assure you of this fact from our own experience.

Accept therefore, most esteemed Brother President, our deepfelt thanks for awarding the gold medal to Brother Dr. Stern, and receive also the assurance, not for yourself who know our Grand President personally, but for the rest of the members of the Executive Committee, that, for the last forty years, Brother Dr. Adolphe Stern has been working bravely more than any other man for the rights of his coreligionists, putting aside all his own interests and disdaining all the ill-will of our antagonists. We, who faithfully stood by him during a great part of this long time are surely the right persons to declare that the Executive Committee could not have awarded the gold medal to a worthier man.

For the last three months our highly esteemed Grand President, Brother Dr. Stern has been living abroad, where, we need not specially emphasize it to you, he is not detained by considerations for his health. It is impossible to tell when he will return. This circumstance as well as the present political conditions of our country, which have caused the Roumanian Jews to unite in order to formulate their claims with the utmost energy, to be ready when the psychological moment arrives, make it advisable for us not to court great publicity for the celebration of the honor bestowed upon our Brother Grand President and in appreciation of the great deed of the Executive Committee. We postpone this public manifestation, which will bring new life to District No. 9, until the coming fall, which will bring us more peaceful and let us hope better times.

Until that time permit us, highly esteemed Brother President, to again thank you and the honored members of the Executive Committee for the great mark of honor which you have given to Brother Dr. Stern and which is also an honor for our District. We beg you to accept the assurance of our warm acknowledgement of your grand action.

RESOLUTIONS.

District Grand Lodge, No. 2, I. O. B. B., On Death of an Honored and Beloved Brother.

District Grand Lodge No. 2, I. O. B. B. mourns the death, on March 23, 1914, of who for a period of eleven years served with fidelity and zeal as treasurer of this district, relinquishing his trust only when the physical powers to continue its performance had departed.

Possessed of and bringing to the service of this District and into his daily life the Jewish spirit and principles which our Order inculcates, Brother Bloch was ever earnest, ever conscientious, in his private, public and charitable work.

Unto those who knew him best and were brought into most intimate contact with him, united with the highest appreciation of his rectitude and worth there remain the tenderest recollections of him as a friend.

It is ordered that this testimonial be placed upon the memorial page of the minutes of this meeting.

In addition to the two Jews already elected, the constituency of Bagdad has elected Sassoon Effendi, under-secretary of state at the Ministry of Commerce, as member of that city.

HONORS TO DR. A. L. METZ.

Among the Jewish citizens of New Orleans few deserve greater respect than Dr. A. L. Metz, member of Gulf Lodge No. 221 of New Orleans and professor of chemistry at the University of Louisiana. His labors for the benefit of humanity, particularly his activity in securing a pure milk supply, attracted the attention of the National Institute of Social Sciences and he was selected as one of three to whom medals for distinguished services rendered to humanity are to be presented.

PROFESSOR SOMBART ON JEWS.

Professor Sombart has delivered an address on Jews at St. Petersburg in which he spoke of the economic losses sustained by Spain and Portugal through the exile of the Jews and the rise of other European countries and America as a result of the influx of our brethren. He also claimed the Jews as the founders of the Stock Exchanges and of the idea of "credit."

INDUSTRIAL REMOVAL OFFICE.

Streams are shaped by their tributaries. The standing of the different elements of the American population in their relation to the commonwealth depends to a great extent upon the new waves of immigration which flow towards each element as an addition to its own strength and influence. The new waves of immigration which each element receives of its class extend the boundary line of its endeavor, add to the force of its achievements and help to shape the reputation of the entire element. Whatever each element is doing for the speedy Americanization of the new waves of immigration of its own class, it is doing it for its own benefit as well as for the interest of the entire commonwealth.

Whatever the American Jews are doing for the betterment of the conditions of the Jewish immigrants, they, too, are doing it essentially for themselves as well as for the entire country. It is to the interest of the American Jews as citizens of the American republic and as part of the Jewish people to see to it that the Jewish immigrants find the right opportunities to establish themselves in their new surroundings; that they are not handicapped by too many obstacles in their endeavors to fit themselves into proper environments, where they can find the best chances for economic development and where they can rise as quickly as possible to the standard of American living. The standing of the American Jews as an element of the American population is influenced to a great extent by the new waves of Jewish immigration. These immigrants help to shape our reputation in our relation to the American commonwealth; they wield their influence upon the development of the free institutions of our country and the stability of our communal institutions, also depends to a great extent upon the development of these new arrivals of our class.

One of the great problems of immigration is the urban congestion in the cities of the Atlantic coast. The concentration and its consequent overcrowding of immigrants in the large cities of the country retards their Americanization, and hinders them from adopting the American standard of living. Their low economic condition keeps them down in the slums and does not permit them to rise to the position of independent American citizenship. The bulk of the new Jewish immigrants is suffering from these evils. The masses of these new arrivals are forming new Ghettos in all the great centers of our population, Ghettos which are out of place in this land of light and liberty and the existence of which in our midst brings the blush of shame to every loyal American Jew. Can the American Jews, who have a reputation to live up to, countenance such a degrading state of affairs? First of all we must break up these Ghettos. We must break up the congested masses and remove them from the points of concentration. We must distribute as many of them as possible in the smaller cities of the different states of our wide land. We must direct as many of our laborers as possible to places where they can easier find remunerative employment, and we must lead those who are fit and willing to till the soil to agricultural districts, where they can engage in farming with a good prospect for ultimate success. This is, of course, a costly undertaking, but it must be done if we want to save the good name of American Israel.

And we are therefore glad to know that the Industrial Removal Office of New York is doing this blessed work. In the thirteen years of its existence the Industrial Removal Office has succeeded in sending out 75,000 Jews from New York, the worst center of congestion, and in satisfactorily placing them in cities and towns in every state of the Union. The Removal Office maintains a Bureau of Information where valuable practical advice is given to Jewish tradesmen, enabling them to locate in other sections of the country. Many of these were helped to become farmers and they have successfully worked their way to prosperity and independence.

The Independent Order B'nai B'rith is heart and soul with the Industrial Removal Office, the B'nai B'rith lodges are intimately associated with this work and we are always ready to lend a helping hand to such a praiseworthy endeavor.

Any religion that is worth the name, must be predicated upon the fundamental fact of immortality.

"Hebrew Classics" and Jewish Literature

By Dr. Max L. Margolis

Written for the B'nai B'rith News.

It is not my intention to go over the ground covered by a learned controversy printed some years ago in a Jewish scientific magazine as to whether our literature should be designated as Hebrew or Jewish. But a few remarks without pretense to formality or official stamp may not be amiss at a time when the subject may be expected to come to the notice of the public.

It should be clear at the outset that there is a differnce between literature and things written or printed. A scrap of printed matter picked up on the street constituting a shred from a daily newspaper may have reference to a matter of national or international moment or be part of a large commercial advertisement. Such a scrap coming from antiquity and dug out of a mound of ruins would prove invaluable to the historian or archaeologist; fragmentary as such scraps are, they are important historical documents; but documents are not yet literature. The label of a wine jar found in the cellars of what once was a royal palace in Palestine may serve to corroborate Isaiah's opinion of the drunkards of Samaria. But a wine label is no more literature when it comes from ancient times than a discarded champagne label in the refuse of a modern city. Deeds of sale, letters private and diplomatic, scrawls on rocks and inscriptions on tombstones, all are of extreme value to the antiquarian and historian; but the student of literature can afford to ignore them.

A piece of literature may be ephemeral or lasting in its influence, may be good or bad or indifferent, but it is literature, provided that it has literary form and that its matter is original. Of course, the forms of literature differ. The sagas of hoary antiquity and the modern novel may be antipodal. But both have in common the artistic construction. A text-book on history or biology which is devoid of artistic form has no place in the world's literature, though it belongs into a library. But there are great masterpieces of historical writing which we read not solely with a view to obtaining information or instruction but also with pleasure. The less exact sometimes such a work is, the more antiquated it is from the point of view of historical facts, the more it partakes of permanent value if only there is literary finish and the display of originality. We read Herodotus and Thucydides and Livy principally as literary productions. We read them as literature, not as history. A great movement of thought creates its own literary forms and standards. Literature naturally goes with language which is its vehicle of expression. But language is not a sufficient landmark in itself. Where a people learns either simultaneously or successively to use diverse languages, there is still a unit of literary work. Literatures are national and universal. still a piece of literature is national first. The nation is the measure of cultural activity and literature is one form in which culture expresses itself. A religious movement may create its own literature and is own literary forms. If national unit and religious unit coincide, well and good. If not, nationality steps out as a delineator of literary provinces quite as much as language.

There is such a thing as Jewish literature. It is the literature of the Jewish people and of Judaism. Works written by non-Jews have no place in Jewish literature. But not all works written by Jews are to be included in the literature of the Jewish people. A treatise by a Jew on pathology, and be it written in Hebrew, does not constitute Jewish literature. A good deal of the translations of Aristotle and the like cannot claim a place in Jewish literature. They belong elsewhere. A Hebrew essay on Hamlet belongs to the literature on Shakespeare. It is different when in its artistic form it assumes the character of a model literary production, then the language is the decisive factor, but then only. The lines of demarcation are not to be strictly drawn. But in general the contention will hold good that form and original content are the supreme tests.

And here we come to the question of "classics." We are in the habit of referring to Greek and Latin literature as classical literature. But while it may be permissible to include everything written in Greek or Latin in a library of Greek and Latin authors, they are not all of the classical type. Each literature has its "classics," the great masterpieces. They alone are really valuable as literature. The rest is for study at the hands of the technical scholar. The educated layman has no particular interest in them. A man at home in English literature need not have read English works on chemistry or astronomy.

And so it is with Jewish literature. Classic in the strict sense is the Bible, itself written in two languages, the Hebrew and Aramaic. And if we are liberal enough to include the writings that for a reason not literary were excluded from the collection of sacred writings, but extant either in the original or in translations, we cannot possibly deny them a place among the Jewish classics of the first order. I say, of the first order. For there are Jewish classics of a second and third order, and so on. Originality no less than literary finish is the mark of the classic, though the two should go together. It is true, not everything that is original makes pleasurable reading. The Mishnah and Talmud and the medieval poetry and philosophy and homiletics are all original. But there is no aesthetic side to a treatise on the vessels that take on uncleanness. Blackstone may be a classic among lawyers, but not among the reading public at large. Of all the sixty treatises of the Mishnah, only one, The Sayings of the Fathers, may lay claim to general interest. In the Talmud there is much material of literary beauty and interest. But the whole is scarcely adapted for general reading. There is, of course, a further element to determine the classical character of a work. It is the influence it has exercised in the spiritual life of a people or community or the extent to which it has become the pattern for other similar works. There is nothing drier than a commentary. But Rashi's commentary on the Scriptures stands pre-eminent for the influence it has exercised on the Jew and the pattern it has created for similar productions. The philosophical writings of the medieval Jews have long ceased to be of moment in the study of philosophy except from the historical point of view. But Maimonides' Guide and Halevi's Kozari have been household books among the Jews. On them the Jewish mind has formed itself. Good poetry is pleasing at all times. But the poetry that has found a place in the Jewish liturgy is pre-eminently classical. Halevi's Zionide is entitled to a place in the world's literature because of its beauty of form and loftiness of content. To the Jew it is doubly classical. For it is an expression of an undying longing, and it occupies a prominent part in the service of the synagogue.

Books have their fate. Many are written, but few are known and cherished. After all it is not the student who determines the place of a literary production, but the voice of the people. Many gems there are forgotten and ignored. But the instinct of the people seizes upon that which mirrors its deepest thoughts, convictions and yearnings. Jewish literature in the aggregate may be comprehensive to include everything written by Jews and on Jews. But really it is no more Jewish literature, but a Jewish library. There is need enough of making accessible in original and translations all books that are housed in a Jewish library building. Everything that is still hidden and stored away should be brought out of the darkness. Books badly or inadequately or unaesthetically printed should be reprinted. There should be nothing left unpublished. Everything should be made accessible that tends to point out the literary activity of the Jewish people. Other nations and religious bodies have their organizations for publishing great collections. The Jewish people is, alas, disorganized. It has no academy. But it has its colleges and learned institutions. Let a concentrated effort be made. Let each institution choose for itself the part of Jewish literature, the publication of which it wishes to undertake. Let the Talmud, for instance, be published in a suitable form and in a suitable translation. But on a smaller scale let the Jewish reading public be provided with a selection from our literature, our best books, those which for literary finish or originality of content or the influence they have exercised on posterity, stand pre-eminent. Even with the selective principle suggested, the field is enormous. But let us not forget that our first duty is to serve the public, and then the scholar. For we want that which deserves to be read, read and reread. And when we have decided that a certain work possesses attraction for the laity, it should be printed in full. We have enough of excerpts and anthologies. But a piece of literature must be read in its entirety.

From the Bible to the latest essayist and bard, the range is wide. Select the best. Translate with exactness. Translate into good English. Let there be short introductions, and if needs be, short notes. And let the outward form by all means be attractive and the size portable.

TURKISH GOVERNMENT CONCESSION TO JEWISH IMMIGRANTS.

In response to representations made by the Haham Bashi of Turkey, the Sublime Porte has agreed to remit all customs and dues on merchandise which is being brought into Turkey by Jews who are emigrating from Macedonia. As a consequence of this concession a large number of the Jewish merchants in Salonika, who consider the Greek domination to be unbearable, have decided to settle in Turkey. The Haham Bashi has also asked for the exemption of those Jews from military service for a number of years. The Grand Vizier has promised to give the request his sympathetic consideration.

Simon Wolf Opposes Proposed Amendment of Constitution

Simon Wolf appeared before the subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee, which is considering a proposed constitutional amendment for a nationwide prohibition and made the following argument:

"The law can punish, but never prevent. In fact, the enforced dictum of the law, making an effort to prevent enjoyment of natural rights, leads to the violation thereof and encourages perjury and hypocrisy, and, instead of preventing drunkenness, will increase the number of drunkards.

"To bring about a condition of true temperance, not only in the habit of drink, but in all other directions inimical to the health of the individual or to the prosperity of the nation, a campaign of education in the home and in the churches is absolutely necessary.

"I was born in Germany, of Jewish faith, and am thoroughly conversant with the history and habits of both. In the seventy-eight years of my life, I have never seen a drunken Jew. Not because we claim superiority as men or women, but because our religion, our education, our home training point to temperate habits in all things, in judgment no less. Therefore, laws to force unnatural obedience is virtually intemperance of the worst sort.

Urges Continental System.

"Some of the great evils of this nation are, properly speaking, the barroom as now constituted, and the treating system which has become, unfortunately, a national habit. If the continental system could be adopted in this country of having rooms where men, women and children may congregate, read the papers and magazines, discuss current measures of interest, and drink their glass of light wine or beer, it would be a reform in the right direction and be productive of the best results, individually and nationally.

"I remember well when the late Vice President of the United States, Henry Wilson, who was a sincere prohibitionist, returned from a trip to Germany, told me that his views had been entirely changed by his observations and experiences while abroad, and that he wished that the same custom that existed there could be introduced here.

"It would strengthen the aims and objects of the people who believe in temperance and not in absolute prohibition.

"The church, with all its splendid chances for improving the moral and religious conditions and the home circle, should be the proper place for advancing the moral status of the individual.

Sobriety of Moslems.

"While serving as a representative of our government in Egypt I became profoundly impressed with the absence of the drinking habit on the part of the Mohammedans, not by virtue of law, but by virtue of their religion. I feel confident that had the ancient Egyptians or the Jews put on their statute books laws to prevent the manufacturing or drinking of liquor, it would have resulted in a reversal of that which now exists. This same condition can be produced in this country by temperate and moderate laws, the education of the masses and the wishes of those who live in the respective vicinities of the towns, cities and states of the republic.

"Local option, which I understand President Wilson has declared himself to favor, would be one of the panaceas in the right direction. For, after all, this is a government of the people, and no man should be deprived of the rights accorded to him by the Declaration of Independence; should be deprived of his rights at the dictation of any church or any body of citizens who have contrary views.

State Rights Invaded.

"To change the Constitution of the United States by the enactment of any such law as is contemplated by the resolution now pending before your committee is in violation of the rights of the individual states. It was never contemplated by the fathers of the republic that the government of the United States should legislate on a subject that is purely local, municipal and not national.

"It has been the experience of ages that prohibition does not prohibit.

"Independent of all these considerations, there is an economic question involved which should give pause to every legislator and to every voter. Millions of money are now paid into the Treasury by the manufacturers and sellers of liquor. Stamp out both and you have a deficiency in the Treasury of these millions, which would have to be raised by additional taxes, which fall mostly upon the middle and agricultural classes.

"Where the farmer now sells with a profit the grain that enters into the composition of liquor and beer, they would no longer find a market as they do now. Instead of being helped in their laudable occupation, there would be an additional tax levied on them.

"I reiterate in the strongest terms possible that all the efforts of my life have been for the strengthening of the ties of kinship between nationalities and creeds. No man has a higher respect for the opinions of others than have I. No man has a greater or sincerer admiration for the teachings and observing of the Christian religion.

"It is by virtue of the respect I have for the inalienable rights of others that I demand the same high privilege for myself and millions of other citizens."

GREAT EXODUS OF THE JEWISH POPULATION FROM ROUMANIA.

The disappointment and exasperation of the Jewish population, from whom the government, in spite of repeated promises, still withholds the possibility of becoming citizens, is daily growing. Particularly those young people who took active part in the last campaign against the Bulgarians and to whom, in spite of the solemn consent of the government the right of naturalization has been denied, are in despair. As a consequence of this a new emigration movement, similar to that of the year 1900, has begun among the Jews. Thousands of Jewish reservists have formed themselves into properly organized military troops and are leaving the land on foot, in order to emigrate. The first group of emigrants left Jassy on April 1. The influence of this movement is increasing from day to day.

SPAIN WANTS JEWS TO RETURN.

Madrid to Develop Center of Jewish Knowledge as a Special Inducement.

The development of a center of Jewish knowledge in Madrid is being undertaken by the Spanish government in the hope that it may bring about a return to Spain of some of the Sephardic or Spaniole Jews living in the east of Europe.

They take an aristocratic pride in their purity of blood and long pedigree, ranking high in Jewish communities wherever they may have settled. They have never lost the use of the Spanish tongue and still profess love and veneration for Spain.

A commission of influential Jews resident in Tangier recently visited Madrid and had an audience of the king. They represented some 25,000 Jews scattered throughout Morocco.

NEWS FROM LONDON

BY OUR CORRESPONDENT DR. M. EPSTEIN

London, April 20, 1914.

Rachmonus—what a wealth of excellent qualities the word sums up, and the word and the qualities are Jewish. Whatever else has been found lacking in the Jew, his charity has always been admitted. Nor has that charity been merely sympathetic. Rachmonus implies also material aid. In olden days we brought the poor wanderer home, fed him at our table, comforted him in his distress and sent him on his way rejoicing. In these modern days of the twentieth century, we subscribe to Societies that organize assistance and relief of all kinds. Some people regret the old ways and look not altogether with favor on modern methods of doing things, with their officials and systems. But for good or for evil the new way is with us, and from time to time the Societies which engage in public work come to the public for the means. We in London are used to appeals of the sort, and it must be admitted that the Jewish community here responds in a way that does it credit.

No less than five special appeals are before the Jewish public just now. First there is the Jewish Board of Guardians. In England the State provides poor relief for indigent paupers. But Jews take a pride in supporting their own poor. They thus help the public authorities in two ways—they pay the poor rate and they lessen its growth by a voluntary levy. Founded in 1859 the Jewish Board of Guardians has done excellent work in the East End of London, spending annually some 350,000. dollars. It has many activities, but one of the most helpful is that of its loan department, which lends money free of interest to poor borrowers in need of capital for their business. The cheerful fact in connection with this work is that the loans are for the most part repaid, and that the losses in this branch of the work are insignificant. But for its undertakings the Board requires money and this is a chronic state with it. No wonder. A Society for relieving the poor has no limits to its possible resources; the more it has, the more it can do.

The Board of Guardians ministers to the material needs of people; spiritual and religious needs are served by the Jewish Religion Education Board. This organization spends some 75,000 dollars every three years, and as it has little regular income, it must beg the sum as occasion arises. How does it set to work? It has recourse to that characteristically English institution, the public dinner—holding a mighty feast every three years and sending round Validi mendicantes, sturdy beggars, to all city offices where Jews are to be found (and they are many), asking for tribute, to teach the children of the poor what Judaism means. All our nobili lend their help — the Rothschilds and the Swaythlings and the Franklins and the Cohens. The J. R. E. B. (such is its pet name, which is also easy to pronounce) has by now some claims to tradition. The late Chief Rabbi was one of its warmest friends—as you would expect,—and the present Chief Rabbi is following in his footsteps. It is the first J. R. E. B. appeal that Dr. Hertz is assisting, and the hope can only be expressed that his excellence as a "Schnorrer in good causes" will in this case also show how excellent it is.

What do they do with the money? Thousands of children are to be found in East London for whose religious education no provision is made. The public schools provide all that is necessary for secular education; and there the matter ends, save only that the missionaries are on the watch. Consequently the J. R. E. B. has a large field for its activities. The work must be done and the Board does it. Whether it does it as well as possible need not be discussed. Every Society may be improved upon; every method may surely give place to a better. Possibly even the J. R. E. B. will come near perfection. For the present it needs money. Times are bad in the city, they tell us. But judging from the past, the Board will no doubt obtain its 75,000 dollars, or a sum very near to that amount.

For twenty-one years the Jewish Historical Society of England has worked in the field of Anglo-Jewish history. It has published records and documents; it has helped to popularize Jewish literature; it strives to be the custodian of its archives for Anglo-Jewry; it now possesses a library of historical interest at University College called after its munificent founder, Mocatta. After twenty-one years' work it has a record of which it may be proud. But it never had more than some 250 to 300 members. And as its work has been fairly heavy it has accumplated a debt, not large it is true, but burdensome. So, at its coming of age, it is giving a dinner, first, to celebrate the event; secondly, to obtain more members; and thirdly to get $5,000 dollars if it can. The Lord Chief Justice is to preside at the dinner, and by the time these lines are in print, the papers will be speaking of the gathering as a "brilliantly social function." It promises to be that; but it is too early today to say whether the whole amount will be forthcoming.

One would think that the calls on the community here were sufficient, considering these three appeals. But no. The ladies in North London (and it is pleasing to note the names of many a Bath B'rith in the list) are courageous enough to add to the appeal. What is their claim? East London, the pet of the Social Reformer, Jewish and Gentile alike, possesses many clubs for boys and girls. But the Jews of East London are constantly overflowing to the neighboring districts and North Londn is one of the most thickly peopled, from the Jewish point of view. Now in the wake of the Jew follows the missionary, as sure as the eagle follows its prey; and the missionary is on the lookout for young souls. They are easy to catch; they have little discretion; they have the carelessness of youth which is good. So in North London you may find many missions and many clubs for young people conducted by the missionaries. A year or two ago a Jewish club was started in the neighborhood, and it turned out a great success. Bpt a successful club means money, and the Jewish ladies from the North of London are organizing an oriental bazaar in order to fill the club's exchequer. They are working hard and are sanguine of success. Certainly, if enthusiasm were the measure of success, theirs ought to be great.

So we have the Board of Guardians, the Jewish Religious Education Board, the Jewish Historical Society of England and the North London Jewish Club for Boys and Girls, all going the round cap in hand. Let it be remembered that the givers are for the most part the same. It must therefore be a brave man or woman who would add to the list of begging societies. But this is just where Rachmonus comes in. And the curious thing is that, with the exception of the Board of Guardians, none of the calls are for material things. Nor is the fifth and last, which differs from the others in that it is working for the Jewish cause abroad. Like the J. R. E. B. its work is educational and religious; like the North London Club it is fighting convenionist activity. What is the fifth? It calls itself the English branch of the International Pro-Falasha Committee.

A few years ago the Falashas in Abyssinia believed that there were very few Jews in the world and that those that did exist had adopted Christianity. They owed the information to the Christian missionaries, largely Germans in the pay of the English missionary societies. It is a fact worthy of note that the missionaries take the line of least resistance. In Europe and America they do not attempt to bring salvation to the educated and the well to do; they go to the poor and needy whom (on the face of it) it is easier to catch by gifts when argument fails. Likewise, for similar reasons, they devote more effort to the Jew of the East than to his brother in the West. The Falashas were thus a rich soil for their activities. They were ignorant; they had a large faith; they were not world-wise; they had a keen desire for knowledge. They were therefore eminently fitted for catching. So the missionaries set to work among them, telling them stories that were not always strictly true; taking advantage of their simplicity and supplying them with books in their own language, principally bibles and psalters. Every year the reports of the mission workers proudly pointed to several thousands of Falasha converts; it did not seem unlikely that in the space of a few years the whole of the Falashas would be professing Christians.

But some five or six years ago Dr. Margulies, the Chief Rabbi of Florence, got into touch with the Falashas, and Dr. Jacques Faitlovitch, who had made a study of the language of the ancient people, was sent out to them to report on their condition. Like most primitive folk they regarded a stranger as an enemy, and Dr. Faitlovitch found it difficult at first, to make headway. But with persistence and courage he made friends among the Falashas who began to realize that there were a large number of Jews in the world and that, most important of all, these looked upon them as brothers in faith. Once the consciousness was aroused, the missionaries could make no further progress and their own reports admit that since the arrival of Dr. Faitlovitch among the Falashas, their work has become almost entirely fruitless.

To establish confidence was the main thing, but it was needful to do much more. Above all, schools must be provided for the Falashas where their language and Hebrew and the elements of their faith, which is also ours, should be taught them. Secondly, they required Bibles and other religious books. It took some years, and now one tiny school-room for some 20 Falasha children is to be found in the interior of Abyssinia. It is something, but it is very little. More schools are necessary, and for schools you require teachers. Hence sooner or later a normal college for Falasha students must be inaugurated, to send forth teachers of Judaism throughout the length and breadth of Abyssinia to all the Falasha tribes. And the money for this? Dr. Margulies founded an International Commitee at Florence for the purpose of gathering means from all parts of Europe and America. But Florence was hardly the best center, and only this spring Frankfort on Main has been chosen.

There is something that captivates the imagination about the Falashas. They are in a land about which what is called the civilized world knows not over much; they must have been there for centuries, nursing their old Jewish beliefs, and practising the rites and customs of Jews. Where did they come from? How did they get to Abyssinia? Nothing certain can be said. And here they are in danger of losing their traditions and ceasing to be Jews. No wonder Dr. Faitlovitch, who has seen the conditions with his own eyes, stirs up sympathy wherever he goes. He spoke to the lodge at its last meeting; he is to speak at a specially convened meeting at the house of Mrs. Sassoon to which the genearl Jewish public has been invited. We doubt not that he will achieve his aim — to collect money for the Falashas; money, be it remembered, not for their material needs but for the spread of knowledge and the strengthening of faith among them.

We have these five appeals then, before the Jewish public in London. They will all be answered; and even if their promoters do not get all they ask for, yet a good deal will be forthcoming. Even so, these appeals do not exhaust the list. For Jews' College is begging strenuously for more subscribers, not publicly, it is true, but none the less effectively. And finally a new company has just been formed with the object of acquiring land in Palestine—the Maccabean Land Company Limited. Its capital is £52,000, say 260,000 dollars, in shares of 250 dollars, the holders of which will receive about 2 acres of land in Palestine, with facilities for an ultimate settlement on the spot. For those who do not desire the purchase of land, but who yet sympathize with the scheme, foundation bonds of 50 dollars have been provided, and the money thus subscribed will be used for developing the land which the Company is to purchase.

The scheme comes at an opportune moment. The activities of the Palestine Society have familiarized many people with the conditions in Palestine, and it has been remarkable to note how Erez Yisrocl has stirred a chord in the breasts of even the most apathetic Jews. But in Palestine itself things are moving. The recently appointed General Council for Palestine at its last session made allowances from the provincial budget for the agricultural development of the country. An appropriation of 1,286 dollars was made for a breeding farm for horses and donkeys; 13,200 dollars was voted for an agricultural school; small sums were granted for repairing the roads (a very great boon) between Hebron and Beth Jibrin, Jaffa and Gaza, and Hebron and the Valley of El Koft. All this will make for the general good. It only requires the authorities to wake up to the possibilities of the land, and though it may not once again flow with milk and honey, it may nevertheless enjoy economic prosperity of a high order. The Maccabaean Land Company hopes to contribute to that achievement, and every shareholder will feel that he has a stake in the land of his fathers.

It was a pleasing invitation that the Lodge in Mancehster sent to its elder sister in London to participate at a fairly large initiation ceremony, and talk things over. The date was not a convenient one for London brethren, and therefore the London visitors will not be very numerous at the function. Nevertheless, the idea was splendid, and it is to be hoped that we shall hear more of it. The two lodges of the Order in England should not be isolated units; for beside the safety which is associated with the multitude of councillors their meetings would help to bring London Jews and Jews in the provinces into closer touch. Nothing is more needful in Anglo-Jewery today and the Order should be a means of bringing it about.

No doubt the American Jews have been as interested as their English brethen in the friendly attitude of the Spanish Government to Jews. It may be only policy. Spain is anxious for a peaceful penetration of Morocco and in Morocco the Jewish element is said to number 25,000 souls. A Commission of influential Jews resident in Tangier recently visited Madrid and had an audience of the King. Whether any Jews who return to the country which for centuries was the second motherland of so many of their folk, with its memories of "Tulitula" (Toledo) and Jehuda Halevi, it is difficult to foretell. There are certainly many Spanish Jews who live in Eastern Europe, who have never quite lost the use of the Spanish tongue and who still profess love and veneration for Spain. In any event, it has been proved that Jews are an excellent force for developing the economic progress of a country. Spain will not regret its fair and just treatment of Jews if it should attract them. Perhaps we may even one day have a Lodge of the Order in Madrid. Who knows?

A SIGNIFICANT GREEK DECLARATION IN ALEXANDRIA.

Almost simultaneously with the arrival of Beilis in Alexandria an important meeting of the "Cercle Hellenique" was held at which the Greek Consul presided. At this meeting the Greek publicist Anagnostopoulo delivered a very interesting address on the ritual murder legend. The meeting gained in prominence by the attendance of the entire body of teachers of the Greek schools of Alexandria as well as of the Greek physicians, lawyers and representatives of the highest aristocracy with their ladies. The speaker demonstrated the frailty and baseness of the ritual murder accusation against the Jews and closed his long address with a charge to the teachers and the ladies present to impress upon the children in their tenderest age to love these martyr people who have suffered so much for their religion, a religion which is the foundation of civilization. Judaism, said the speaker, first spread the idea of brotherhood in the world, so that it can be said without exaggeration that Judaism forms the basis of morality. The presiding consul Sachtouris supplemented the deductions of the lecturer and reminded the audience of the heroic patriotism displayed by the Greek Jews in the recent Balkan war, also of the intimate friendship manifested by the late King George towards a great number of Jews and towards Judaism.

When we think of the fact that the Greeks were the ones who repeatedly instigated Jew baiting outbreaks in Alexandria and Port Said, we certainly must greet these declarations with satisfaction.—(Dr. Bloch's Isr. Wochenschrift.)

THE JEWS OF FINLAND.

By order of the Finnish government, that principality is to be cleared within a very short time of all Jews who are not able to prove their undoubted right to stay there.

DISTRICT NUMBER ONE ACTIVITIES.

By Eugene H. Lehman.

District Number One is awake. It is very much awake—more awake than it has been for many a year. It is not our purpose now to try to account for this rejuvenation. The cause may lie in the fact that Dr. Silverman is our president, or be due to the influence cast over the District by the young college graduates who have recently joined the Order. Whatever the cause, the result is the all important concern; and the result is that District Number One is awake—wide awake.

Its wakefulness has expressed itself first of all in the launching of a movement to erect in New York City a District Club House. Everyone has long been agreed upon the fact that such a club house was urgently needed; but not until recently have any active steps been taken looking toward the meeting of this need. At the recent District Convention in Springfield, a resolution was adopted favoring the building of a central home for the lodges; and the Intellectual Advancement Committee is pushing the matter with vigor.

Another subject that has aroused the intense interest of the members is the debate going on over the question as to whether or not the District ought to engage in the work of religious education. For some time past, an individual lodge here and there has been conducting a religious school; but it is now proposed that the District enter upon a much wider and more comprehensive plan of religious education than ever before. Those in favor of the plan urge the fact that thousands of boys and girls are receiving no instruction whatsoever in the faith of their fathers and that no organization other than the B'nai B'rith is large enough to cope with the situation. Those who are opposing the movement hold that the departure is too radical for an institution whose aims are primarily philanthropic. Whatever the outcome may be, the interest which the discussion of the question is arousing, proves that the members are fully alive to the importance of the problem.

This new life is manifesting itself further in the activity of the Membership Committee. Mr. Chas. S. Brand has been made chairman of this committee and keeps in action all the time. The committee works not only by means of personal solicitation, but likewise has called to its service the press and the platform. For example, Mr. Brand and Dr. Eugene H. Lehman have recently delivered addresses before the Menorah societies of the College of the City of New York at New York University vigorously setting forth the aims of the Order. It is largely from the Menorah societies that the District expects to recruit many of its future workers. As for the press, a Publicity Committee has been appointed that keeps the Jewish public informed of what the various lodges are doing.

MINSTREL SHOW BY JULIUS HOUSEMAN LODGE, GRAND RAPIDS, MICH.

The most ambitious project ever undertaken by Julius Houseman Lodge No. 238 of Grand Rapids, Mich., was brought to a successful and pleasant culmination on Tuesday evening, April 28, 1914, at the St. Cecilia Hall before a large audience. It took the form of a minstrel show, which furnished opportunity for a series of versatile stunts, graceful dancing, original wit and good singing. It also demonstrated to Grand Rapids Jewry that talent existed among the members of the lodge, which they had never supposed lurked there.

The entertainment was followed by dancing and upwards of 80 couples patronized the large ball room.

Mr. L. Weguson, as President of the lodge, presided and in his opening remarks announced that the entertainment was given principally to bring about a closer contact and strengthen the bond of good fellowship among the members of the lodge. The performance had many original features and it was generally agreed that the B'nai B'rith minstrels were good fun all around.

The Grand Rapids News, one of the leading papers of the city, issued for the lodge a special extra B'nai B'rith number containing a complete program, photographs, cartoons, etc., featuring the production.

All those who attended adjudged the affair an unqualified success and express the hope that a similar gathering under the lodge auspices may not be far distant.

President Morris N. Schneider and the Grand Orator of the District, Rabbi M. Friedlander, left their homes in Oakland last Sunday morning, April 19th, for an official tour which is to take four weeks. Their first stop will be Reno, Nevada, with a view of surveying the field for the establishment of a B'nai B'rith Lodge. Years ago that city had such a lodge, composed of pioneer members of other lodges, which in the mining days of Nevada were located in some of its camps. When that element died out or removed to San Francisco the lodge was compelled to surrender its charter. It remains to be seen whether the present Jewish population of Reno have the spirit which distinguished their predecessors.

From Reno they will go to Salt Lake City, where undoubtedly they will receive a handsome welcome from the genial and hospitable members of B. F. Peixotto Lodge. They will then go to Boise, Idaho, where the Rabbi will combine a sabbath eve service with a B'nai B'rith talk, for such is the custom in the capital city of Idaho. They will there find a splendid outpost of Judaism. From Boise they will go to Butte, Montana, in the center of the copper-mining district, where a community of enthusiastic members of our Order is centered. Next will come Spokane, the capital city in what is known in the northwest, as the "Inland Empire." A large and thriving circle is there awaiting their arrival. From there they will strike out for the Pacific shore and land in Seattle, the metropolis of the State of Washington. That city has two progressive lodges rivaling each other in activity. The most representative Jews of that community are the leading spirits of both those lodges. After Seattle will follow British Columbia, where they will visit the lodge at Vancouver and be entertained by our open-hearted English brethren and friends. After that they will visit a number of cities located between Seattle and Vancouver, which have not yet come into the fold, though they should have done so, provided, of course, they have a sufficient number of eligibles. They will then go south to the thriving city of Tacoma, the head of navigation on Puget Sound, where they will visit the junior lodge of the District, comprising almost entirely the solid Jewish citizenship of the community, returning to Seattle for May 10th, to participate in the laying of the cornerstone of a Synagogue. On May 10th, they will have reached Portland, Oregon, the B'nai B'rith town par excellence in the northwest. The city harbors two of the leading lodges of the jurisdiction and is the home of two Past Grand Presidents, Brothers Sichel and Swett. This will terminate the trip and by that time the President and Grand Orator will both, no doubt, long for a return to their dear ones and for a well deserved rest. The itinerary is an exact copy of the one followed by President Golden and Secretary Ascheim in the last term.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

About 20 members of the degree team of Springfield Lodge No. 684 of Springfield, Mass., recently organized a B'nai B'rith Degree Club, a social auxiliary to the B'nai B'rith Lodge.

Owing to the splendid work performed by the degree team of Springfield Lodge it is in constant demand by outside lodges for exemplifications, and the object of the club is to maintain interest in the affairs of the degree team, and to establish a fund to be used for defraying the expenses of the frequent trips taken by the team to nearby cities.

Meetings are to be held monthly, on the Monday preceding the second Wednesday, which is the meeting night of the lodge.

The first meeting of the new club was held on April 8, 1914, at which time the first degree ceremony was conducted. After a discussion as to the future plans and work of the club, refreshments were served.

JOSHUA LODGE, PHILADELPHIA.

A series of interesting talks and lectures has been inaugurated by Joshua Lodge No. 23 of Philadelphia, Pa. At a meeting held on April 14, 1914, Rabbi Isaac Landman delivered an interesting address, taking for his subject "The Sons of the Covenant." He dwelt upon the charitable purposes of the Order and particularly emphasized the new orphanage in course of erection at Erie, Pa., and strongly commended the same. After the meeting refreshments were served.

MEETING OF GENERAL COMMITTEE OF DISTRICT GRAND LODGE NO. 2 AND INSTITUTION OF MUNCIE LODGE, NO. 752, AT MUNCIE, IND.

The fourth meeting of the General Committee was held April 26 at 11 a. m. at Muncie, Ind., upon call of the president. Present: Bros. Harry Simon, president, presiding; Victor Abraham, secretary; William Ornstein, treasurer; Sol S. Kiser and Moses Schwab, constituting a quorum.

The minutes of the meeting of March 29 were approved. It was resolved that an engrossed bound copy of the memorial to Bro. Abe Bloch, as appears in said minutes, attested by the secretary under seal of the District Grand Lodge, be transmitted to the family of Bro. Bloch.

There was presented an application praying for the institution of a lodge of the order to be located at Muncie, Ind., signed by 23 applicants, 12 thereof holding existing cards of withdrawal from Indianapolis Lodge, and 4 having previously been members of the order, but whose cards of withdrawal had expired, and the application being found in due form and the certificates and cards being found satisfactory, the application was granted for the formation of a lodge at Muncie, Ind., to be styled Muncie Lodge, No. 752, I. O. B. B., and the president was authorized to cause said lodge to be instituted. Thereupon the president, with the assistance of the members of the general committee present at the meeting, duly instituted and delivered its charter to Muncie Lodge, No. 752, I. O. B. B.

The organization of Muncie Lodge was especially due to the earnest efforts of Bro. H. Eichel, who was elected president of the lodge, and Bro. Sol S. Kiser, of Indianapolis.

B'NAI B'RITH HOME FOR THE PORTLAND LODGES.

(By Edw. N. Weinbaum, secretary Theodore Herzl Lodge, No. 314, I. O. B. B., Portland, Ore.)

At the B'Nai B'rith Hall Association meeting, held recently, the board of directors accepted the plans for a building that will cost approximately $45,000, to be constructed in the middle of the block on 13th street, near Mill street.

This will be the home of the Portland Lodges of the B'nai B'rith Order. Portland Lodge and Theodore Herzl Lodge have long awaited this opportunity of having a place they can call their own.

The building will have one of the finest gymnasiums in the west and will be furnished complete. The first floor will contain a billiard and smoking room 26x28½ feet and locker rooms to accommodate six hundred persons. On this floor will also be located a swimming pool that will be 20x60 feet and 9 feet deep. It will be equipped with spring boards and other paraphernalia that will make it one of the finest tanks that any gymnasium or club has ever constructed. A running track will also be built on this floor.

One of the advantages of the building will be that the janitor will have his headquarters on the first floor, where a three-room apartment has been provided for his use. This will be furnished with the most modern and up-to-date furniture, comprising tables and beds that disappear in the walls when not in use.

The main entrance of the building will be in the center, which will lead into the vestry room. On the right will be located the club room, to the left the billiard room. Entrance to the swimming pool and running track, as also to the lockers, will be gained directly from the main corridor, the shallow baths being in close proximity to the lockers.

The second floor plan will have the men's meeting hall 41x51 feet, a ladies' hall 24x32 feet and a library and reading room 26x36½ feet. On this floor will also be located the directors' office and the office of the officials of the lodge, as well as an up-to-date modern kitchen and pantry for the use of the lodges. The gymnasium will take up one-half of the building, which will be 46x95 feet and 26 feet high. A hand ball court 18x46 feet is also to be located on this floor.

Besides having the main entrance on 13th street, there will be a side entrance to the west end of the building. The exterior will be finished in light brick and stained joints trimmed with stone. The width of the building on 13th street will be 90 feet. From the main entrance of the building one will be led into a mahogany finished vestibule, giving direct access to all parts of the building, lodge halls, lobby, billiard room, etc.

The height of the ground floor will be 12 feet, the halls and lobby 16 feet and the height of the building 40 feet.

Mr. I. Swett is president of the association and Rabbi Jonah B. Wise is chairman of the building committee. Alex. E. Miller is president and Edward N. Weinbaum is secretary of Theodor Herzl Lodge, and Carlton Bamberger is president and A. L. Stone is secretary of the Portland Lodge.

The Portland lodges have only one Ladies' auxiliary in this city, and they will also make use of the building. Mrs. J. Lauterstein is president and Mrs. E. M. Kraut is secretary of the Daughters of the Covenant, which is an auxiliary to Theodore Herzl Lodge.

Construction work will begin on this building within a month, and it is anticipated that the lodges will be in their new home in the fall.

Mr. J. D. Dantoff, a member of the order, is the architect.

THE CINCINNATI LODGE, NO. 4.

On Monday evening, April 13, The Cincinnati Lodge No. 4, initiated a class of thirteen candidates with most impressive ceremonies. This is the first of a number of such classes to be initiated between now and the adjournment for the summer. The next initiation will be in May and there are already some twenty-five candidates for the next class. The outlook at present is that there will be an equal number for the June initiation.

Nearly forty new members have already been added to the Cincinnati Lodge through the excellent work of the Membership Committeee mainly, although quite a number have been added through the efforts of individual members. The most gratifying and encouraging feature is the fact that applications come in voluntarily and from the most desirable sources, proving conclusively that the Membership Committee has gone about the work not only with zeal but with a rare degree of intelligence as well. The Cincinnati Lodge No. 4 has experimented along these lines before (to its cost) and has demonstrated what every thinking member of the order knows, viz: that members who are drawn into the order without having a real desire to join, and for reasons other than purely ethical and altruistic ones, do not remain members long nor do they contribute anything of value to the order.

In view of these facts, and considering too, that there has been a radical change from the old order of things in the last few years it is doubly gratifying to be able to chronicle such fine results as are being shown by the Membership Committee of the Cincinnati Lodge, As stated, it is not only the number of new members but the character of the men (young men mostly) who are coming in. They come from all the walks of life and represent all classes of business and professions and all shades of Judaism.

Your correspondent will therefore be pardoned if he omits personal mention of the brothers who made the initiation ceremonies so impressive and interesting, and confines the commendation and praise to the Membership Committee. Brother Harry C. Levy is chairman of that committee and it is due him that special and public mention be made of the work of his committee. Of course Bro. Levy didn't do it all, but he did a whole lot of it, and he took good care to see that his fellow members of the committee were "on the job" at all hours.

WINNIPEG, MANITOBA, CANADA.

On March 5, 1914, a special Initiation Meeting was held by Winnipeg Lodge No. 650, at which nine applicants were initiated.

The special feature of the meeting was the particularly large attendance and unusual impressiveness of the ceremony.

The impression that the ceremony made on the members present was such that immediately after the conclusion, the members surrounded the team and congratulated them—a fact which has seldom happened and which ought to stimulate the members of the degree team to keep up the standard.

The meeting of March 19th was less attended, owing to a big social event which took place the same evening, and compelled some of the ordinarily active members to be absent. The small attendance did not prevent, however, the members to transact a good deal of routine business, and lay the foundation for numerous schemes to enable the lodge to enlarge its sphere of activity.

The Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital

Report of Building Fund Committee.

To The Officers and Trustees, Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital Association:

Brethren:

I have the honor of presenting herewith full report of all moneys received by me and disbursed by the Building Fund Committee to April 1st, 1914.

The authority to raise this fund was given in April 1911 at a meeting held at Hot Springs, Ark., and our committee was then appointed.

On Sept. 5th, 1911, the 55th anniversary of the birth of our sainted leader, Leo N. Levi, to whose beloved memory our institution is dedicated, a call was issued for subscriptions and a generous response was promptly received.

Our late lamented brother Godchaux A. Levi volunteered a substantial subscription to our fund, but the grim destroyer ruthlessly took him from us before he had carried out his good intention.

The Levi family, represented by Brother Chas. G. Levi and Jule K. Hexter, arranged a subscription of $10,000 to which the brothers and sisters of our lamented chief contributed. Thus carrying into practical execution the magnanimous ideal of our departed brother.

Shortly after Mrs. Theresa Levi, the widow of Brother Godchaux A. Levi, departed this life and left a bequest of $2,500 to our institution.

Many of our lodges and a number of our members rallied generously to the support of the building fund; others, from whom we had a right to confidently expect financial support, for reasons best known to themselves, lent a deaf ear to the appeals made.

Had all subscriptions made, been paid, we would have had ample funds to pay the cost of the building. As it is we were compelled to borrow less than $20,000 to give us a clear and undisputed title to our institution and its equipments.

It has been proposed to issue 200 debentures of $100 each, payable by lot, within ten years, bearing interest at 5 per cent per annum, and if this proposition is authorized by this meeting and we obtain the indorsement of District Grand Lodge No. 7 at the 1914 Convention, it is confidently expected that the issue will be successfully financed.

A loan of $17,500 authorized by the Executive Committee of our Association, to meet the urgent demands of the builders, was made by the Association with the Arkansas National Bank of Hot Springs, Ark., upon its note endorsed by four members of the board of trustees.

You will doubtless agree that this debt should be settled and these endorsers relieved of their liability by June 4th, 1914, the date of maturity of this obligation.

It was my intention to publish a complete list of subscribers to the Building Fund, but several large subscriptions were furnished without listing names of donors, and it is therefore impossible to carry out this plan.

Exhibits that are made in this report will probably be considered sufficient for all purposes.

The total expense incurred in raising this fund amounted to $900.93 and interest received on daily balances aggregated $792.11.

All funds received were promptly deposited in the name of the Chairman with the National Bank of Commerce in St. Louis, subject to the order of demands signed by the entire membership of the Building Fund Committee.

The comparative ease of raising the fund not only speaks volumes for the merit of our worthy project, but also makes plain the great potentiality of the I. O. B. B. in organized movements of national scope.

I want to extend my heartfelt thanks to the men who so generously gave me their time and unselfish aid in this movement, contributing to its success, as well as to thank them for the financial support they have given me—I am sure that the great service to be rendered to suffering humanity by our institution will more than repay them for their splendid effort.

I cannot refrain from expressing to you the great pleasure afforded me in having been able to render this service, in the interest of our order and its philanthropic efforts. I feel fully repaid by the magnificence of our building and the grandeur of the work outlined for our institution.

Fraternally yours.
EMIL NATHAN,
Chairman, Building Fund Committee,

Leo. N. Levi Memorial Hospital Association.

WASHINGTON LODGE, NEW YORK.

Washington Lodge No. 19, of New York City, again celebrated Pesach by giving a Seder on Saturday evening, April 11, 1914. The services were led by Brother Samuel Weingart assisted by several cantors.

A special meeting of the lodge was held in the afternoon of April 19th, under the auspices of the Intellectual Advancement Committee for the benefit of the older members who find it inconvenient to attend evening meetings. A class of candidates was initiated by the degree team, and at the conclusion of the meeting refreshments were served.

The annual visit of Washington Lodge to the Home for Aged and Infirm at Yonkers will take place on Sunday afternoon, June 7th. The members of the lodge and their friends will attend. An entertainment and a special dinner will be provided for the inmates on that occasion.

GAN EDEN LODGE, TERRE HAUTE, IND.

Much activity is reported by Gan Eden Lodge No. 110 of Terre Haute, Ind., during the past month. The propaganda committee secured applications of five deserving candidates, of which number two have already been initiated.

The principal event in the history of the lodge during the last month was the official visit of Mr. Harry Simon of St. Louis, President of District Grand Lodge No. 2. In his honor a public meeting was held at Temple Israel, which was presided over by Rabbi Kaplan. The principal address was delivered by President Simon, who dwelt upon the activity of the Order and its influence. He was followed by other members, who spoke on the aims and purposes of the Order and specially dwelt upon the immigration aid work which has been taken up by the lodge.

After the close of the public meeting a reception was held and refreshments were served.

What Our Lodges Are Doing

SPRINGFILED LODGE, SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

The social life of the new administration under President Paul Kramer is now in full swing and the interest of members and prospective members aroused by the convention of the District Grand Lodge has not been allowed to flag. The first open meeting had as its chief attraction Joseph C. Allen, actuary of the Union Trust Co., who gave a very interesting talk on "Banking and the New Currency Law." The meeting was largely attended and the lecture was voted very instructive.

The second open meeting was without doubt the most interesting and largest attended of any that have ever been held by the lodge. Much credit is due to the jovial "Senator" Silbert for his part in making the affair a success. The first number was the "Singing Four," a professional act from the Broadway Theater, accompanied by Miss Ruth Beary, an accomplished young pianist of this city, who besides contributing to the success of the entertainment by accompanying the various singers also gave a piano solo that was one of the real pleasures of the evening.

Miss Anna Fuchs gave a soprano solo that was well received. Dr. J. Z. Maurison handed out some "knocks" to the new administration. Miss Anna Glaser gave a serio-comic recitation that brought down the house. Master J. Kelson, 7 years old, gave a selection from Beethoven on the piano. The Venetian Trio played and sang several selections from grand opera. "Happy" Gordewitien accompanied by Miss Ruth Le Bow sang several songs that were well received, and the hit of the evening was contributed by Miss Ruth Powell, a professional from the Broadway Theater, who delighted all with her playing. As an encore Miss Powell played the Kol Nidre in a manner that drew forth the hearty applause of all present.

On the serious side Secretary Herman C. Krotinger spoke on "The Young Man as a Ben B'rith." Rev. Dr. Price spoke on "The Anti-Defamation League," and President Paul Kramer spoke on "The Order and Its Aims."

The degree team, headed by District Deputy Henry Lasker, journeyed down to New Britain Lodge to show them what a real degree team was like. They were shown to their entire satisfaction and they entertained the visitors royally, the members of the degree team voting it the time of their lives.

A number of members journeyed up to see Holyoke Lodge perform the degree on a number of candidates.

Plans are being laid for the annual banquet to which the ladies are to be invited. This being their first invitation, the ladies are very much interested, and some of the unmarried members are a bit chary of what's going to happen while the gentler sex are in the hall.

ANNIVERSARY CELEBRATION OF JACOB B. ULLMAN LODGE, STAMFORD, CONN.

The third anniversary of the institution of the lodge was celebrated on March 29, 1914, with a musical program, addresses, and a banquet. Mr. Herman Ascher of New York, First Vice-President of the District Grand Lodge; Mr. Chas. H. Shapiro of Bridgeport, District Deputy; and Jos. H. Ullman of New Haven, Past President of the District Grand Lodge, and a brother of Jacob B. Ullman, for whom the lodge was named, were the speakers of the evening.

He dwelt upon the many problems of the Jewish people, stating they were caused largely by their own indifference and emphasized the work of the Order in arousing the Jews to realize their obligation to themselves and to their people. INSTITUTION OF B'NAI B'RITH LODGE AT FORREST CITY, ARK.

The institution ceremonies were in charge of the Grand Lodge officers of the District.

By a unanimous vote the membership voted to name the new lodge, the Louis Barnett Lodge, I. O. B. Mayor James L. Scott delivered the address of welcome on behalf of the city.

Dr. F. W. Gee, pastor of the Methodist church, enlarged upon the beauties of the great work that had been launched here by the Jewish people and referred in glowing terms to the cardinal principles of the B'nai B'rith, which is peace, harmony, brotherly love, and in his customary easy and fascinating manner, acquitted himself with credit and his speech was heartily enjoyed by all present.

Hon. O. B. Rollwage reviewed the history of the Jewish people and paid the Jews of Forrest City in particular, a high compliment. The speaker was glad of the opportunity to express his endorsement and offer his congratulations to these people upon such a worthy undertaking as the establishment of a B'nai B'rith lodge in Forrest City.

NEW CASTLE LODGE.

The meeting of New Castle Lodge No. 609, of New Castle, Pa., held on April 12, 1914, was largely attended. The special order of business was the report of the local Anti-Defamation League committee appointed to secure the signatures of moving picture house proprietors to the resolutions adopted by the executive board of the Anti-Defamation League to discard any film which would defame the Jew in any manner.

The Sabbath school under the auspices of the lodge is still keeping up its high average of attendance. A special Seder service for the children was arranged under the auspices of the lodge.

Brother Livingston was introduced by Brother Sylvan E. Hess, President of District Grand Lodge No. 6. Brother Livingston's topic was the work of the Anti-Defamation League and he gave a splendid exposition of its purposes, and outlined the various branches of its work, citing specific instances of results under each head. He also set forth the plans of the League for the future, and emphasized the urgent need for co-operation, particularly on the part of the lodges of the Order. He urged that fundamentally the work is educational, and proved that the handling of the work is deliberate, tactful and successful. He demonstrated the fact that the League is one of the most important pieces of constructive work which has been launched by or under the auspices of the Order for many years. The matter was eloquently and brilliantly presented, as are all of Brother Livingston's efforts, and the address was well received by those present.

A musical program consisting of piano, vocal and violin selections was rendered, and the evening closed with a reception for Brother Livingston.

THE CINCINNATI LODGE NO. 4.

At a regular meeting of The Cincinnati Lodge No. 4, B'nai B'rith, held on April 13, 1914, a class of thirteen candidates was initiated into the order. The ceremonies were exceptionally interesting and impressive and were conducted in the presence of an attendance that filled the large lodge room. There are already some twenty-five additional candidates to be initiated during the month of May, and the number will undoubtedly be increased through the excellent work of the committee on membership, supplemented by the efforts of the individual members. The new accessions represent an exceptionally desirable class of men from the city at large, without reference to class, nativity or shades of Judaism.

DENVER, COL.

The monthly addresses under the auspices of Denver Lodge No. 171 of Denver, Colo., are proving a source of intellectual profit and pleasure to the membership. During the month of May, Brother S. E. Zwetow is scheduled to deliver an address on "The Prejudice Against the Jew."

During the month of March Rabbi Kauvar was the speaker at the social and intellectual advancement meeting. In his address he emphasized the new enthusiasm for things Jewish by the young Jew; the awakened loyalty for things Jewish in our American colleges.

He referred to the Jewish fraternities in our universities, and said that while not so long ago you could not find two Jewish students talking together on any college campus, today they hold their meetings openly, discuss Jewish questions, and take pride in their religion and history. Next to this awakening, he singled out the love for Jewish learning. In every large university there are now chairs for Jewish learning and literature. It is a commonplace to have a professorship in Hebrew. Some day, he hoped, some public spirited Jew of Cclorado will endow a chair for Jewish history or literature in one of our state universities.

DISTRICT PRESIDENT WILL VISIT PITTSBURGH.

The members of B'nai B'rith lodges located in Pittsburgh and Allegheny County are more than pleased with the announcement that on Sunday afternoon, May 10, 1914, Mr. Abe Weil of Philadelphia, President of the District Grand Lodge, will pay an official visit to the lodges.

The meeting of May 10th will be held under the auspices of all the lodges of the Order in Allegheny County, and will be one of the most interesting events in local B'nai B'rith history in the past few years. The visiting Grand Lodge officers attended the meeting for the purpose of initiating a class of 12 members.

This awakening of the lodge has been due to the propaganda committee and the visit of Rabbi Jos. S. Kornfeld of Columbus to put some life in the hitherto indifferent condition of the lodge. The initiatory work of the visiting Grand Lodge officers was excellent in every way and was enjoyed by those present. After the ceremonies remarks were made upon the good work of the Order and the need of every Jew in affiliating with the Order.

Since the above meeting several new applications were secured and the candidates were initiated at a meeting of the lodge held on April 26th.

What Our Lodges Are Doing

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.

Everyone is awaiting with eagerness the next regular meeting of the lodge which will be held Monday evening, May 18. A special hall has been rented for the evening, as the regular meeting hall is not large enough to accommodate the full attendance of the lodge which is expected that evening. The event will be in the nature of a double reception and banquet. Honors will be shared by the pioneers of Minneapolis Lodge, the men who, through their untiring efforts and ceaseless work in the early days of the history of the lodge, have made Minneapolis Lodge what it is today, and Mr. Sylvian E. Hess of St. Paul, President of the district. A special class of fifty will be initiated in their honor.

THE MEMBERS OF THE CINCINNATI LODGE NO. 4, I. O. B. B., MOURN THE LOSS OF OUR BROTHER, ABE BLOCH.

Bound to us in loving kindness, in works of righteousness and of mercy—his death has left a vacancy in our ranks, and a void within our hearts.

Imbued with a sympathetic charity, generous in deed and act and thought, modest and retiring in manner, earnest and consistent in the performance of duty to the District which he loved to serve, and served for eleven years as Treasurer, until the shadow of death clouded his path, controlled by impulse and spirit which ever had thought for the sorrow-stricken and the needy, he has passed to his eternal rest, leaving with his brethren of this lodge tender memories of him and of his work.

The Cincinnati Lodge No. 4, I. O. B. B. extends to his family, to his children, who have received from him the heritage of a good name and a character worthy of emulation, its condolence and sympathy in their bereavement, and directs that a copy of this testimonial be transcribed by the Secretary of this Lodge to the family of Bro. Bloch and placed upon a memorial page of the records of this meeting, and published in The American Israelite, and the B'nai B'rith News.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.

During the visit of Professor Friedlander of the Jewish Theological seminary to New Haven on March 17, 1914, a number of university men discussed with him the aims and objects of the order, and how to outline a program which will best carry them into practice. Professor Friedlander, who is a member of the order, having affiliated himself with it in Germany, referred to the high standard held by the B'nai B'rith Lodges in that country and suggested a policy to be followed which in his opinion he believed would best promote the interests of the order and the people whom it seeks to serve. He strongly urged upon the men of university training to enter the ranks and become leaders in the movement. His suggestions were carefully noted by some of the officers of the lodge, who were fortunate enough to be present, and will be carried out as quickly as circumstances will permit.

The lodge has brought its membership up to 98 and it is more than certain that before the next convention of the Grand Lodge the lodge will have passed the 100 mark. Much recognition is due Brother Jacob Ely, the Secretary, for results achieved.

DISTRICT No. 7.

Memphis Lodge No. 35 of Memphis, Tenn., held a well attended meeting on Sunday morning, April 5, 1914. The special order of business was the adoption of resolutions in memory of Brother Jos. Goodman. A class of candidates was initiated by the degree team of the lodge.

Crescent City Lodge No. 182 of New Orleans, La., held a well attended meeting on April 20th. A special program of literary exercises was arranged for the meeting with Brother Sol Weiss as the principal speaker.

Mr. Isidor Shapiro, a prominent member of the Order of Birmingham, Ala., was elected to the Legislature by Jefferson County, Ala. It is the first time a Jew ever has been honored in this manner in the county.

At a meeting of Houston Lodge No. 608 of Houston, Texas, held at the Concordia Club on April 22, 1914, the lodges of Houston presented Brother Jake H. Sam with a B'nai B'rith pin in appreciation of his services rendered to the B'nai B'rith Lodges of the city.

Due to the efforts of Brother S. H. Harvey, President, the B'nai B'rith Lodge at Muskogee, Okla., is being revived.

Mr. Louis Volmer, one of the leading citizens of Little Rock, Ark., and a prominent member of the Order, passed away at the age of 74 years. As a tribute to his memory the flag on the city hall was ordered lowered to half mast and the city business was suspended during the hours of the funeral.

Louis Barnett Lodge No. 754 of Forrest City, Ark., which was instituted on April 12, 1914, held its first business meeting on Sunday, May 3, 1914. Brother Sol Lewis, delegate of the lodge, who was in attendance at the convention of the District Grand Lodge, submitted full report as to the proceedings of the convention. His remarks were received with much approval and were listened to with great interest.

DISTRICT No. 8.

The Ladies' Auxiliary Society of the Berlin Lodges, of which Mrs. Minna Schwarz is President, whose aim is to take care of women who are awaiting confinement of lying-in Jewish women and their children, has started the construction of a new building for a home for mothers and children. The formal laying of the cornerstone took place recently in the presence of the officers of the society.

District Grand Lodge No. 8 of Germany was the recipient of a donation of 4,000 marks made by a member of Deutsche Reichsloge of Berlin, the interest of which to be used as prizes for essays on "Love for Mankind, Justice and Toleration as Fundamentals of Human Society."

DISTRESS OF THE GALICIAN JEWS.

The president of the Lemberg Advocates' Chamber, Dr. Aschkenazy, deputy for Brody, delivered a striking speech in the Galician Diet, in which he protested against the political injustice that has been done to the Jews of Galicia by the rearrangement of the electoral constituencies. He also described the grave economic distress under which the great majority of the population are suffering. He stated that the results of the government inquiry into the Jewish situation were mouldering in the archives of the Diet, whilst the Jews themselves were daily sinking into ruin. Dr. Aschkenazy proposed that a special Patronage Committee should be appointed to alleviate the material distress of the Galician Jews.

ANTI-JEWISH DEMONSTRATION IN ROUMANIA.

Anti-Semitic students of Focshani, Roumania, recently made an anti-Jewish demonstration in the theatre during a performance by Jewish actors. Subsequently they marched through the streets and broke many windows in Jewish houses. The rioters only dispersed when they were promised by the police that the Jewish actors would not be allowed to appear at the theatre in future.

GOVERNOR OF TIBERIAS REMOVED FROM OFFICE.

Through the instigation of the Chief Rabbi of Turkey, the Governor of Tiberias was removed from office because he took no steps toward protecting the Jewish colonists in that district against the attacks of the Arabs. The Chief Rabbi made representations to the governor in Constantinople, pointing out the negligence of the Governor, with the result that his dismissal was ordered.

ANTI-JEWISH BOYCOTT IN ROUMANIA.

The Nationalists have published a pamphlet in Jassy, which is distributed broadcast, in which the Roumanians of all classes are called upon to boycott the Jews all along the line. It is claimed in the leaflet that the socialist movement is the work of the Jews and that the latter are responsible for the poor economic condition of the Roumanian peasants.

HAHAM BASHI AT BRITISH EMBASSY.

Sir Louis Mallet, the British Ambassador to the Porte, gave a diplomatic dinner at the Embassy on March 21. Among the invited guests were the Haham Bashi and Mrs. Nahoum, whom the Ambassador had previously informed that he had arranged a kosher repast for them. This is the first time a chief rabbi of Turkey has been invited to a diplomatic banquet.

VOLTAIRE ABOUT THE JEWS.

The "English Review" recently published some expressions of Voltaire which remained unknown up to this time. Among them is also the following: "When I hear Christians insult the Jews, it appears to me as if children were beating their father."

ANNUAL CONVENTION OF DISTRICT GRAND LODGE NO. 7.

of Meridian, Miss., Wednesday morning's session was opened.

The work of the American Hygiene Association, which is working against the white salve traffic, was indorsed, an appropriation allowed to help in the fight, and a specal committee named to lend the assistance of B'nai B'rith of this District.

Committees were also named to assist Jewish immigration and farming, especially to establish a Jewish farming colony in this section of the country.

One of the particularly impressive features of the morning session was the reading of resolutions of thanks by Chairman Solomon Marx of a committee on that subject, and the presentation of a symbolic cane to Mr. Marx, who is the oldest living member of B'nai B'rith.

A resolution was also adopted for the appointment of three members from each State to co-operate with the Anti-Defamation League.

The selection of Little Rock as the next place of meeting; appropriation of liberal allowances for various charitable institutions, consideration of the question of Jewish immigration and agricultural development were special features of the morning session.

An interesting feature in the entertainment program was the noon-day banquet on Wednesday to the Rabbis attending the convention. It was given by the Scottish Rite Masonic bodies of Shreveport. All the Rabbis, 16 in number, and all 32nd degree Masons, attended.

Afternoon Session.

A particularly exciting debate was brought about by the recommendation of the committee on laws to change the constitution of the District Grand Lodge altering requirements for lodge delegates to the convention. The opposition was principally based upon the argument that the adoption of such a recommendation would bring about a reduced attendance at the convention and work hardship on the smaller lodges of the District. The proposition was overwhelmingly defeated.

Mr. Emil Nathan of St. Louis, chairman of the Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital Fund Committee, recommended the approval of the debenture plan so as to provide sufficient funds to clear up outstanding obligations of the Hospital. By resolution the plan recommended by Brother Nathan was approved and subscriptions amounting to almost $10,000 from the delegates representing their respective lodges were announced.

The committee on resolutions presented report expressing thanks for the hospitality received in Shreveport.

Rabbi Samfield of Memphis paid a high tribute to Brother S. A. Marx of New Orleans, now 80 years old, who has been a member of the Order for 58 years, in presenting Brother Marx with a cane as a suitable symbol of his journey in the highway of B'nai B'irth endeavors.

A special committee was appointed to confer with the Jewish Agricultural and Industrial Aid Society of New York to secure funds to finance the agricultural plan advocated by the committee, also with a view of establishing a Jewish colony in District No. 7.

The appointment of standing committees for the year was then announced by the President and three new standing committees were created, namely: One on Leo N. Levi Hospital, one on credentials and one on resolutions.

Various changes in the organic law of the District were then presented by the committee on law and adopted.

Further time was granted the special committee appointed to compile a history of the lodges of District No. 7.

The standing committee on ways and means for the establishment of a home for aged and infirm was appointed to consider the advisability of establishing such an institution and submit report at the next convention.

The special order of business for the afternoon session was the memorial exercises.

After disposing of various routine matters the convention adjourned sine die.

JEWISH PERSECUTION RUINING RUSSIAN COMMERCE.

The Council of Trade and Commerce has resolved to send a deputation to the Russian Government with the object of presenting a memorial pointing out that the present anti-Jewish regime is ruining the commerce of the Empire and filling the pockets of foreign competitors.

RASHI, HIS CHARACTER AND INFLUENCE

By Morris Cahan

There are not many individuals in Jewish history, who are known to us by a word formed of the initials of their name. It is only those men who have left an indelible impress on Jewish histotry and Jewish literature, that have deserved this distinction of being best known to posterity by a name the letters of which are the initials of the words comprising their real name. A man like Maimonides, for instance, is popularly called among us Rambam, which is simply a word consisting of the initials of Rabenu Moses Ben Maimmon; the great Jewish mystic Nachmanides is similarly called Ramban, a word also formed of the initials of Rabbi Moses Ben Nachman. And so is the immortal and most popular Jewish commentator best known to posterity by the short word or name of Rashi, consisting of the three Hebrew letters which are the initials of Rabbi Solomon Yitzhaki, or the son of Isaac. After this Jewish scholar had become so popular that his name had become a househoud word among all the various classes of our people, he was constantly and affectionately referred to by that abbreviated name.

Now, let us analyze this master's character and activity and let us try to find out what were the elements in his mental and spiritual life that tended to make him so famous and so conspicuous. Rashi must, indeed, have possessed a giant intellect and he must have been swayed by the highest ideals, if after a lapse of eight centuries since his death, his name is still remembered and revered among the whole house of Israel; his writings still serve as an indispensable guide to those who attempt to find their way in the labyrinths of Jewish lore and his erudition is still held in the highest esteem by scholars of all creeds and countries.

Rashi was born in the year 1040, in the City of Troyes, Northern France, and died in the year 1105 in the same city, hence he is sometimes referred to as Rabbi Solomon Hazorfasi or the Frenchman. Like all other rare personages in history, tradition has lovingly surrounded Rashi's name and memory with interesting stories and miraculous narratives. Thus it is claimed that when the mother of Rashi was pregnant with him, she happened once to be on a narrow street, a wagon passed by near her and pushed her to the wall. An accident would have been the inevitable result, the mother of Rashi would have been injured and the child in her would have been crushed. But then God performed a miracle and that wall was pressed in and thus the child that was to become Rashi and his mother were saved. It is further claimed that the spot where the wall was thus pushed in can still be seen by people who visit that place.

Of course, we understand that that story is merely a legend; it is merely one of those fantastic tales which we find narrated in connection with all illustrious personages in history. But critically considered, those fanciful legends are of value in so far as they indicate how high a place Rashi occupied in the popular mind and imagination. It is evident that his contemporaries looked up to him as a man of rare learning and extraordinary attainments.

Above all things, Rashi was a profound scholar, and that becomes apparent when we remember how extensive a field of Jewish literature is covered by his commentaries. Nearly the entire Bible is explained by Rashi and almost every book of the Talmud, with a few exceptions, is commented upon by him.

The style of his writings has been characterized as being concise, perspicuous and succinct; in other words, when this great commentator explains some word or passage in the Bible or the Talmud, he actually explains it and makes it clear. And that is the reason why Rashi is so popular among students of Jewish literature. There are some other Jewish commentators, but there is this disadvantage in referring to them: Their style is not always clear. Their diction is obscure and bombastic and altogether they are complex, verbose and even mystifying. As an example of this undesirable class of commentators, one might mention Ibn Ezra, whose commentaries are full of mystifying passages and whose explanations are not clear and do not always explain. But not so with Rashi; him, even the beginner can understand and appreciate and he is really a help to those who find themselves struggling with some difficult passage in the Bible or Talmud. Sometimes one word or one phrase by this master of commentators clears up an entire situation that otherwise would be hard to grasp or to comprehend.

Hence, it is that in most of our editions of the Bible or the Talmud we find the commentaries of Rashi printed as marginal notes, side by side with the original. His explanations of the texts have become part and parcel of the Biblical and Talmudical writings, which are the source and fountain head of Jewish literature. This commentary cannot be studied or read as a work separate and distinct in itself, but it must be read in conjunction with the text which it seeks to explain. Rashi's method is to cite the first word or phrase of the passage on which he undertakes to comment and very briefly to explain that passage. In most cases a few words are required by him to make clear an ambiguous or difficult text, very frequently one word of comment throws light on a baffling passage.

Rashi's explanations are particularly invaluable to the students of the Talmud. In this vast literature known as the Talmud, which has come down to us from early antiquity when the art of printing was unknown, no punctuation of any kind had been introduced. For many generations, those treasures of knowledge now known as the Talmud had been carried about in the minds of scholars, because that knowledge was then known as "Torah Shebaal Peh" or the Oral Law and our people were then in duty bound to know that literature by rote and thus it was handed down from sire to son. And when the time came and it was considered permissible and even necessary to commit that literature to writing, the texts were in a primitive and chaotic state and to many the Talmud appeared like a long series of mere words, words and words. The reader and even the student of this Talmudic literature is, therefore, very grateful, whenever his task is made less difficult. Any explanation given in connection with those complicated passages is like an oasis to the parched caravan of the dreary desert.

And that is exactly what Rashi does in his commentaries, on the Talmud. His explanations are of genuine worth and assistance, because his method is simple and his vocabulary is not beyond the grasp even of those who are only novices in this literature. Quite frequently he uses a French or German word or phrase when he tries to make his meaning clear and occasionally he uses a diagram to illustrate a thought or an idea. He spared no pains to simplify the complex and to illumine that which was obscure.

As was intimated above, the writings of Rashi cannot be understood and published in separate volumes by themselves; they are best appreciated when read in conjunction with the texts commented upon. They should be characterized as marginal notes and the best and most popular editions of the Bible or the Talmud contain those notes of Rashi. The first printed edition of these commentaries appeared in the year

OLD AND NEW PROBLEMS

By H. Eliassof

The old problems which have been confronting Judaism in all the ages of its existence, especially since the beginning of the diaspora, are still with us. They seem to disappear for long or short periods of time, but they always reappear on the horizon of Jewish life and demand our earnest attention and watchful consideration. But the worst of it is that while we are struggling with the old problems and are striving hard to find solutions for the old perplexities which threaten to undermine the structure of Judaism and to destroy the pillars which generations have built up as props and supports of our ancient culture, we are forced to face new problems, or new phases of the old difficulties, which take us by surprise and for which we are utterly unprepared. The old problems of assimilation, mixed marriage and baptism were, as a rule, always with us. They were less evident during those periods of history when bitter persecutions assailed the Jewish people from all sides. Suffering steeled the Jew to resolute resistance, to greater solidarity and to a united defense of the treasures of Judaism inherited from the fathers. The days of the greatest, most general and most widespread Jewish persecution are distinguished in Jewish history as the days of the greatest Jewish martyrdom. The slaughtering swords of the Crusaders found the throats of many Jewish heroes, who knew how to die for Kiddush hashem, for the sanctification of the Holy Name. The auto-da-Fes of the Inquisition kindled thousands of fires of religious enthusiasm in the souls of the Jewish martyrs, who died that Judaism might live. Then the old problems lost their threatening significance and their force of danger to Judaism was broken. But as soon as the cruelty of the kings, the priests and the mobs relaxed and the Jews were permitted to breathe a little more freely the old problems of assimilation, mixed marriage and baptism again raised their heads and menaced and threatened Judaism, sometimes in more and at other times in less aggravated form. In the course of time the Jews became used to the presence of these problems in their midst and they succeeded in curbing their power of destruction and blunting the sharpness of their pernicious influence. Alarms were often raised by well-meaning friends and malicious enemies of Judaism. They pointed with trepidation to these forces of disintegration as harbingers of the death and the annihilation of Judaism, but their prophesies always proved false. Judaism suffered more or less losses through the malignant influences of these problems, but it always withstood the presaged danger of destruction; it always survived and continued to live in the hearts of the Jewish people as a boon and a blessing.

It is indeed not strange at all that today we are called upon to wrestle with the same old problems of assimilation, mixed marriage and baptism. We are living in an enlightened age, an age of civilization and of liberty. In the enlightened countries of the world the rulers and the people have to a great extent discarded the superstitions of the dark ages and the cruelties of those days of religious fanaticism. The priests have lost much of their power and the church no longer sways the masses as it used to do in times gone by. In the republics and in the constitutional monarchies the Jews have been emancipated and enjoy more rights to-day than they ever did before. The Jews have light, and where there is light there are also shadows. These old problems are the shadows which always follow in the wake of the sun of Jewish liberty. And, as always, we have now, too, all kinds of alarmists who point to these old problems of assimilation, mixed marriage and baptism and try to figure out the end of Judaism. For some time the lamentations have been loud in the land that Judaism is fast losing its strength; that it is growing weaker every day and will soon be unable to hold its own in the modern world; that ignorance of Jewish lore is steadily increasing among the Jews and indifference to Jewish ideals is continually growing in the midst of Israel. Many signs of the speedy disintegration of Judaism are being pointed out on all sides and the conclusion is rashly reached that the ancient faith of Israel, which has so successfully resisted the most powerfully pernicious influences of its surrounding cultures during the many centuries of persecution and martyrdom is now yielding and surrendering to Christian culture, to modern philosophy of materialistic tendency, to atheism, socialism and even anarchism. The Jew, it is claimed, is no longer an idealist; he has lost his dreams of salvation, his God and his heaven, and is scrambling with the rest of the hungry horde, greedy for gold, for a seat at any cost at the banquet table of wealth. The statisticians flount their statistical tables and claim that assimilation and modernization, intermarriage and baptism are playing havoc in the Jewish camp; that they are wiping out the Jews of Denmark; that they have reduced Judaism in Italy to a mere shadow of its former self; that they have caused it to become so feeble in France that it can hardly survive much longer; that the Jews are gradually dying out in Germany, Austria, England and in the Scandinavian countries. Dr. Felix A. Theilhaber, a statistician of Jena, declares in his book, "Perishing of the German Jews," that the Jews are doomed; that there is nothing in the future for Jewry except what Mr. Zangwill calls disappearance and utter extinction. He tells us that the Jews in Germany are being decimated by religious conversion and by mixed marriages. In Berlin forty-four per cent. of the marriages in which the Jew is one party have a Christian as the other party. In Hamburg, where thirty years ago the proportion of mixed marriages was only seven per cent., it is now thirty-four per cent. In Denmark, Dr. Theilhaber tells us, mixed marriages are almost as frequent as pure Jewish marriages. Dr. Fishberg, the noted anthropologist, also harps on the same string. He tells us that in Sweden the number of mixed marriages is far in excess of the number of pure Jewish marriages. Every thirteenth Jew who married in Budapest a few years ago, says Dr. Fishberg, married a Christian. Similar conditions prevail in English-speaking countries. They exist to a great extent in the Southern and Western portions of the United States and in the British colonies. Other alarmists emphasize the report that more than 500 Jews are being baptized annually in Austria, and the number of meshumodim is growing greater in the entire world from year to year. They all prophesy the speedy death of Judaism.

To all these prognosticators of Jewish disaster I wish to say that these are old Jewish problems which Judaism has been facing in the diaspora in all times of Jewish rest from persecution. These old dangers have never succeeded in destroying Judaism, and the chances are that they will fail in our days, too, to accomplish the predicted extinction of the Jew. These problems are old, older than the diaspora; they have continually menaced Judaism, but they never have been able to wipe it out of existence. History tells us that the Jews at one time assimilated Greek speech, manners, and culture. Hellenism was the greatest influence of a foreign culture against which Judaism had to struggle, and Judaism was victorious in the end. Hellenism existed from the 4th century B. C. through the first century of the common era. The Hellenic influence pervaded everything and affected even the ordinary things of life and the common association of the Jewish people. Greek polytheism became a real danger to the Jewish religion. Conditions were almost similar to the conditions of today. The introduction of Greek games, with all their levity, into the midst of Israel made it necessary for the Jewish participants to conceal the signs of their origin. In Alexandria Hellenistic Judaism became more Hellenistic than Jewish. But it was at last driven out from the Jewish camp by the sentiment aroused in the Maccabean and Bar Kokba revolts.

No, the old problems need not frighten and discourage us. They are the outgrowth of the emancipated and free Jewish life among the enlightened nations of the world. Judaism will not perish from their influences. As it survived them in the days of our fathers so it will survive them in our days.

All the alarming statistical reports from Italy, France, Germany, Austria, Sweden, Denmark, England and America need not cause us to despair of the life of our Jewish culture. The Jews of these enlightened countries are passing through a period of transition. Judaism will adjust itself to the new political and economic conditions. The hearts of the Jewish fathers and of the Jewish children will turn to the Jewish ideals and the old problems of assimilation, intermarriage and baptism will remain impotent and unable to dig a grave for Judaism as they were powerless to bury our faith in all the centuries of its existence.

We need not lose hope in the presence of these old problems. The more hopefully we face them the less harm they will be able to accomplish. But how shall we meet the new problems, or perhaps we better say the new phase of the old problems, which is now being forced upon Judaism by the Jews in Russia? This new Jewish problem is indeed a complete surprise to us and we are utterly unprepared to deal with it. Nobody can claim that Russia is a free and enlightened country where Judaism has to adjust itself to liberal political and economic conditions. The light of liberty certainly does not shine upon the life of the Russian Jew. There, on the contrary, he has to suffer all the bitter persecutions which the Jews had to endure during the darkest ages. Could the most raging royal tyrants and the most frenzied fanatical mobs of mediaeval times boast of greater cruelty to the Jews than is being shown to them by the Czar and his black hundreds? Was it possible for the Spanish Inquisition to invent greater tortures for their Jewish victims than the Russian pale, the pogroms, the blood accusations and the Siberian exile? Darkest Russia has surely enough oppression and enough suffering for her Jews to awaken all their power of religious resistance, and yet the latest reports from Russia inform us of the prevalence of a veritable epidemic of baptism among the Russian Jews! These reports state that Jewish young men are deserting the faith of their fathers, are rushing by the hundreds into the arms of Christianity, and they forfeit neither the esteem nor the friendship of their people; they remain in the family circle and mingle with the members of the community which they had forsaken, taking, in some instances, even an active part in the communal institutions! But the strangest fact in Jewish history is the following part of the very latest report from Russia: About thirty Jewish young men recently joined the Protestant church for the purpose of gaining admission to the University of St. Petersburg. They were refused acceptance by the government because they were not converted to Greek Catholicism. They could not join the Greek Catholic church, because it is against the Russian law for converts to Protestantism to become Greek Catholics These meshumodim have therefore decided to return to Judaism and then join the Greek Catholic church. They make no secret of their ultimate intention and, as in order to carry out their novel undertaking they are in need of a certificate to prove to the ecclesiastical authorities of the Greek Catholic church that they were legally readmitted to the synagogue, they have actually applied to the rabbi of St. Petersburg for a certificate! In other words, these meshumodim who had already deserted their Jewish faith ask the rabbi to help them to repeat the performance and to make a laughing stock of the Jew and of Judaism! Can anybody imagine a more disheartening chaotic entanglement, a more flagrant anarchistic aspect of a religious question than the one presented by this group of meshumodim in the midst of the Russian Jewry? Truly this new problem, or this new phase of the old problems, is enough to dishearten the strongest religious optimist among the Jews!

GENERAL MARIE-GORGES PICQUART.

A Personal Reminiscence.

By Rev. A. Blum.

In the year 1900, while I was on a visit to France, the editor of "The Daily Jewish Journal" delegated me to present some tokens of esteem to Captain Dreyfus, Emile Zola and Colonel Picquart, and those presents were purchased with the money contributed mostly by the Jewish people of the East Side of New York, though some contributions came from non-Jewish admirers of those three heroes.

The presents consisted of a beautiful album, every page hand painted, for Captain Dreyfus; a solid gold pen and a beautiful set of engrossed resolutions for Emile Zola, and a large solid silver loving cup for Colonel Picquart.

About the middle of July, while in Paris, I called on M. Salomon Reinach, after I had already delivered the presents to Captain Dreyfus and Emile Zola, knowing that Mr. Reinach was an intimate friend of Colonel Picquart, and I asked him to arrange a meeting for me with Colonel Picquart.

It is necessary to know that at that time Colonel Picquart lived in seclusion, for he knew that his life was not safe. M. Salomon Reinach called at my hotel one morning and told me that Colonel Picquart would be glad to see me that afternoon. Accordingly, in the afternoon I took a cab and was drvien to a very secluded place in Paris. I climbed three flights of stairs and, knocking at the door and holding the loving cup in my hand, I was ushered into the presence of that noble man, Colonel Picquart. Being a countryman of his, an Alsatian, I soon felt at home with him. In presenting him the silver loving cup, I told him how much the Jewish people of New York admired his self-sacrifice for one of our race, by his action proving to the world that a Jew was a patriot and not a traitor to his country. Colonel Picquart was highly pleased with the token of esteem from our New York Jewish citizens, but he said: "I don't want the French people—rather those of my enemies among them—to say that I accepted gold or silver from the Jewish people; and I therefore beg of you to take this beautiful cup back with you to New York and place it in one of your institutions, as a token of love and esteem from me to them and from them to me. I will ever cherish their kind intention."

I brought it back, and the cup is today in one of the cases at the Educational Alliance. By rights, as a piece of history, it ought to be placed in care of the American Jewish Historical Society.

France, regretting the wrong done him, wished to right it by creating him Minister of War, and after resigning that position he remained a general in the army until a terrible accident—the fall from his horse—hastened his death.

To such men as Emile Zola, Shemer Kestner, Bernard Lazare and Colonel Picquart, who while defending Dreyfus defended Israel, we owe a debt of gratitude and a prayer for the rest of their souls.

POLISH HOSTILITY TO THE JEWS.

At a conference of high school students recently held in the city of Warsaw, Poland, the following resolution was adopted:

"Whereas, It is the duty of the Polish people to defend and preserve their language and their culture; and

"Whereas, The Government has undertaken with renewed energy the 'Russification' of Poland;

"Resolved, That we pledge ourselves to speak nothing but the Polish language in our schools, and that we establish additional clubs for the study and development of Polish literature; also

"Resolved, That the struggle against the Jews is one of the highest duties which life has set before us."

THE DISRUPTION OF JEWRY

By Israel Cohen

We reprint from the "Daily Mail" of London the following article, which must be of keen interest to our people:

It may seem somewhat paradoxical to speak of the disruption of the Jewish people when, for the first time in their history, they now exceed thirteen millions and are distributed in countless vigorous communities over a larger area of the globe than they have hitherto occupied in the annals of their dispersion. These facts are in themselves so imposing that they convey the impression of inexhaustible strength and irresistible development; but if we pierce behind these external phenomena and study the inner currents of Jewish life we shall see that a widespread process of dissolution is going on.

This dissolution is not by any means due to the physical qualities of the Jew: on the contrary, the Jew has a superior record in the matter of disease and death to all other peoples on earth. Statistical researches both in Europe and America have shown that the Jews enjoy a greater immunity from illness than their fellow citizens, and that their rates of mortality are invariably the lowest in their respective countries.

Less Adherence to Tradition.

The dissolution is due to the social advancement of the Jews—to their increasing intercourse with the peoples around them, on the one hand, and to their increasing standard of comfort on the other. Civil emancipation, emigration from the East to the West, and modern education all promote religious indifference, for the more the Jew mingles in the Gentile world the less observant does he become of the laws and customs treasured by his forefathers. Hence for the last hundred years there has been a steady stream of desertion from the fold of Israel which has grown in volume from decade to decade. Religious laxity, actual apostasy, and intermarriage are the three main processes whereby the Jewish community is being sapped of its natural vigor. These may be attributed directly to external influences, but internal influences are also at work in causing a decline of the birth rate and the marriage rate.

The great majority of Jews are attached to their community primarily through membership of the synagogue, but the appeal of the house of prayer becomes feebler from year to year. The demands of the economic struggle make regular attendance on the Sabbath and ordinary festivals impossible, and hence the bulk of Jewry has reduced its visits to the synagogue to a single day in the year—the Day of Atonement, when the penitence of twenty-four hours is expected to atone for the indifference of three hundred and sixty-four days. But a growing proportion of Jews, having lost both the piety and the faith of their fathers, do not visit the synagogue even on this Day of Awe, and slowly drift away from the commuinty without any particular act of renunciation. On the other hand, the number of those who formally sever their connection with Judaism and enter within the pale of Christendom increases from year to year. The motives of conversion are invariably to be sought in the desire of advancement, social and professional. In countries like England and America, in which Judaism confers no disability before the law, the espousal of the Christian faith by a Jew or Jewess is invariably the prelude to the espousal of a rich Christian consort. In Austria and Germany baptism is the premium that a Jew must pay to secure an appointment in the Civil Service or at a university, while in Russia, where a whole mass of medieval laws crush the life out of the Jewish community, apostasy, apart from emigration, is the quickest road to redemption.

Defections to Christianity.

A German pastor, J. de Leroy, has calculated, upon the basis of a careful and systematic investigation, that 224,000 Jews were baptised in the nineteenth century, while the famous theologian Dalman estimates the number at 250,000. This would give an average of 2,500 desertions per annum. However appalling this number may seem, it is likely to be even exceeded in the present century if the prevalent rate of Jewish baptisms is maintained. In Austria there are 900 defections a year on the average, in Hungary there are 406, and in Germany there are 480. Thus in these three countries alone there are nearly 1,800 Jewish conversions a year, and yet these countries do not contain even one-fourth of the world's Jewish population. In Germany there are thousands of Jews who, while themselves nominally attached to their community, have no hesitation in leading their children to the baptismal font so as to remove all possible obstacles in their subsequent career. In Russia there is at present a veritable epidemic of apostasy in Jewry, caused by the loss of hope in any other way of securing civil equality. It has been confidently asserted by those intimately acquainted with the conditions in the Pale of Settlement that more Jewish baptisms have taken place there during the last two years than during the previous twenty years. The class in which they are most prevalent is that of the students, who are not admitted, except in an insignificant proportion, to the universities solely on account of their Judaism, and hence wholesale defections take place on the eve of every academic session.

The growth of religious indifference naturally leads to an increase of mixed marriages. Nuptial unions between Jews and Christians have frequently taken place in Europe ever since the impoverished French nobles in the days of Napoleon redeemed their mortgaged estates with the dowries of Jewish brides, and aristocratic families in England followed the examples of seeking alliances with the daughters of Israel. There is now quite an extensive array of titled and princely families with a strain of Jewish blood in most of the countries of Europe, and the rate of intermarriage is steadily on the increase. In Catholic countries mixed marriages are forbidden and hence the proportion that they form of all Jewish marriages in Vienna is only 11 per cent, and in Budapest 16.5 per cent. But in Germany mixed marriages form 25 per cent of all Jewish marriages, in Berlin the percentage is 44, and Hamburg even 50 per cent. It is highest of all in Copenhagen, where 85 per cent of the Jewish marriages take place with a Christian consort. It is a moot point whether such mixed unions are less fertile than purely Jewish marriages, but there is little doubt that not more than a tenth of the offspring of these unions remain within the Jewish fold.

Declining Birth Rate.

The decline of the birth rate is one of the most notable phenomena in modern Jewish life. Formerly the Jewish family had an average of five or six children, but the average in the new generation varies from two to four. This decline is due to the increase of celibacy, the postponement of the age of marriage, and other causes. In Prussia the birth rate among the Jews has sunk from 35.46 per 1,000 in the years 1822-40 to 17.79 in 1903-7, and a similar though less striking decline has also taken place in Russia and in Austria-Hungary. The diminished birth rate is partly counterbalanced by a low mortality, but in many countries, nevertheless, the Jewish community shows an inferior natural increase to that of the Christian population. In Prussia the Jews increased only by 3.86 per 1,000 in 1903-7, while the Christians increased by 15.02 per 1,000, and in Austria the rates were 7.25 and 9.26 respectively in the period 1901-10. The inevitable effect has been that in various countries the Jews have become a diminishing proportion of the general population.

The general process of dissolution that is going on in modern Jewry increases with its own momentum, and it is natural that those who are zealous for the preservation of Israel should look forward anxiously to the future. Only in two ways can the present disruption be stayed; either by a universal religious revival or by the creation of a Jewish commonwealth in Palestine. The possibility of a spiritual revival in these days of rationalism and industrialism must be discounted, and hence the surest hope of salvation consists in a restoration of Jewish national life in the Holy Land.

TO OPPOSE THE ACTIVITIES OF THE MISSIONARIES IN PALESTINE.

The practice of the Christian Missionaries in Palestine to use all kinds of means in order to alienate the Jewish pupils who attend their schools from the faith of their fathers, has at last induced the Jewish parents in Jerusalem to found a defensive organization. A committee was formed which will organize this important defense work. It is the intention to inaugurate similar activity in other cities in Palestine where missionary schools exist. In the city of Jerusalem alone several hundred Jewish children attend the protestant mission schools.

BY PROF. GOTTHARD DEUTSCH, Ph.D.

VIII.

Philosophy of history is a high-sounding term and yet it is very simple. It merely means that we do not look for the individual facts of history but for their motives, which, being based on psychology, are the same through all ages and climes. It is just as with electricity. It may be used for the purpose of transportation, for lighting, cooking, or the reproduction of pictures, but it is always electricity.

One of the features that occur all times in history is the struggle between the old, unwilling to yield leadership, and the young, eager to assume it. The author of the book of Ecclesiastes, whom tradition assumes to be King Solomon, speaks already of the old foolish king who was displaced by a young man, so popular, that there was no end of all the people who followed him, but "They that come after shall not rejoice in him" (Eccl. IV, 13-16). A Talmudic legend tells us that when David grew old, he heard the people say, "When will that old fellow die, and make room for his son, so that the temple can be built?" (Makkot, 10, a.) This sounds rather modern. We may hear the same cry in many an American congregation, eager to retire their old minister, so that they can elect a new man whose eloquence would be strong enough to make people subscribe for the building of a new temple.

It must be understood that philosophy of history is not restricted to the one phenomenon of the rivalry between old and young. The fight against trusts, considered an entirely modern problem is very old when we look at its psychological root, the provocation of the masses at wealth, accumulated in a few hands. The prophet Isaiah (V, 8) cries his "Woe unto those who join house to house and lay field to field till there be no room!" The agitation, led in Rome by the Gracchi brothers, was exactly the same thing as our attempts to curb the trusts, though the question then was one of accumulating land instead of ore or coal. It is, however, not my purpose to write on philosophy of history, but to prove it in the case of the struggle between the old generation, represented by the rabbis, and the younger, represented by the teachers.

The bitterness of the struggle began at the end of the eighteenth century as a result of what might be called secularization of education. We hear Rabbi Phineas Horwitz of Frankfurt a. M. (1730-1805) bitterly denounce "the corrupt generation" that wishes to give its children a secular education. "Depart from them!" the rabbi calls out, "they are unclean; have no contact with them!" Similarly his contemporary, Ezekiel Landau of Prague (1713-1793) says that boys should not be instructed in a systematic way, beginning with Hebrew grammar and then going to the Bible and easier Talmudic texts, but start with the study of the Talmud, as soon as they are able to master the Hebrew alphabet. By a bold interpretation he finds this idea expressed already in the dying words spoken by Rabbi Eliezer in the Talmudic report (Berakot, 28, b). In a eulogy delivered (1793) in honor of his father-in-law, Israel Jonas Fraenkel, Landrabbiner of Silesia, Rabbi Wolf Eger used such vehement expressions in denouncing the advocates of a modernized educational system that the trustees of the Breslau congregation brought charges against him before the authorities of the government.

It is no wonder that the teachers heartily reciprocated this sentiment. Herz Homberg (1759-1841) of Prague, suggested to the government that the appointment of rabbis be entirely prohibited, because they are an obstacle in the way of progress. The antagonism of Homberg and his sympathizers like Peter Beer (1759-1838), David Friedlender (1750-1834), Michael Creizenach (1789-1842), and so many others, to the rabbis of the old school assumed a different form in the succeeding generation. In the first half of the 19th century, the antagonism to secular education had practically ceased. The generation, following Ezekiel Landau and Phineas Horwitz, practically, and sometimes expressly, condoned the demand for secular education, Eleazar Fleckeles, Landau's disciple and successor (1755-1826), quotes Mendelssohn and Hartwig Wessely with respect, and it is certainly significant that his biography was written by his son-in-law, Rabbi Isaac Spitz, in German, and that the latter's grandson is Moritz Hartman, the well-known German poet and member of the Parliament in 1848. It is still more significant that Hirsch Horwitz (d. 1817) of Frankfurt a. M., son and successor of Phineas, even approved of services conducted in German in the school which his father had condemned.

Prague, which was a center of culture, established a school as early as 1782, in the same year, when Emperor Joseph II issued his famous "Toleranzedikt." In the provincial towns the movement was slower. Nikolsburg established its school in 1839, and when I came to that city, thirty years later, boarding with a teacher who had been connected with the school since its foundation, I never heard of any opposition that this school had to encounter on the part of the then Landrabbiner Nehemias Trevitch (1774-1842), though the latter was strongly opposed to a secular education of the rabbis. When in our little Kanitz, a school was established in 1852, our Rabbi Marcus Trieschet (1794-1866) raised no objection to its principle. He read and wrote German, writing a very beautiful hand. My personal recollections of him are naturally very dim, as I was only seven years old when he died. I remember, however, quite well during the war of 1866, that I brought him every day the Vienna "Presse," the then popular, now extinct paper, which was superseded by the "Neue Freie Presse," established two years before, always announcing the most important news that father had told me to report. A newspaper was a luxury in those days in our circles, and one paper served three or four subscribers. The rabbi occupied in the congregational building an apartment, if this term may be applied to such a condition, consisting of two rooms and a kitchen. On the other side the principal of the school occupied an apartment of three rooms, and upstairs were three school-rooms and "the city hall," consisting of another room. After the decisive battle of Koeniggraetz, July 3, 1866, the victorious Prussian army marched southward towards Vienna, and our little town had to furnish accommodations at one time for 1,000 soldiers, about one-third of its regular inhabitants. The quartermaster selected the Jewish school building for a hospital for the numerous cholera patients, but the rabbi refused to leave the house, and, falling a victim to the contagion, he died August 6. The cry "The Sona (enemy) comes!" had still the meaning of terror, and the rabbi who had hidden the few valuables that he possessed was afraid to leave the house. The traditions of terror may have gone back to the days of the Napoleonic wars, for the battle of Austerlitz was fought within fifty miles of our town and even the war of thirty years, which also devastated our country considerably was not quite forgotten. The old rabbi once scolded the boys who had damaged his Sukkah in the school-yard, calling them Swedes ("etz Schweden, wos etz seids").

The first principal of the newly established school was David Loewy (1821-1902). He was a native of Eidlitz in Bohemia and the grandson of the rabbi of that place, who died in 1831 as rabbi of Teplitz, and Kreisrabbiner of the district of Saaz, and is probably identical with the Kreisrabbiner Isaiah Loewi of Falkenau, who in 1795 invokes the aid of the government against David Moser, the keeper of a kosher restaurant in Karlsbad for living in common household with a woman who is not his wife. (Ziegler in "Dokumente zur Geschichte der Juden in Karlsbad," p. 28, Karlsbad, 1913.) There are two conflicting statements in the Talmud. One (Nedarim, 81, a) says that the sons of scholars are rarely ever scholars because otherwise people will believe that scholarship is merely inherited. Another statement (Baba Mezia, 85, a) says exactly the opposite. It reads that the Thorah always returns to the same inn. In the case of David Loewy, both statements prove true. His father was a plain every-day peddler, called Moshe 'n Rov's; he was a gifted and ambitious man. Without more education than a primitive little country town in Bohemia could give, he acquired a considerable amount of knowledge as an autodidact. Bohemia, in those days, was very productive of teachers. The reason is obvious. The Jews there lived scattered, with two or three exceptions, notably that of Prague, the average congregation may have counted twenty to thirty families. A great many Jews lived in villages, entirely unattached, as distillers, toll-gate keepers, and the like. Everywhere a teacher was needed, and therefore it was easy for a boy of some attainment to make a livelihood in this way. A boy of 15, if he was proficient in reading his prayers, and knew a little "Chumish" was sure to find a home with Randar. If he knew the ritual law about killing chickens, and the traditional chant for prayers on holidays, he would easily find a congregation that would engage his services. If he was made of the right kind of stuff, he got from the Kreis-rabbiner a certificate as teacher, or he would go to Prague and take a half year's course at the "Paedagogium," or obtain a certificate from Professor Wolfgang Wessely (1801-1870), originally principal of a religious school, and afterwards professor of law at the University of Prague.

Such was the case of our David Loewy. He was originally a teacher in his native town, and thence was called to Kanitz, as principal of the school and preacher. We had already developed along reform lines. In 1826 Vienna had called Isaac Noah Mannheimer (1793-1865) as preacher. Historical accuracy demands that this statement be qualified. The 200 Jewish families of Vienna were not permitted to form a congregation. Possessing no corporate rights, they could neither build a synagogue nor engage a minister. But our ancestors used to say, "Next to the gate is a little door." (Neben 'n Tor is a Tuerl.) While a synagogue was not permitted they were allowed to gather for services in a rented room. such a "Betstube" had been in use for some time. The leader of the congregation was one Michael Lazar Biedermann, a jeweler, who had high connections and whose descendants are found today among the highest aristocracy of England. Sawing one of the rafters in the garret over the "Betstube," the ceiling of the "Betstube" was made to bulge. The chief of police with whom Biedermann was hand in glove, ordered the "Betstube" to be closed as dangerous. A place of worship was therefore an immediate need, and with the aid of the well-known methods, Emperor Francis was induced to give his consent to the erection of a temple, which was given with the proviso that the front should not show that it was a house of worship. So the temple, still in use, was dedicated in 1826. The new building required a new form of worship. Solomon Sulzer, a young man of 22, was engaged as cantor, and I. N. Mannheimer as preacher. The intention of the leading men who had seen the reform services at Leipsic, where they visited the fair, and where Mannheimer preached, wished a reform of a more advanced type. Mannheimer himself saw that Vienna was not ripe for it, and the reforms that he introduced were limited to the omission of some prayers, not considered obligatory, to the introduction of some prayers in German, to a boy's choir and a sermon in the vernacular. As said before, he could not be elected as a preacher, but the Vienna Jews had children, which was not against the state's law, and these children had to receive instruction in religion, which the law even required. So Mannheimer was engaged as "Religionslehrer" who should at the same time give addresses to the grown people in the synagogue. For the requirements of the Orthodox, Rabbi Eleazar Horwitz (1804-1868), great-grandson of Phineas, was engaged as a "Ritualienaufseher," for as long as the law did not prohibit the eating of meat by the Jews, it could not prohibit the Vienna Jews from engaging the services of a man who was to superintend the proper execution of the dietary laws. The example of Vienna was followed by Prague, where in 1837 a "Temple fuer Geregelten Gottesdienst" was opened, and Prague, more fortunate than Vienna, possessing a congregation with corporate rights, could engage a "Prediger" in the person of Leopold Zunz (1794-1886), who was soon succeeded by Michael Sachs (1806-1864).

After Vienna and Prague had shown the way, Kanitz could not remain long behind. It could not afford the luxury of appointing a preacher exclusively for this office, and it could not discharge its old rabbi. So it elected a school teacher who should be preacher at the same time. Rabbi Trieschet protested against this encroachment on his own privileges, but Judaism is not clerical, and the rabbi had to yield. Folklore is always the best illustration of popular sentiments, and therefore a little story might illustrate the idea which the average Jew has of the rabbi's authority. An advanced liberal in a Lithuanian town is seen to leave a barber shop. "You shave yourself?" says the man who sees him. "Why should I not" is the answer, "I have asked the rabbi." "And the rabbi said you may?" "No, he said I must not do it, but who cares for what he says" One must not think that the old rabbi did not preach. He delivered his two official discourses annually on the sabbaths preceding Pesach and Yomkippur about some Talmudic topic, and occasionally a more popular talk, but he had no message for the younger generation. I still remember, when he preached and hesitating in quoting a Biblical or Talmudic passage, one of the oudience would prompt him. I also remember that on such an occasion, I told my father at the dinner table on Sabbath, "You did not behave well today, when the Herr Rabbiner preached, for you interrupted him," and I could not undestand why father instead of apologizing merely smiled. Rabbi Trieschet, so I was told, was already somewhat modern. He had read a great deal of the philosophical literature of medaevial Judaism, but the younger generation was no more interested in listening to the explanation of the dogma as defined by Albo, than to the harmonization of two conflicting passages in the dietary laws as laid down by Maimonides. In addition the rabbi spoke Yiddish, which in those days was considered the greatest obstacle in the way to social and political recognition. So he had to yield his pulpit to Loewy. Naturally Trieschet did not like his rival. The latter grew in popularity by his success in school. Solomon Kellner, called "Shloima de Baben's" (Grandmother's Solomon) did not understand the preacher's tirades, but he was elated when his little Peppi took part in the performance of Lessing's "Emilia Galotti." Fortunately for Trieschet, Loewy once encroached on the rabbi's legal privileges which might have involved him in serious troubles in the courts if the rabbi had used this case against him. Loewy left in 1856 to accept a similar position in Lundenburg. The rabbi was now over sixty years old, and enjoyed the advantage of old age, procuring for him the undivided respect of his congregation until his death.

HUNGARIAN BISHOP EULOGIZES THE JEWS.

It is gratifying to come across Christian prelates who, far from being infected with prejudices against Jews, entertain the highest opinion of them and hold them up as exemplars. Such a prelate is the newly-appointed Reform Bishop, Dr. Stefan Tudoes. While on a visit to Saros-Patak, the Bishop received a deputation of the Orthodox Jewish Congregation, and in reply to the address of the Rabbi, he said in effect: "I make no secret of the fact that I am a Liberal, and as such I feel that the Jews merit thorough equality, not only under the law, but also in actual practice. They have earned equality in particular for their whole-hearted philanthropy, and their pure moral and religious life. So much do I feel this that I am constantly holding them up to my fellow-believers as an example worthy to be followed." These broad-minded utterances have made a great impression throughout Hungary.

CATHOLIC ORGAN ATTACKS JEWISH COLONIZATION OF PALESTINE.

The American Hebrew reports that the Catholic paper, "Unita Cattolica," of Florence, Italy, which is the favorite organ of the Vatican circles, has often distinguished itself by its anti-Jewish attitudes, especially since Signor Ernesto Nathan was mayor of Rome. Its latest object of attack is the Jewish colonization of Palestine, concerning which it has published an exaggerated report from an Italian priest in Jerusalem and its own vehement comment. The Unita demands that the Catholic powers should take more interest in the country which is so important for the history of their religion and should endeavor to stem the progress of Jewish colonization in the Holy Land.

SPAIN AND THE JEWS

By Miss Anna M. Garfinkle

Two of the greatest of the civilizing forces are civil government and the church. Their sphere of usefulness is usually beneficent and wholesome. They tend to develop a people, righteous and just, brave and enterprising; a people who are vigilant in the protection of their rights and liberties, and also considerate of the rights of others. Acting in their proper sphere, the church and state shed their benign influence upon a contented and happy people, and reflect their glory on the pages of history. The church and state each pursue their separate path, each reflecting the other through the effect they have on the people. Where each are guided by the principles of justice, where each is content to reign in its own sphere, there the tolerant, broad spirit is developed, there the people are not stirred by religious bigotry and internecine strife. Happy indeed is such a people.

There is a force malevolent and terrible, virulent and destroying, and this force results from the union of church and state. The blighting effect of the consummation of this union has left its vivid bloody marks upon the pages of history. It is truly remarkable that these forces each so benevolent in itself should by their union become a virulent destructive force, corrupting and withering every land which has felt its heavy hand. No matter how just and righteous a church may be, no sooner has it laid its hands upon the reins of civil government than it has become despotic, and with untiring energy endeavored to utterly destroy any belief or views which it doesn't countenance. A universal church might possibly be wholesome—possibly. But the minds of all men are not created to think alike; some require reason and some emotion, some the good and beautiful, and some the just and righteous.

Since times immemorable religious institutions have been established, great churches founded of which the pillars are living men. Religion is a matter of conscience. When the oppressive hand is lowered upon the followers of a religious belief it frightens away a few weaklings, but the majority will not yield their religious convictions, their very conscience, even before the utmost power, aye even before the most terrible tortures devisable by man. The greater the pressure applied the more fervid becomes the faith of the oppressed, the more observant do they become of even the minor regulations of their religion. This unwholsome union, unless checked, continues its withering reign until the evil that it brings upon others falls with crushing force upon itself. Upon the sandy foundation of fear and hate it attempts to construct a palace of glory, but vainly do they build and terrible is the fall when this palace shakes, totters and buries within its ruins the consuming force of evil.

Land of Power.

There was a land powerful in war, and great in the pursuits of peace. Toward it flowed uncountable treasures of gold and gems. The new found world lay a captive at its feet while over half of Europe was tributary to its power. The sun's warm rays fell upon its fruitful lands and splendid cities, a proud and haughty race inhabited the land, but at some unguarded moment the church laid its hands upon the reins of the state. How dearly has that country paid for its lack of vigilance! The love of power ate with deep and bitter corrosion and its malediction blasted the hopes of its Empire, withered the very grass in its fields and the water in its bosom. This fair, prosperous, powerful state, which stood without a peer has fallen, and how terrible its fall! From the most powerful country in Europe, Spain is now the humblest, the weakest.

The history of the Jews in Spain is as chequered as Jewish history in general. Part is brilliant and glorious, and part is filled with blood and suffering. The history of the Jews in Spain is but one example of the difference between what a liberal policy can bring about and what persecution results in. The Jews were in the Iberian Peninsula long before the times of Christianity. There were Jews there at the time of the Carthaginian rule. The Romans and the Visigoths in turn obtained dominion; the Jews suffered their first persecutions in Spain from the Visigothic King, Sisilret. When the Moors conquered Spain they granted equal rights to the Jews, many of whom became the counsellors of their kings, and they lived in brotherly accord together and developed arts and sciences. The Jews also distinguished themselves in warfare, many of the leading knights and warriors being Jews. For about 200 years after the conquest of Spain by the Christians they lived in peace and friendship with their neighbors. They were owners and tillers of the soil, agents of commerce and cultivators of the arts and sciences. The historian Milman says of this period in Spain: "Everyone sat under his shady fig tree, a cluster-laden vine, singing hymns to the Almighty God of Israel, who again had mercy on His people."

After the union of the crowns of Arragon and Castil persecutions began. The fanatical confessor, Torquemado, of Queen Isabella, was the evil genius that began destruction of Jewish lives and which finally resulted in the destruction of the prosperity of Spain. Thousands of Jews were forced to accept Christianity, and so they became nominally Christians. They rose to positions of the highest eminence. Among men of the bluest Castilian blood were those of the Hebrew strain. They remained true to the Jewish faith at heart and in secret conducted the religious services of their ancient religion.

Instruments of Torture.

To crush the Jews an instrument was employed—the most dreadful that fanaticism could invent — the Inquisition. The instruments of torture used in the dominion of the Fallen Angel cannot be more terrible than those devised by the mind and made by the hand of man. There was no portion of the body for which an instrument was not devised to wring and tear.

A descendant of the Spanish Jews, the famous English authoress, Grace Aguilar, in her great novel, "The Vale of Cedars," wrote of a woman's experience while imprisoned in the Inquisition. Said the writer: "She stood in the center of a large vaulted subterranean hall, which, from the numerous arched entrances to divers passages and smaller chambers that opened on every side, appeared to extend far and wide beneath the very bowels of the earth. It was lighted with torches, but so dimly that the gloom exaggerated the horrors which the partial light disclosed.

"Instruments of torture of any and every kind—the rack, the wheel, the screw, the cord and fire—groups of unearthly-looking figures, all clad in the coarse black serge and hempen belt; some with their faces concealed by hideous masks and others enveloped in the cowls, through which only the eyes could be distinguished, the figure of the cross upon the breast, and under that emblem of divine peace inflicting such horrible tortures on their fellow-men that the pen shrinks from their delineation."

The historian Hosmer writes of the Inquisition: "Seated in some vast and frowning castle, or in some sunless cavern of the earth, its ministers chosen from the most influential men of the nation, its familiars in every disguise, in every corner of the land, its proceedings utterly secret, its decrees overiding every law, it would be impossible to draw a picture which would exaggerate its accumulated horrors. Men and women disappeared by hundreds, suddenly and completely as a breath annihilates the flame of a lamp, some gone forever without whisper as to their fate; some to reappear in after years, halt through long tortures, pale and insane through frightful incarceration.

"When in the cities the frequent processions wound through the streets, with their long files of victims on to the place of burning, children bereaved of father and mother flocked to see whether among the doomed they might not catch a last look of the face of the long-lost parent. The forms observed were such a mockery of justice!"

Exiled From Spain.

Fanaticism reached its height in 1492 when a decree was passed exiling all the Jews from Spain. The Jews were given the alternative either to join the church or leave the land. King Ferdinand hesitated to exile the Jews, who formed so vast a proportion of the intelligence and ability of the nation, and good reason did he have for hesitation. History shows that Spain was carried onward by the momentum of its past progress but a vital force of its development was removed by the exile of the Jews — the momentum slackened and Spain fell into the abyss of ruin.

Abarbanel, a Jew, who held one of the highest position in the Spanish Government, offered 300,000 ducats if the decree would be recalled, but the fanatical Torquemado stalked into the council chamber and prevented the King from recalling his decree. Three hundred thousand Jews chose exile. At the head of them went their leaders, many of them the most prominent men of Spain. The history of the world cannot present a greater tragedy.

For centuries before their persecutors had conquered the land the Jews had lived there in peace and repose. There were the graves of their ancestors; there had they achieved a splendid record of noble accomplishment. They loved the land, they were bound to it by many ties; but they owed their first duty to their God, and rather than change their religion they went into exile, and a teribile exile it was. They were forbidden to take gold or silver with them. Valuable lands were exchanged for a piece of cloth, fine houses for a mule; carrying with them the scroll of their holy law and the remnants of their possessions, they went into a horrible exile. All countries were barred to them. The Sultan of Turkey alone received the exiles that reached his land with kindness and sent a message to the King of Spain thanking him "for sending your most valuable subjects to me."

The Jews of Sicily, which was subject to Spain, were also driven into exile. Lulumia writes: "It was an entire race which went into banishment. Another race, with which it had lived for centuries, stood dumb, astonished, weeping, upon the city walls, the galleries and the roofs of the neighboring buildings, to give and receive a last greeting.

"The Jews abandoned Sicily — the land which had beheld so many successive generations of their forefathers, holding their ashes in its bosom. The despot who thus punished and drove forth the innocent, could not measure the infinite bitterness of such a separation. The catastrophe of 1492 remains indelibly inscribed among the saddest memories which the rule of Spain has left in this island."

The Inquisition was continued; it was expanded even to the Spanish colonies in America. Many Jews were burned alive in Mexico by order of the Inquisitor.

Spain has deeply regretted her error. The exiled Spanish Jews have produced many illustrious men, who have advanced civilization and the interests of their adopted countries. The following are a few of the illustrious descendants of the Spanish Jews: Benjamin Disraeli, Prime Minister of England; Benedict Spinoza, the great philosopher and thinker, and Abarbanel, scholar and physician, who traced his genealogy back to King David, and the gifted authoress. Grace Aguilar.

The Spanish King when he recently visited England attended service at the Synagogue of the descendants of the Spanish and Portuguese Jews. He addressed them and said that Spain regrets her error and like a mother stands ready with outstretched arms to welcome the return of her abandoned children—the Jews.

SALONICA JEWISH COMMUNITY IN DISTRESS.

Ever since the occupation of Salonica by the Greeks, it was predicted that the Jews of that city will be the sufferers and the prediction is being fufilled all too soon. Jews are constantly being ousted from trades and industries which were formerly in their hands and their economic condition is becoming worse every day. Hundreds of Jews have already emigrated and thousands more are on the point of leaving their native town. Naturally this distressing state has had a terrible effect on the religious, educational and philanthropic institutions, which are now on the brink of utter ruin. Thus the complete disappearance of a great Jewish community of 80,000 souls is now threatened.

A ritual murder charge, raised by several Greeks against the Jews, might have resulted in disaster for the latter, if not for a happy incident by which the missing child, of whose disappearance the Jews were accused, was found.

ISRAEL'S TRIUMPH.

By Prof. Edward Chauncey Baldwin,
Ph. D. University of Illinois,
Urbana, Illinois.

A brighter day is dawning for Judaism. The time is not far distant when magazines of protest against prejudice and injustice will not be needed, and when there will be no further occasion for anti-defamation leagues. Here in America, at least, non-Jews are beginning to substitute for grudging tolerance of the Jewish race a generous respect based on a completer realization of what the race has stood for, of what it still represents, and of the incalculable debt which the modern world owes to this wonderful people.

A wonderful people they are. For centuries they have lived by faith. Through centuries of homelessness, through centuries of obloquy and of bewildered isolation, Israel has clung, with a tenacity that nothing could weaken or dislodge, to those ideals for which the race has stood. Unchanged and unalterable has been Israel's faith in the one God of righteousness, whose most insistent demand upon those who worship Him is a righteousness correspondent to His own. Equally unshaken has been Israel's faith in man. Believing that man is made in God's image, Israel has never swerved from its firm belief in the essential dignity of manhood. In the thought of Israel, the man fallen in the last ditch of the last battle of life is worthy of respect, for does he not wear indelibly charactered in his face, and still more ineffaceably written in his heart, the proof of his divine kinship?

Today, to an extent they never have been hitherto, the beliefs of Israel are becoming the ideals of Christendom. The Hebrew beliefs that righteousness is salvation and that God's highest call is the call to service, are today becoming the dominant forces in the Christian world. And under their influence the Christian world seems likely to become transformed into a measurable realization of the ancient hope of Israel—the hope of a social order in which righteousness shall cover the earth as the waters cover the sea. That such a transformation will actually occur, and that comparatively soon, is not a mere fancy. Already the signs of a great moral awakening are apparent. Within the last decade, America has been swept, as the northern forests are annually swept with autumnal fires, by the flame of a new zeal for righteousness—a flame that was kindled on Israel's altars. And yet we see only the beginning of a movement that will have as its culmination a realization more or less complete of the hope that inspired prophet, priest and sage.

Again, a certain result of the dominance of the Hebrew ideal of service and of respect for human life will result in an ultimate realization of the prophetic hope of universal peace. That such a consummation is not to be deferred to some far-off millenial time, but that it is nearer than we have been accustomed to think, there are significant indications. The growing revolt against the brutality and waste of war—a revolt that finds expression in the formation of such societies as that of International Conciliation, is, as Carlyle used to say, "significant of much." It signifies that the time is not far distant when "they shall beat their swords into plow shares, and their spears into pruning hooks, and when the nations shall not learn war any more."

It is a strange fact to reflect upon that now, when the scepter seems forever to have departed from Judah, when the site of the holy temple is occupied by a mosque, and when the soil of Palestine, sacred alike to Jew and Christian, is in the possession of infidels, Israel should be supplying to Christendom the ideals by which we live. But as Tennyson says, "God fulfills Himself in many ways;" and though the fulfillment of the promise that in the seed of Abraham should all the families of the earth be blessed has seemed to pious Israelites to have been long deferred, nothing is more certan than that it is being fulfilled today, and in the blessings of that fulfillment Israel will fully share.

HUNGARIAN STATE SUBVENTION FOR JEWISH WORSHIP.

The Hungarian Government has again voted its annual subsidy of 240,000 crowns for the purposes of Jewish religious worship. It is, however, the intention of the Minister for Public Worship to raise the subvention next year to 300,000 crowns.

Russia and the Jews

EXPULSION OF JEWS.

Protests Against Driving 580 Families Out of Kiev

The Governor of Kiev has refused the request of a Jewish deputation, headed by the local Rabbi, that the execution of the expulsion orders issued against 580 Jewish families should be delayed. The orders were made on the ground that the members of these families had lost the right of residing in Kiev in consequence of the closure of three gymnasium schools in which their children had been receiving their education. At the request of a number of house-owners who are threatened with ruin through the expulsion of their Jewish tenants, the Mayor of Kiev has petitioned the Governor-General to postpone the expulsions until the pupils of the closed schools have been enabled to enter other schools.

The Russian Mercantile Corporation at Kiev has resolved to endeavor to prevent the expulsions. A document has been drafted for submission to the Ministry, in which the petitioners point out the ruin inflicted upon the city's trade by the wholesale expulsions.

The majority of the Jews residing at Golaya Pristan, a watering-place near Cherson, have been served with expulsion orders.

THE MAY LAWS.

Business Men to Petition Against Jewish Disabilities.

The general meeting of the Ekaterinoslav Exchange Committee has passed a resolution declaring that the legal restrictions imposed upon Jews are ruining the economic life of the country.

It was also resolved to petition the Government to abolish at the earliest possible moment the Temporary Regulations of May 3rd, 1882 (known as the May Laws), together with the registration rules applied to Jewish tradesmen.

NEW ANTI-JEWISH RESTRICTIONS.

The legalization by the Tsar of the restrictions against Jews in joint stock companies has caused a great panic on the St. Petersburg Stock Exchange. The Minister of Finance hurriedly summoned the bankers of the capital, and endeavored to explain to them that the law was not so cruel as the Liberal Press interpreted it. The Rossia and the Novoe Vremya followed with inspired articles, practically appealing to the bankers and the Jews to make peace with the law, which, they stated, would render Jewish capitalists dependent on a fixed measure and not on the goodwill of Ministers. They even foreshadowed the revision of the law by the Duma, but the bankers and public opinion have not been appeased, and the Jewish deputies will raise the question of the new laws in the Duma. A deep-rooted feeling of distrust is planted in all right-minded circles against the intentions of the Government. In fact. in another article, the Novoe Vremya itself admitted that the new Minister of Finance is not the "Jewish Minister Kokovtzeff," and that the Jews will soon feel the difference between them. The fact is that in order to gain the confidence of high quarters M. Bark has to do something inimical to the Jews. This accords with M. Freedman's statement in the Duma last week, that only an anti-Semitic Minister was firm at his post. This phenomenon is the key to the situation and the cause of the mistrust of the Government.

The Council of Trade and Commerce has resolved to submit the illegal restrictions to the conference of tradesmen and merchants, and to approach the Tsar on the matter.

The Minister of Finance has permitted the opening of a credit society at Dwinsk where Jews will not be permitted as members. Some time ago the former Premier, M. Kokovtzeff, declined to sanction the anti-Semic restriction.

RUSSIAN WAR MINISTER OPPOSED TO EXCLUSION OF JEWS FROM THE ARMY.

At a private meeting General Sukhomlinoff, the Russian Minister of War, made a statement in the course of which he declared that he was opposed to the agitation which was being carried on for the exclusion of Jews from the army.

JEWS AND SHARES.

Impending Restrictions the Cause of General Depression.

Last week the Minister of Finance, M. Bark, summoned the leading bankers of St. Petersburg to another conference, at which he consulted them as to the means of removing the depression on the Russian Stock Exchange.

The bankers informed M. Bark that the depression did not come from abroad, but was due to the sense of insecurity at home, where people had become uneasy about the value of their holdings owing to the rumors of contemplated restrictions on Jewish shareholders.

The Minister assured them that those apprehensions were groundless, since the Government had decided the matter in favor of the Jewish shareholders.

At a subsequent private meeting of bankers great indignation was expressed at M. Bark's insincerity. It had become known that the Minister's declaration was utterly misleading, since it merely meant that the Council of Ministers had not adopted the more drastic restrictions proposed by certain members of the Cabinet.

A ST. PETERSBURG MEETING FAVORS JEWISH EMANCIPATION.

More than two thousand persons attended a meeting in St. Petersburg recently in favor of the emancipation of the Jews. The meeting was addressed by several Christian Liberal parliamentary leaders as well as by Jewish politicians. The various speakers, who severely denounced the persecution of the Jews, were frequently interrupted by the police.

THE ANTI-SHECHITA AGITATION IN RUSSIA.

Probable Intervention of the Sheik-Ul-Islam.

The Haham Bashi of Turkey has had several interviews lately with the Shiek-Ul-Islam, the spiritual chief of the Mohammedans, on the subject of the anti-Shechita Bill now before the Duma. This bill, if enacted, would affect several millions of Mohammedans in Russia. The Sheik-ul-Islam accordingly proposes to make friedly representations to the Cabinet at St. Petersburg with the view to a clause in favor of Mohammedans being embodied in the bill. Such a course would indirectly benefit the Jews, because their method of slaughtering differs but slightly from that of Moslems.

LARGE INCREASE OF JEWISH RECRUITS.

The Government, far from diminishing the number of Jewish conscripts, this year made use of the new Army Bill, and summoned to the ranks even able-bodied Jews who were entitled to exemption from service (e. g., only sons, etc): It is now estimated that instead of the 25,000 recruits required from the Jews some 35,000 were actually enrolled in the first stage. Nevertheless, the Duma has again, at the suggestion of the anti-Semites, passed a resolution inviting the Ministry to inquire into the question of the service of Jews in the army.

EXCLUDED JEWS.

The Government has succeeded in persuading the Duma Committee to prohibit the admission of Jews into the reorganized Surveyors' Institute at Moscow. Similarly, the bill for the abolition of all anti-Jewish restrictions in the legal profession has not met with the support of the majority in the Duma Committee and in the Cabinet. The Government has also, in response to Real Russian demands, drafted a bill which contains stringent regulations against the lease or ownership of land by Jews outside the Pale area, and providing for the termination of such tenures by Jews. The authorities have approved the insertion of a clause into the regulations of the new Temperance League, excluding Jews from its ranks. Fortunately, however, our co-religionists stand less in need of the propaganda work of the League than the League requires their services as models of temperance.

URGES FAIRNESS TOWARD JEWS

In a recent sermon by Rev. Percival H. Barker, pastor of Christ Reform Church of Newark, N. J., speaking on Shakespeare's "Merchant of Venice", he said in part as follows:

"There is no blacker or more revolting story than the history of Jewish persecutions. In "The Merchant of Venice" Shakespeare has given to us a pitiful picture of the poor old Jew, nagged for his religion's sake, spit upon and hated, abused because of his race, until at last he was stung to severity and meanness. People have generally regarded Shylock as a character to be hated, ridiculed and despised. When we consider the cruel handling the Jew has had through the centuries it is amazing that they have no more faults. In Shakespeare's time the Jew was barred from political office, unable to enter military organizations and forbidden to own real estate. And what shall we say concerning the treatment of the Jew in America? This persecution has come down to the present hour. Our comic papers caricature the Jew; the stage lampoons him; our professional clubs blackball him, and our society ostracizes him. Our large cities have become notorious for the beating, robbing, and murdering of inoffensive Jewish peddlers, who ought to have the protection afforded by our laws. Parents and school teachers ought to teach our boys and girls that the Jew is worthy of respect and enjoy liberty, equality and fraternity in the age of religious toleration.

"In justice to ourselves we ought not to permit the avarice and trickery of a few Hebrews to cause us to brand the entire race as dishonest. Have we not met some American Shylocks. Mean and meanness often walk together. The average Jew is a law-abiding citizen, honest and true, a lover of home, regarding uprightness as the highest honor. Charity is one of his many virtues and none of his brethren is ever buried in a potter's field, for he cares for his own. Take the Jew out of the world and we would lose Heine from poetry, Halevy from the drama, Mendelssohn from music, Neander from history, Lombrose from sociology, and Jacobi from mathematics, while the world itself, void of the Bible and its centre, Christ, would be midnight under a starless sky. Let the Christian recall his debt to the Jew and behave toward his brother as a great-hearted debtor should."

ROUMANIA INCITES OPPOSITION TO AMBASSADOR MORGENTHAU.

The American Ambassador in Constantinople, Henry Morgenthau, has during his short stay in Turkey gained the confidence and sympathy of all political circles. Mr. Morgenthau not only represents in a distinguished manner the interests of his government, but he also fully keeps his promise which he made at a banquet given in his honor by prominent Jews, at his departure from New York, to take interest in the welfare of our co-religionists in the Turkish empire.

Ambassador Morgenthau frequently visits the Jewish institutions, keeps up an active intercourse with the Jewish officials and especially won the love of the Jews in the Turkish capital by the fact that his daughter, Miss Morgenthau, has offered to give instruction in the English language in a Jewish school for girls. The influence of the ambassador with the Sublime Porte in favor of the Jews seems to have called forth displeasure in Roumania. The official press does not cease to hint that on account of his pronounced Jewish politics Morgenthau has aroused the indignation of the American Government and that his recall will take place in a very short time. The "Universul" of Bucharest recently announced that it had received reliable information from Washington about this "recall" of Morgenthau. When Mr. Morgenthau was asked about it, he declared positively that he knew nothing of such a change in the intentions of his government and the fact that he is commissioned by his government to undertake a journey of inspection in Asiatic Turkey and Palestine surely does not indicate that he no longer enjoys the confidence of his government. These Roumanian needle pricks will surely not prevent him from being active for his co-religionists according to the dictates of his heart.

THE BLACK JEWS.

Dr. Jacques Faitlovitch gave an account of his third journey to the Jewish tribe in Abyssinia, known as the Falashas, at a meeting held on April 26, 1914. at the residence of Mrs. S. D. Sassoon, London, England.

Dr. Faitlovitch, in the course of his address, said that when one read the history of Abyssinia, and the battles which the Falashas had fought for their faith, one could only look upon these Ethiopian brethren with admiration. Great was their resistance to the mighty attack of their enemies, and without assistance from their coreligionists, they had kept the flag of Judaism flying in their country. The recent wars which had ravaged Abyssinia had completely scattered and ruined them. Thousands of them lived like the Marranos in Spain. From the religious standpoint the Falashas were Jews, and belonged to Judaism. Their faith was absolutely monotheistic. Circumcision was practised among them as with other Jews. They observed the Sabbath and Holydays with the utmost punctiliousness. They obeyed the law of cleanliness by baths and washing in a conscientious manner. Their home life was worthy of admiration. Polygamy and concubinage, which were common in Abyssinia, among the Christian as well as the Mahommedan population, was not tolerated with the Falashas. They were almost the only artisans of the country, being blacksmiths, masons, builders, joiners, potters, weavers, tanners, saddlers, basket makers, etc. Whilst we had remained inactive, the missionaries had worked hard, and succeeded in drawing a great number of the Falashas away from us. Since his appearance in Abyssinia, however, conversion had been paralysed. Their Abyssinian brethren were waiting for their help, and were in sore need of their assistance. They were going through a critical time. Not only would their help be of great weight against the missionaries, but would also enable the Falashas to become more intelligent and more educated, so that they might work among the African nations for civilization and moral perfection. It was their most ardent desire to be united with their coreligionists, to obtain religious teaching, and to be strengthened in their Judaism.

PRISON WELFARE WORK.

Through the initiative of Dr. J. Leonard Levy, of Pittsburgh, Pa., Supervisor of Synagogue Extension for District No. 7, the Department of Synagogue and School Extension of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations is engaging in prison welfare work in Western Pennsylvania. This work is being carried on in co-operation with the B'nai B'rith through its "Educational Board of Allegheny County," the object of which is to give religious instruction to the boys and girls in the corrective and penal insitutions in that district.

Mr. Robert Davidson, of McKeesport, representing the B'nai B'rith Board, has personal charge of the work. The Department of Synagogue and School Extension has supplied the data with regard to the location of the various institutes and the number of Jewish inmates, and is supplying the necessary religious school literature for this purpose.

RAHEL'S GRAVE.

Some time ago a committee was formed in Hungary upon the suggestion of Editor Szabolcsi, which assumed the duty of restoring and keeping in good order the fearfully neglected grave of Rahel in the Holy Land. In a comparatively short time 3,000 crowns were collected and a plan of the work perfected. Negotiations were then started with the Turkish Government to obtain a permit for the restoration work. These negotiations dragged along for some time, but all attempts to gain the necessary consent were in vain. The Turkish officials refused to grant the permit. From a report coming from Jerusalem it appears that the Arabs are the cause of this refusal. The Arabs, who also consider all such graves sacred, resist their restoration. In order to avoid any disturbance the Turkish officials declined the petition for restoration. The Restoration Committee in Hungary has decided not to use the collected money for any other purpose and to postpone its plans for a more favorable time.

NEWS FROM THE ORIENT

ur Correspondent DR. ISRAEL AUERBACH, Constantinople

District Grand Lodge No. 11 is preparing for a great day. In the month of May it intends to hold the first convention of the Lodges of the Orient. This convention should have taken place in the past year, after the close of the second year of its existence. But the entanglements of the war which interrupted all traffic on the Balkan prevented the holding of the meeting at that time. Now this obstacle is out of the way and we go to work. The task is an especially hard one for our Grand Lodge. Not only that the leaders have not yet acquired the technical experience which the frequently occuring meetings give to the Grand Lodges of other countries, but our Grand Lodge is also confronted by such a mass of problems that it becomes exceedingly difficult to master them. One must not forget that the condition of the Oriental Jews offers very little satisfaction. They lack nearly everything which the Jews of other countries possess in the way of cultural and social arrangements, forms of organization and self-protection. The community, in most of the places of our district the congregation and the school are in a low state. It can be said that everything has been waiting for centuries for our intervention. For we "B'nai B'rith" are the first Jews in the Orient to seek a remission from these numberless difficulties, and to resolutely undertake the elevation of our communal life from the inside. The first Congress which we hold shall dem- the idividual lodges, to lend to our as- onstrate whether we are able to unite which were heretofore scattered among pirations a common line of action and a harmonious life-giving idea. The General Committee is fully aware of this enormous responsibility and the individual lodges of our district, who have heeded our call for the Congress with such deep earnestness and praiseworthy readiness to co-operate, are also cognizant of this great duty.

The General Committee was of the opinion that the most important thing for such a first Congress is to learn from the very bottom the conditions of the Jews of the countries comprising our district. Based upon this information a thorough interchange of ideas should first take place and then the general attitude which our Order is to assume and the part it will have to play in the improvement of conditions should be ascertained. The wider discussions and resolutions for special actions for the removal of one or the other evil will have to be left to future conventions in later years. This first time we must survey the entire field. At the same time the question of strengthening the organization of our district, the fixing of the laws of the Grand Lodge, the upbuilding of the central body, the creation of new funds, etc., etc., will receive the main attention in the proceedings.

In case it will not be possible to attend to all of these matters in the allotted time, then, if possible, the work will be continued on the following Tuesday. Previous to the regular convention several unofficial sessions will be held, in which all the early arriving brethren will be able to participate, for the purpose of proposing changes in the laws, in the elections and similar questions, so that the burdens of the main sessions will thereby be reduced. Constantinople Lodge will tender a banquet to the members of the Grand Lodge and guests and a general excursion into the beautiful vicinity of our city will be arranged. The participation in the Congress promises to be a very lively one as delegates are already announced from 18 of our lodges, among them the most prominent personalities of Oriental Jewry.

Among the reports on the condition of our brethren in the different countries the one from the city of Salonika will awaken the deepest interest and cause the most grief. Conditions are really very bad there; yes even desperate. The letters which the Salonika Lodge writes about it are really heartrending. One of these letters says: "Since the loss of its old adjacent territory Salonika has lost its significance as a commercial city in an extraordinary measure. The most complete stagnation of all economic life prevails and no glimmer of hope is visible. Under the [illegible] of this condition a constantly increasing number of our co-religionists will unfortunately be forced to leave our city to seek a new life somewhere else. We know of many houses which are positively determined to emigrate in the near future. This emigration will be a great misfortune for our community, but it is a necessary evil. There will therefore be need, not to encourage them, but to lead, to enlighten, and to advise, in order not to leave the emigrants in the danger of losing the little they take along. Salonika Lodge paid earnest attention to this matter at its last meeting. It is earnestly thinking of establishing delegations in the main centers of Minor Asia, which are in a position to receive emigrants, in order to study thoroughly the localities and to find out the kind of emigrants each place is able to take care of. Then a permanent bureau must be established in all these places to guard the interests of the emigrants. A central bureau must be active in Salonika which should furnish all the necessary information to the emigrants and distribute them and guide them to certain points according to their fitness." The interesting letter then asks for information as to how the Turkish Government will look upon this emigration of the former Turkish Jews, whether it will exempt them, like all the Mohammedan emigrants, from military duty for several years, etc. At the same time the Lodge of Salonika requests the Lodge of Constantinople to create a commission for the study of the situation. This commission has already been formed and has started to work.

Special incidents are adding themselves to increase the general economic distress of our brethren in Salonika and which frequently precipitate them into danger. Lately there was a strike affair which could have easily caused great harm. The tobacco workers of the city declared a strike in sympathy with their fellow workmen who were striking in many cities of Macedonia. Among these tobacco workers there are many Mohammedans and Greeks but most of the workers are Jews. The contractors hired Mohammedan immigrants to fill the place of the strikers and it came to a clash between the two classes. The Greek police interfered and wounded a number of Jewish workmen. A reactionary paper published in the Turkish language then began to incite the people against the Jews by stating that the Jewish workmen had torn the veils from the Mohammedan women during the scrimmage, and in an open letter addressed to the Chief Rabbi it made the entire Jewish community responsible for the animosity against the Mohammedan element. This developed a very dangerous situation. The Jews of Salonika are already exposed to the fanatical hatred of the Greeks. Heretofore the Jews at least had the equally persecuted Mohammedans as their allies. When these too are incited against them to become their enemies it would prove their immediate ruination. This incitation could also make a bad impression upon the attitude of the Mohammedan population and officials in Turkey towards the Jews, which up to this time has always been quite friendly. With great trouble the Jews succeeded in uncovering the falsehoods of the inciting paper which stood in connection with the tobacco contractors, and to quiet the public excitement. A careless expression in the press by a Jewish journalist against Christianity just during the passover time, aroused another and perhaps a much greater danger for the Jews of Salonika, namely a persecution by the Church; and only a resolute disavowal of the guilty party by the official Board of the community averted also this misfortune.

The great event of the last few weeks was the journey of our eminent Brother Henry Morgenthau to Egypt and Palestine. He passed through Alexandria, Cairo and besides the most important cities and colonies of the Holy Land he also visited Beirut, Damascus, Adana and Smyrna. Wherever we possess lodges they were informed by us of the coming of Brother Morgenthau and they did not fail to receive him everywhere with joy and solemnity, some with deputations, others in festal meetings in their own meeting rooms. On his part, Brother Morgenthau made it a point to inform himself with deep interest about the problems and works of the lodges and to encourage them to stronger activity. Especially dignified was the reception of the Ambassador at Cairo, tendered to him by the two local lodges, "Maimonides" and "Cairo," who called a joint meeting in their club house, a report of which was published in the "Revue Israelite d'Egypte." The President of "Cairo Lodge," Brother Baruk, delivered a splendid address of welcome, which at the same time gave a full description of the Jewish conditions in his city and of the activities of the local lodges which brought about a complete regeneration of the community. Brother Morgenthau responded that he was convinced that with energy and good will the Jews of the country, which is just as liberal as America, where racial and religious distinctions play no part, can gain the esteem of their fellow citizens by righteous, worthy work in the same measure as their brethren in America, and in the activity of the two valiant lodges he saw the best way leading to it. Brother Morgenthau is filled with extraordinary satisfaction about what he witnessed in Palestine. The new Jewish colonies with their flourishing husbandry and their high cultural striving marked by the renascence of Hebrew, delighted him and compelled him to render great acknowledgement. He is of the opinion that the movement to settle there greater Jewish masses is worthy of every conceivable consideration and support, and he thinks that when the experiment succeeds it will surely have a deep influence upon the rest of the Jewry. A special irade of the Sultan granted Brother Morgenthau the entry into the cave of Machpela, the burial place of our patriarchs, something which before him was attained by only two or three non-Jews, as these places are very holy to the Islam.

At present there tarries within our walls Mr. Cohen, General Secretary of the "Jewish Association for the Protection of Girls and Women." He is charged by his organization and the Berlin Committee to advise with us about organizing the combat against the traffic in girls. In my next I will report more particulars about it.

RASHI, HIS CHARACTER AND INFLUENCE.

1475 and since their first publication they have steadily increased in popularity. To such an extent have the works of Rashi, been adopted among scholars and students that for the last few centuries, he has become known as Parshandatha, or the commentator par excellence; any attempt to familiarize one's self with Biblical or Talmudic literature without using his instructive explanations would be as futile and as difficult as would be an attempt on the part of any mariner or navigator to cross the Atlantic Ocean without using the magnetic needle of the compass.

There is one trait in the writings of Rashi that cannot but attract the attention of those who are at all familiar with his commentaries and that is the simplicity of his style and manner of expression. His humility is plainly seen on every page of his works. Very often he uses the expression, "it appears to me," or "according to my humble opinion," and such similar expressions indicating a desire on his part to avoid all bombast and self assertiveness. And if it is true that "style is the man," that trait will at once point out the beautiful character of this Jewish Savant. He was the very embodiment of humility. We can picture to ourselves this distinguished scholar, whose fame was destined to spread far and wide and to outlast the centuries, and who, nevertheless, was so modest in his conduct that there was not the least taint of the arrogant or the supercilious in his attitude toward his contemporaries. The spirit of humility and moderation seem to have been the predominating elements of this immortal scholar's character.

Rashi hardly ever philosophized and his writings are therefore, entirely of an objective nature. He attends to the task before him, viz.: that of commentator and he very seldom, if ever, obtrudes on us his personal views and does not attempt to grapple with any philosophical problems. He did not try to reconcile science with religion or some contradictory systems of philosophy, and he did not make any effort to introduce into Judaism or into Jewish literature anything new or original. And that is, perhaps, another reason why Rabbi Solomon Yitzhaki has been admired by all the various elements of our people for the last eight centuries.

Perhaps, if Rashi had directed his energies and his scholarship into the channels of criticism and philosophy he, too, might have suffered the fate of the leading reformers and innovators in the history of the race. But fortunately for him, his life-work consisted in an endeavor to preserve and conserve the precious treasures of Jewish literature Rashi's aim was to breathe the breath of life into, and to vitalize that which otherwise might have been dry bones and to popularize that in our literature which otherwise might have been as a sealed book. In that, he was eminently successful, by that work as a commentator he reared for himself a monument that will survive the ravages of time. As long as there is a Jewish people and a Jewish literature the name of Rashi will not be forgotten.

And that enduring and beneficent influence of our immortal master was not confined to the life and literature of his own people. Strange as it may seem, and it may appear an exaggeration, but it is nevertheless a fact, that the course of modern European history was to a large extent determined by the works of this Jewish Savant. During the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, the humanists who had become interested in the Latin and Greek classics turned also for inspiration and for culture to the Bible in the original Hebrew. These humanists then found that Rashi's commentaries made it easier for them to understand the text and they consequently became close students of the commentaries. The name and fame of Rashi, therefore, spread rapidly also among the various groups of Christian humanists and thus he became an important factor in the Revival of learning. In the fourteenth century Rashi's works were translated into Latin by Nicholas De Lyra, a Franciscan monk and an enthusiastic admirer of that Jewish scholar, and then Lyra's writings were translated into German. Those translations of Rashi's commentaries became thus accessible to Martin Luther and proved to be of immense importance to him when that leader of the Protestant Reformation undertook to translate the Bible into German. Of such paramount importance have the works of Nicholas De Lyra in Jewish literature and in connection with Rashi's commentaries been considered by the scholarly fraternity, that it has been beautifully remarked: "Si Lyra non Lyrasset, Lutherius non Saltasset." In other words, if not for the humanists and if there had been no Renaissance there would probably have been no Protestant Reformation.

Thus we find that the work and learning of one Jewish scholar has done so much in helping to shape the history of the Jews and has even influenced the course of the destinies of the nations of Europe. Posterity has lavished its affections on Rashi, that truly great Jew; his works are being read by hosts of admirers, and some have even attempted to write a commentary on his commentaries. Rabbi Solomon Yitzhaki has thus by means of his extensive learning and unceasing application immortalized himself, and his memory will be cherished among us for all time to come.

And even as Rashi will not be forgotten on account of his erudition and his diligence in the vineyard of Jewish literature, even so will we continue to revere him for his genuine simplicity, for his unaffected modesty and for the sweetness and gentleness of his temperament. He possessed that sympathy which makes all men kin and his nature was permeated with the milk of human kindness. Our history and our literature were made vastly richer by his exemplary life and conduct.

LITERATURE FOR JEWISH YOUTHS.

The "Weg weiser fuer die Jugend literatur" in Magdeburg, edited by Dr. M. Spanier, has entered upon its tenth year. Warm praise is due to the B'nai B'rith Grand Lodge for Germany for its efforts to create a Jewish literature for the Jewish youths with which to awaken enthusiasm for our religion and our literature. The Grand Lodge has made a great name for itself by employing all kinds of means to combat and to eradicate the lethargy in our camp. In the nine years of its existence the "Wegweiser" has contributed its share to this endeavor. It finds recognition not only in lodges and in circles of Jewish specialists but also among non-Jewish schoolmen. The report of the Grand Lodge points out the fact that many teachers in Germany and in other countries are using the "Wegweiser" in their instruction; that they let the pupils read articles from it and then write compositions about their contents. May the "Wegweiser" continue its fruitful work and be a blessing to Judaism.

At the Source of the Ritual Fable

(By Professor Dr. M. Balaban, in the Allgemeine Zeitung des Judenthums)

Very much has already been written about the cause of the belief in the ritual fable among the rabble of all nations. In the controversy between Rohling and Bloch an endless number of accusations and defenses appeared. Every new process calls forth an entire literature, and after the process the zeal is extinguished and a long or short silence follows the time of war. It was so after the Tisza Eszla case, after the Huelsner case (which, alas, is not ended yet), after the Winter case in Konitz, and so it will be with the Justshinski-Beilis case. We become excited, we write proclamations, we let our rabbis swear from the pulpit, we send out into the world a flood of defense documents and think that with this we have done everything. But it is not so, for our enemy does not rest and is constantly preparing his soldiers for the next war.

The church-pictures, which are scattered here and there to keep “the horrible deeds of the Jews before the eyes of the people,” are stronger and do more for the belief in the ritual fable than all our writings of enlightenment and defenses, and the bulls of the Popes against the blood accusation.

In the Swiss government museum of Zurich can be seen such a picture from an old chapel (fifteenth century). It impersonates bodily the ritual fable. This picture stands in a museum, as an echo of past times, and everybody thinks that to find such a picture in a church today is not to be thought of. Cardinal Ganganelli, who afterwards became Pope Clemens XIV., also could not imagine in the year 1758 that upon a wall of a church in Posen a picture could be exhibited which represents a scene of a ritual murder. The noble Cardinal thought that the figures are of Pomeranians, whom the stupid people take for Jews. As proof of his assertion Ganganelli told of a similar case which happened in Venice, where the senate ordered such a picture, which was exhibited on the Ponte di Rialto in the year 1705, to be removed at once. And yet I have seen such a picture with my own eyes in the year of the Lord 1910 in the cathedral of Sandomierz!

Saudomierz was once a big city, the seat of the Vaivodes, and had a numerous Jewish population as early as the year 1365. We read in the old Polish charters given to the Jews that in the year 1365 the Jews of Cracow, Sandomierz and Lemberg petitioned King Casimir the Great for the ratification of their rights (Rusko-Yevrejski-Archiv, Vol. 3, No. 1). In the time of the Swedes nearly the entire Jewish community was slaughtered, and in spite of this those who remained alive were under the suspicion of having favored the Swedes. For this their synagogue was confiscated (1656) and was returned to them after much entreaty and great sacrifices of money (1658). To this day the names of a long line of martyrs of the year 1655 are read there in the synagogue during the Passover service and special prayers are recited for the unfortunates.

But the measure of sufferings was not full yet, for about the end of the seventeenth century, shortly before the Northern war, a local priest, Stephen Zuchowski, began to incite the populace against the Jews and to stir up the old ritual fable. Christian children commenced to be lost, first the son of the apothecary (1698), a few years later (1710) a girl of the name of Margareth and a boy, Georg Krasnowski. Two fearful processes were instituted with all the mediaeval means like torture, mutilations, etc. A great number of Jews were sentenced to death and were executed under horror awakening torments (1713). In the year 1712 King August II. drove the Jews out of Sandomierz “because they were convicted by the royal tribunal for killing the boy Georg Krasnowski to use his blood for ritual purposes.” To gratify the wish of the local deacon. Father Stephen Zuchowski, the King ordered all the Jews to leave, giving permission to rebuild the synagogue into a chapel and to place there the pictures of the dead children. (Bersohn: Collection of Diplomas No. 377.)

The Jews had to pay much money to remain in the city and in possession of their synagogue. Father Zuchowski perpetuated these two processes in two thick bodied books, one of which appeared in the year 1698, the other in 1713. In the first book he even described in verses the process of 1698 and celebrated in song the torments of the unfortunate Jews. The second book is a prosaic chronicle of the process of Sandomierz as well as of the other ritual processes, and it lived to see a second edition in the year 1773. But the clergy of Sandomierz was not satisfied with the expulsion of the Jews and with the fixed “historical” account of the whole occurrence, it resolved to perpetuate the affair by the brush of the painter and for that it soon had the best opportunity.

In the years 1708-1737 Karl de Prevot painted four historic pictures, which can be seen in the church to-day. They are of great dimensions (3x2 meters), the first of which (before the main entrance to the left) exhibits a ritual fable. Two Jews in Sabbath caps hold a little boy high over a basin and inflict many stabs upon him with a pointed knife. The blood runs in great streams and is taken from the basin by other Jews. To the left stands a woman and counts the money which she received for the child from the Jews and in the farther ground several Jews are seen who look at the act full of joy. The picture is rich in color, fearfully glaring, the faces are wild, the child with glorified eyes exactly as we find it upon all other pictures of this kind. Under the picture is the inscription: “Son of the apothecary murdered by the infidel Jews of Saudomierz on March 18, 1698, Margareth and Georg Krasnowski also killed by the Jews on August 18. 1710.”

Literacy Test A Sop To Special Interests

There is a reason why the immigration bill with its indefensible literacy test passed the House by an overwhelming vote. Traditional American policies are not abandoned lightly or unless political exigencies of one kind or another seem to require the somersault. There is no widespread demand for further onerous restriction of immigration,, for a great majority of the people, unfortunately, do not interest themselves in the question one way or the other. Nor is it clear that Congressmen have burned midnight oil in studying the issue.

The immigration bill and the literacy test in it represent another sop to organized labor. It is a labor bill. The agitation in favor of it has come almost wholly from labor sources. They were immigrants themselves, or whose unlettered fathers were. Once within the gates, with the zeal and prejudice of converts, they are determined that their fellows in the old countries shall not share with them the industrial largeness of the New World. They have found a mine, and they want to keep it for themselves.

In a contest where cowardly surrender to selfish interests is the determining factor, it is useless to argue or attempt to induce an intelligent vote. If the Senate equals the House in flabbiness, patriots of the country must rely on the Executive, as they have done before, for a vindication of Americanism. It will remain for him to decide whether this country shall continue to be the haven of the oppressed and unfortunate, but sturdy and ambitious yeomen of the older world, or shall be surrounded by a Chinese wall over which none can leap unless with a ladder of letters.

The ninety millions of people in this country are not the descendants of Colonial inhabitants. They are for the most part immigrants or the descendants of immigrants who came to the United States. These immigrants made the Louisiana Purchase a success. With brawn and muscle, not with books, they transmuted plains into great cities and States. They fought for literacy as they fought for wealth, and with it they endowed their children, many of whom now sit in Congress. These immigrants have supported education in a way to make the older States ashamed. The great universities and public school systems of the Middle West are an inspiration and an absolute challenge to the advocates of a literacy test.—Philadelphia Public Ledger.

National Conference of Jewish Charities

The eighth biennial conference of the National Conference of Jewish Charities was held at Memphis, Tenn., on May 6 in the presence of over 100 delegates, President Sulzberger presiding.

First Session.

At the preliminary session in the afternoon a paper of much interest, entitled “Oriental Immigration,” was read by Dr. David de Sola Pool of New York, giving a graphic description of the social, economic and religious life of the Jews of the Levant, and was followed by a discussion by several delegates.

A paper entitled “Free Loans” was read by Mr. J. J. Dukas of New York, giving an account of the successful work accomplished in New York City by the Hebrew Free Loan Society. A discussion followed, which was participated in by Messrs. J. Goldman, Oscar Leonard, Joseph Schoenthal, Miss Minnie F. Low and others.

Second Session.

The conference was formally opened on Wednesday evening, May 6, with prayer by Rabbi Max Samfield. An address of welcome was made by Mr. L. Sternberger on behalf of the Jewish Charities of Memphis, and Mr. Bolton Smith welcomed the conference on behalf of the city of Memphis.

President Cyrus L. Sulzberger then delivered his message, which was received with marked approval.

Rabbi George Fox of Ft. Worth, Texas, delivered an address on “Rabbi and Social Worker.”

Third Session.

Two papers were read on Thursday morning, one on “Massachusetts Credit Unions” by Mr. Jacob de Haas of Boston and the other entitled “The Self-Respect Fund,” by Mr. L. K. Frankel. A discussion followed, in which several delegates took part.

The report of the standing committee on “Palestinian Charities,” prepared by Prof. Richard Gottheil, was presented by Judge Julian W. Mack. The report contained several recommendations, among them, that the Federations of Jewish Charities in the United States arrange to receive gifts and contributions for institutions in Palestine and transmit the same to Palestine through the Palestinian committee of the National Conference.

Fourth Session.

A digest of the rules governing transportation by Dr. Max Herzberg of Philadelphia was read by Mr. L. H. Levine. The discussion which followed was opened by Mr. Max Senior and was participated in by Mr. Sulzberger and others. This was one of the most important subjects discussed by the conference, and aroused much interest among the delegates.

Fifth Session.

“Immigration and the Panama Canal” was the subject of a splendid paper presented by Mr. Lucius L. Solomons, of San Francisco. The paper was discussed by Mr. Maurice Epstein and Mr. Sulzberger. Prof. Graham Taylor of Chicago, president of the National Conference of Charities and Corrections, spoke in defense of the immigrants and their relation to trade unions.

Mr. G. A. Berlinsky of Denver read a paper entitled “How to Federate a Small Community,” which was discussed by Mr. G. Ellman of Memphis.

Sixth Session.

A paper by Mr. Jacob Billikopf of Kansas City, entitled “Advance in Settlement Work,” was read by Rabbi Bernstein of St. Joseph and was discussed by Dr. C. S. Bernheimer of Brooklyn and Dr. Emanuel Sternheim of Greenville.

Dr. B. T. Bogen of Cincinnati read a paper entitled “Standards of Relief.”

Seventh Session.

This was the closing session of the conference. President Sulzberger presided.

“Chicago Women’s Aid Society” was the subject of a paper read by Mrs. J. Purvin of Chicago, which was discussed by Miss Minnie F. Low.

The last paper of the conference was, “After-Care for Orphan Asylums,” by Miss Alice L. Seligsberg, read by Mr. C. I. Cooper.

A pleasing feature of the meeting was the appearance of Dr. S. Wolfenstein, who in a few well chosen words gave his experience with the records of the ex-wards of the Cleveland Orphan Asylum.

The business session which followed closed the conference. The report of the resolutions committee was unanimously carried. The election of officers resulted as follows: President, Minnie F. Low of Chicago; First Vice President, Aaron Cohen of Pittsburg; Second Vice President, Fred M. Butzel of Detroit; Third Vice President, David M. Bressler of New York; Treasurer, Bernard Greensfelder, St. Louis; Secretary, Louis H. Levine, Baltimore.

Annual Report of Denmark Lodge, Copenhagen

The Denmark Lodge has recently issued its second annual report, from which we make the following abstract:

The Lodge comprises 130 members; the accounts total an amount of Kr. 26.-694,46. Assets on the 1st April: Kr. 17.400,25.

During the past year the Lodge has acquired the following institutions:

A Toynbee hall with reading-room, a preparatory school for children of Russian parents, a sewing school. Further supported: An infant asylum founded and managed by a member of the Lodge, the Jewish infant school, holiday home, loan office for Russian Jews and several other foreign Jewish Unions and institutions.

During the Lodge meetings a numbre of lectures, most interesting, were held, of which the following may be mentioned:

Brother Dr. Frankel on “Circumcision”; Brother High Court Solicitor Rothenburg, “The Conditions of the Jews in Denmark Now and Formerly”; Rabbi Dr. Koch (Gothenburg), “The First Jews on the West Coast of Sweden”; Mrs. Mironovna-Leepa, “Phases of Civilization Among the Russian Jews”; Professor Dr. Jacobsen, “Mental Diseases and the Treatment of Same in the Course of Time, Especially Relating to Jews.”

It is most characteristic for the conditions prevailing in Denmark that in the B’nai B’rith Lodge the Christian burgomaster, Carl Lehmann, held a lecture on a Danish Jew philanthropist: “The Philanthropist, L. I. Brandes.”

At a Lodge evening a concert was held with the co-operation of eminent artists, followed by a ball.

The Toynbee hall and the reading-room connected with same was open during the whole of the day. Owing to local circumstances the attendance was for some time rather poor, but grew better later on. In the tonybee hall instruction was given in bookkeeping, English, Danish, Writing, Arithmetic and gymnastics at different evenings.

Lectures were held each Friday and Sunday, and concerts every second Tuesday.

The Denmark Lodge has worthily finished its second year of existence by the publication of an elaborate and finely mounted Festival booklet upon the occasion of the 100 years jubilee of the emancipation of the Danish Jews. The Festival booklet was also sent to different Lodges and will, according to what we are told, be reported upon in detail in several Lodges.

At the expiration of the second Lodge year the members of the Lodge committee, who have been in charge of the Lodge during both of the first two years, have retired, and in the new Lodge committee now elected only two members of the first committee have been admitted.

The Lodge committee for 1914-15 comprises the following brethren:

School Director Hartvig Cohn, President.

Wholesale Merchant A. M. Metz, Vice-President.

Wholesale Merchant J. H. Melchior, Secretary.

Banker Axel Vollmond, Secretary of Finance.

Secretary Alexis Berendt, Treasurer.

Broker Expr. Just Cohen, Monitor (Past President).

Wholesale Merchant Louis Schottlander, Warden.

Director Carl Levysohn, Guard.

The last paragraph of the report of the Lodge runs as follows: “The first Lodge committee has hereby made its last report. “We hope that during these two years we have laid a sufficient foundation to enable the forthcoming Lodge committee to pursue the work so as to ensure a successful development of the Lodge. We beg to express to our brethren our thanks for the interest, which they have always shown and beg that they will untiringly pursue the work for the aims of the Lodge:

“Benevolence, Brotherly Love, and Harmony.”

THE DREAM OF NATIONS.

The fighting spirit is inborn in man. No society would of course exist if the natural propensities were indulged in by all of us at all times. So we have learned to check our passions and to compose our quarrels in courts of justice. In a controversy, one of the contestants may be innocent, but often the guilt is on both sides. The third impartial umpire, whether judge or jury, sifts the evidence, clears the guilty, and imposes a fine upon the offender. What individuals have learned, nations are just beginning to learn. From time immemorial nations have waged war with each other on the smallest provocation. On the flimsiest grounds a country is invaded. On a mere pretext hostilities begin. And war with all its dreadful consequences is on, wreaking havoc and devastation and shedding blood like water.

It requires no sentimentalist to abhor war. The clumsy and slow methods of ancient warfare have been replaced by what is an elaborate science, the science of killing. The newer weapons, the latest guns have multiplied their deadly capacity a thousandfold. War brutalizes victor and vanquished alike. As many as are not killed in battle are swept away by pestilential diseases. No wonder that the thoughtful at all ages turned away in a shudder and the sterner moralists preached peace. The prophets of Israel at a time when their nation was bleeding from incessant strokes administered by the great powers of the day, were the first to dream that beautiful dream of universal peace and the cessation of warfare between nation and nation.

The day when that dream will become a reality is still far away. But the signs are multiplying of many world forces operative in the direction of the ultimate goal. We may have our own opinions as to what the policy of our government should have been or should be towards our neighbor in the south. Opinions are cheap, especially when not backed by information at first hand, which none but our supreme magistrate and his advisors alone can have. Every citizen of this country may take it for granted that our President was guided by considerations which had the highest interests of our country for their motive. His wish from the beginning was [illegible] pacification of a land distraught by revolution. It is not that we would impose our methods of changes of administration and party government on other nations. Each nation must be free to work out its own destiny. But no nation can be allowed to be an eternal nuisance to others. Treaties must be respected and the life and property of foreigners respected. If not by interference, then by indirect methods turbulent nations must be told that there are other and peaceful methods to effect changes beyond assassination of men in high office at the hands or with the connivance of those who step in their shoes.

But all of us, the few initiated and the vast majority of the uninitiated, must hail with delight the negotiations now proceednig on the neutral ground of our northern neighbor. The United States are magnanimous to forget and to forgive. We are strong enough to impose our will upon a recalcitrant magistrate by force of arms, if we so chose. We are occupying a port and are within striking distance. What a great lesson in forbearance we are offering to the world! Our strong arm is held in check. We exercise long suffering patience. We stay the deadly onslaught of our army and navy. Let the hope be expressed that the sword may not be unsheathed and that the negotiations will not only compose the quarrel between this nation and the Mexicans, but that the country itself will be pacified under a stable and orderly government. But whether we succeed or fail, the lesson we have imparted to the world will not fail of its wholesome effects. The road to universal peace is a long one to traverse. The consummation of the prophetic ideal may be expected to come in the end of the days. But a step in advance has been taken, and ours is the credit. The dream of the nations will be a reality some day; to have hastened on the day is no small achievement.

A NOTABLE ANNIVERSARY.

The forthcoming meeting of the Central Conference of American Rabbis will be the twenty-fith of its roster. It will fitly be held in the city where the first meeting took place, where the Conference had its birth.

A quarter of a century is an important epoch in the life of any institution. But when an institution has succeeded so well during that epoch, when it may point to great achievements of which it is justly proud, the moment is doubly auspicious; when looking back over the distance traversed it stands ready to gather strength for future activity. Considering the fact that similar anniversaries have been observed recently by other national institutions of great import, the conclusion is justified that the time, these twenty-five years ago, must have been particularly ripe for the creation of bodies and organizations in this country for which there was both an obvious need and no small measure of prospective success. That point of time marked the completion of the process of Americanization for the older stratum of immigration, when at the same time the newer wave of immigration had set in bringing with it new problems and new lines of activity.

At the time of its foundation, the Conference could boast of being the preeminently representative body of American rabbis. The wise teacher who called it into being and lived long enough to see it flourish beyond anticipations gathered about him not only his pupils, his "boys," but also the older men who had come from across the ocean and whether in important or humble positions were ministering successfully to the spiritual needs of growing communities. The founder was led to believe that the form of Judaism of which he was the chief protagonist was the only one destined to thrive on this American continent. While espousing a conception of Judaism which even then was not universally accepted, he believed that he was achieving a piece of work which as the years grew would be to the advantage of the entire Jewish community of the New World. But whatever was the avowed or implied party slogan of the Conference, there can be no question that both under the headship of the founder and during the administration of his able successors that eminent body justified its denomination as the "Central" Conference. It has united within its ranks men of different antecedents, foreign-born and natives alike; men of profound scholarship, erudite divines, and eloquent orators; the extremists on the right and the left stormed and fought and dropped in and out, but they were there and many still are there; and withal the Conference which is neither a legislative nor an inquisitorial body has stood forth for a sane moderation. It has issued proclamations which challenged contradiction; it has made pronouncements which gave expression to the thoughts of the controlling element and from which a respectful minority recoiled; it has made inroads into oldtime institutions and has ruthlessly torn them down; it has tackled questions that have still remained unanswered and problems still awaiting solution. But it has stood in the main for a historic connection with the great body of Israel and for a moderate conservatism which does honor to the far-sightedness of the founder. The Conference is building Judaism's future upon the foundation of its past. It is building for posterity. Those that build for posterity are the men that know how to reconcile contradictory opinions and out of the clash of controversy to seize upon the elements that make for stability and efficiency.

The large community of American Israel is now undergoing a process of amalgamation, the character of which the future alone will determine. New and grave problems have arisen beside which the older controversies of a generation ago pale into insignificance. A new wave of Jewish enthusiasm has struck the minds and everything is making for solidarity. It stands to reason that the new spirit has invaded the Conference likewise and that in its new term of life it is destined to range itself still more decisively on the side of constructive work. We need building up all along the line. We need above all a period of freedom from partisanship, a period of co-operativeness. The Conference has of late shown that it is willing to co-operate with other bodies in Jewry. Let the spectres of outworn and ancient controversies rest in peace. We need no importation into our midst of American articles re-labelled abroad. We need no new names and no new slogans. What we need first of all is peace for American Israel. And if the Conference in the next twenty-five years can devote its energies to bridging over the gulf that still separates it from other bodies and institutions and in common with them work for the preservation of Judaism on the western hemisphere, the community will rejoice in its triumphs, even as we now congratulate that body on its past achievements.

PRESENTATION OF LOVING CUP TO PRESIDENT SYLVAN E. HESS.

At a regular meeting of Minnesota Lodge No. 157 at St. Paul, held on May 25th, the lodge presented a loving cup to Brother Sylvan E. Hess, the President of the Grand Lodge. The presentation was made by Brother H. D. Frankel, and Brother Hess responded.

A class of seven candidates was initiated by the degree team of the B'nai B'rith Council of St. Paul and Minneapolis. A paper was read by Brother Loevinger on the topic, "The Mission of Young Israel." A committee was appointed for purpose of attempting to remedy unsanitary conditions existing in one of the schools almost exclusively frequented by Jewish children. A lunch followed the meeting of the lodge. The initiation noted brought the membership of the lodge up to 200.

DR. YAHUDA RECEIVED BY KING ALPHONSO.

Dr. A. S. Yahuda was honored on May 14th by a private audience with the King. Nearly all the Madrid newspapers, both Liberal and Conservative, discussed the interview in very friendly terms. The several writers emphasized the general importance of the lectures delivered by Dr. Yahuda on Jewish civilization in Spain and the Jews of today in the East. and they recognize in his reception by the King an expression of His Majesty's personal sympathy.

The King showed from his conversation that he was well informed on the movement, and he expressed his satisfaction that the lectures had aroused so much interest in all circles, and congratulated Dr. Yahuda on the excellent results attained. His majesty minutely inquired into the situation of the Jews in the East and displayed particular interest in the glorious past of the Jews in Spain. Dr. Yahuda presented him with a copy of his edition of the Arabic original of Bachia's "Duties of the Heart," remarking as he did so that he regarded the handing over of a work by one of the greatest thinkers of the brilliant epoch of the Spanish Jews as a historical event. The King cordially thanked Dr. Yahuda for the gift, adding that he was delighted to become the possessor of so important a work. Dr. Yahuda also stated that the Jews all over the world were convinced that His Majesty and his Government would grant every facility to those Jews in Morocco who were under Spanish rule to improve their status and to remain true to their traditions, so that they might place all their forces at the service of general culture. To this statement the King replied that he regarded it as his duty to assure those Jews the fullest protection, thereby enabling them to labor for their own welfare and for the progress of Spain in Morocco.

SAVAGE ATTACK ON JEWS PROMPTLY MET

Reply of Apostolic Delegate, Washington, D. C.

The Western Catholic, a weekly periodical published in Quincy, Ill., in its issue of May 1, 1914, devoted almost four pages to an attack against Jews. The Anti-Defamation League promptly took up the matter and directed the following communication to the editor of that paper:

May 29, 1914.

Rev. M. J. Foley,
Editor Western Catholic,
Quincy, Ill.

Reverend Sir:—Our attention has been called to the Western Catholic of May 1, 1914. This issue is almost entirely devoted to the reputed utterances of Signor Ernesto Nathan, ex-Mayor of Rome, concerning the Pope and Catholicism.

You refer to Signor Nathan as "the little Jew Mayor of Rome." You charge that the Holy Father is hounded to a living death by "the descendants of those who hounded Jesus Christ to the darksome and bloody heights of Calvary." In another part of your paper you refer to the Jews as "men of no country, who work for or against government for gain—veritable 'Hessians,' whose services are at the beck of the highest bidder." Further on you state: "The Jews crucified Christ! Are Protestant Christians willing to help modern Jews crucify the fair name of Catholicity? Again in the same article you state: "How long will our Protestant friends be duped by scoundrels?" Similar scurrilous matter appears in subsequent issues.

It is not our purpose to discuss the accusations you thus bring against the Jew. The enlightened judgment of mankind requires no refutation of them. One matter, however, cannot be passed over so lightly. Throughout your articles and editorials, you take it for granted that Signor Nathan, ex-Mayor of Rome, was the representative and spokesman of the Jewish people, and you then use the reputed utterances of this one man as the occasion for an assault upon the whole people of the Jewish faith. As Mayor of Rome, he did not represent the Jews; in his official utterances in Rome, he did not speak as a Jew, for the Jews, or on behalf of the Jews. You have often and bitterly complained against certain anti-Catholic societies, newspapers and magazines, which have sought to bring disrepute to Catholicism, and hatred to Catholics. In political affairs, you have had occasion vigorously to condemn attacks made upon candidates, merely because they were Catholics, and in all these cases, you have attempted to prove that the influences you complained of were un-American, inspired by ignorance, bigotry, intolerance and fanaticism. If such influences and such methods are wrong when applied to Catholics, are they not equally wrong when applied to Jews? If they are unAmerican with respect to Catholics and Catholicism, are they not equally unAmerican with respect to Jews and Judaism? If such attacks upon Catholics are begotten of ignorance, bigotry and intolerance, is it aught but ignorance, bigotry and intolerance that inspires similar attacks upon the Jews? Do you think it is the part of good American citizenship, or in keeping with the spirit of Him, whose life and teachings furnish your rule of conduct, to attempt to set men's faces against each other—to stir up in the hearts and minds of the uninformed hatred of each other?

It is of course quite obvious that it would be as reprehensible for the secular press to attack and sneer at Catholics and Catholicism, as for the Catholic press to attack and sneer at any other faith or its adherents. We do not believe that anyone would wish to see such a deplorable condition brought about in this country, or to behold its ultimate result.

We believe that upon a more careful consideration you must conclude the grounds of our complaint are just, and that in the future issues of your paper you will give other religions the same fair treatment, which you demand for your own.

Very respectfully,
EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE,
Sigmund Livingston,
Chairman.

Copies of the foregoing letter were sent to Catholic dignitaries and to the Catholic press. We reprint a few answers:

APOSTOLIC DELEGATION UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

Washington, D. C., June 9, 1914,
1811 Biltmore St.

Mr. S. Livingston,
721 First Natl. Bank Bldg.,
Chicago, Ill.

Dear Sir: I received your letter of the first instant. with its accompanying documents.

In reply I wish to state that the Catholic Church is opposed to provoking race hatred or to attacking people on account of their religious o rpolitical tenets. Hence it is needless for me to say that I do not approve of what the Rev. M. J. Foley has written or of what anyone else writes against the Jewish people in connection with Mr. E. Nathan's appointment as Italian Commissioner to the Panama-Pacific Exposition.

I wish also to declare, in this regard, that the Catholics of this country have protested against Mr. Nathan's appointment, and continue to protest against it, not because of his Jewish extraction or religious conviction, but because of his vulgar insults to the Pope, the head of the Catholic Church, by which he has offended Catholics of every nationality the world over.

In virtue of these principles, upon which you also base yourself, I feel confident that you will join us in protesting against the attitude of Mr. Nathan. I am

Yours Respectfully,
+John Bonzano,
Archbishop of Melitene,
Apostolic Delegate.

Catholic Union and Times, Buffalo, N. Y.

"Nathan, ex-Mayor of Rome, while an English Jew, does not represent the race of which he happens to be one. Some of our Catholic contemporaries entirely overlook this fact in commenting on the former mayor's brutal abuse of everything Catholic. The Anti-Defamation League, an organization made up of Jews, takes exception to the attitude of these Catholic papers, and we think with justice.

Nathan is clearly a misfit. The Anti-Defamation League is entirely correct. Our confreres are decidedly in the wrong when they refer to the blatant ex-mayor as representing the race which has been an important factor in the development of this country and which has ever insisted on liberty for all."

The Sacred Heart Review, Boston, Mass.

"We have received from the Anti-Defamation League, Chicago—a Jewish organization established for the purpose of taking action "against the constant and ever-increasing efforts to traduce the good name of the Jew,"—the copy of a letter sent by the League to the editor of one of our Catholic exchanges who has been "pitching in" to Ernesto Nathan the "little Jew Mayor of Rome," and incidentally accusing the Jews of being "veritable Hessians whose services are at the beck of the highest bidder," and so forth. Our Jewish friends believe that we do not approve of such methods, and they request an expression of our views.

Well, to begin with, we are in hearty sympathy with the Anti-Defamation League in so far as it aims to fight the scornful, sneering, supercilious attitude of so many so-called Christians towards the Jewish-race and the Jewish religion. The principles of the League, as given in the circular sent us, and the methods it purposes to use to attain its object, are set forth in a calm, judicious, businesslike way that does credit to the organization. We only wish that Catholics, who are given much to "ringing resolutions" and who seem to be satisfied when they have adopted them with cheers, might study and copy the methods of this Jewish League.

The Sacred Heart Review is opposed to all hatred of people on account of their race and religion; and in this it is only following Catholic teaching and Catholic practice. Even if this were not so, Catholics who have themselves suffered so much from defamation should be the last to descend to such a weapon in their controversy with others. So far as the Jews are concerned we never lose sight of the fact that they were once God's chosen people, and that our Blessed Lord Himself was a member of that race.

We are in sympathy also with the League's attempt to show that Nathan in his attacks upon the Holy Father was not the representative and spokesman of the Jewish people. We agree that it is wrong to blame the whole Jewish race for the actions and utterances of any one man. But we do believe that the League, having said so much, should have condemned the insulting attitude of Nathan toward the Holy Father, the spiritual head of 300,000,000 Christians.

In its circular the League says: "The League is not unmindful that upon the Jew himself rests a great burden. We must keep our own house in order, so that our complaints may have their greatest justification and effect." That is just the point here. Nathan, though not the official spokesman of the Jews, is still a Jew; and it would have been eminently proper, in view of the League's own statement of Jewish responsibility, to voice a protest against the campaign of insult conducted by Nathan against the venerable Head of the Catholic Church when he (Nathan) was Syndic of Rome.

We are, as we have said, in hearty sympathy with the League's principles; but we wish they had taken this occasion to condemn the insults offered by Nathan to the Holy Father. Had they done so they would have rendered stronger their own plea for justice."

REPLY OF ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE TO THE APOSTOLIC DELEGATE.

Chicago, June 12, 1914.

Most Reverend John Bonzano, Archbishop of Meletine, Apostolic Delegate,
Washington, D. C.

Your Grace:

Your esteemed favor of June 9th was received. I can assure you that we appreciate the same to the full. In reply to the latter part of same, I beg to state that we have not even had text of the utterances of Mr. Nathan. I will, however, unhesitatingly say, the Jewish people in general deprecate any attack made by any person against any religious sect, believing that each is entitled to the full privilege of worshipping according to the dictates of conscience, and that every man's religious convictions are entitled to the highest respect. I can further say that the Pope occupies such an exalted position in the Catholic church that he certainly is entitled to the courteous and respectful treatment of every individual, and that any discourteous conduct, no matter by whom, is deprecated by every fair-minded man, no matter what his religious tenets may be.

I beg to remain,

Very respectfully yours,
Sigmund Livingston.

THE UNION OF NATIVE JEWS OF ROUMANIA.

The Central Committee of the Union of Native Jews sent the following communication to newspapers: The Central Committee of the Union of Native Jews recently held a meeting for the purpose of discussing the situation created for the Jewish population by the fact that article 7 is ignored in the change of the constitution. The Union resolved to continue the agitation for the solution of the Jewish question with the same energy which it has displayed ever since the Union was established. The Central Committee declares that the solution of the Jewish question does not absolutely depend upon the alteration of article 7 of the constitution as this article adjusts the conditions of aliens in Roumania, while according to the old laws and usages the native Jews were and still are Roumanians. Moreover, the Roumanian government obligated itself in 1879, at the time when article 7 was discussed and after its sanction by the Minister of Foreign Affairs, Basile Borescu, to consider the native Jews as a class of Roumanians just as in the past and that no exceptional laws should be passed against them. From this point of view the Central Committee will carry the announced combat to the end of the revision of the constitution and will try to exert an influence upon the constituted authorities in the state to solve the Jewish question either by defining article 7 to mean that the native Jews are Roumanians or by finding a substitute of a similar nature in the articles of the constitution subject to alteration. The Central Committee lately again appealed to Roumanian public opinion and to all those who are not blinded by prejudice and hatred, for their support in the hard task of bringing about the great reform of emancipation of the Jewish population of Roumania simultaneously with the other reforms. It cannot be to the interest of the country and it is also not just that the Jewish question alone should remain unsolved when the political and economic changes are altering the appearance of Roumania and that a condition of things should be continued which injures the country externally and internally.

THE MUNCACSY RITUAL MURDER PICTURE.

The "Berliner Tageblatt" writes: The known national liberal agitator and brother of the late Prime Minister A. Stolypin recently published an article about the Kiev affair in the "Novoye Vremya" under the title of "The Triumph of Beilis," in which he says: "Lately I succeeded in forming the acquaintance of the possessor of a deeply affecting painting by Muncacsy which represents a ritual murder. The famous artist placed the symbolic sense into the fearfully realistic subject. The blond girl whom the Jews kill represents the slavic people and the faces of the bloodthirsty, blood letting "Zadikim" are likenesses of the leaders of Judaism. Among them are Rothschild and Montefiore. The history of this painting is very interesting. Many times attempts were made boldly to destroy it and it cannot be found in encyclopedic dictionaries except in that of Laronsse."

It is a fact that nothing can be found in the encyclopedias about this picture. The reason is very plain. Muncacsy did not paint this picture and Mr. Stolypin can calm himself. Neither is this picture mentioned in the register of Muncacsy's pictures. It is true that some malicious persons had exhibited this picture while Muncacsy was still alive with the signature of this celebrated artist. But the late Muncacsy protested everywhere against this procedure and declared it to be an unscrupulous fraud. When the widow of the deceased artist learned about the article of Stolypin she addressed a letter written in French to her Russian friends, the translation of which reads as follows:

"I learn that a person by the name of A. Stolypin has dared to state in a Russian paper, the "Novoye Vremya," that the painting "The Ritual Murder," which was repeatedly exhibited under the names of celebrated Hungarian painters, was painted by my deceased husband. I protest with all energy against such a base act. Fifteen or twenty years ago Mr. Muncacsy had this picture removed from an exhibition in Paris because it was exhibited under his name. Then somebody dared to exhibit this painting in Brussels and here too my husband had it removed, and now I learn that the same impudence is being enacted in Russia. The painting was neither painted nor inspired by my husband and I protest again with all my might against such a lie. I would be happy if my friends were to put an end at last to this infamy, for which I would forever be thankful to them."

B'NAI B'RITHISM.

On Sunday a week ago, at Bloomington, Ill., a large number of "B'nai B'rith" held a joint meeting, the members coming from Peoria, Springfield, Lincoln, Champaign and from the local lodge, about one hundred in all, and exhibiting an enthusiasm for the order and its activities which went to show that "B'nai B'rithism," a word of recent coinage, was alive and effective. On the next day, at Indianapolis, the lodge initiated eight candidates, and there, too, the brethren manifested a joyous zeal for the order which again testified to the remarkable vitality of this great Jewish organization. And we cite these cases merely to demonstrate that without any direct benefit to membership the order maintains itself almost solely by an altruism enough to carry it onward to the coming generations.—Jewish Voice.

THE NEW YORK JEW.

The New York Jew is a remarkable product. The public libraries that lend the largest number of books of a serious character are in the Jewish districts. The keenest pupils in the public schools are Jewish boys and girls. The high school that does perhaps the most remarkable work is the Washington Irving, whose membership of 6,000 girls is almost exclusively Jewish. On the East Side, the debating society is the favorite place of resort; the atmosphere is filled with conversation, with public lectures, with music. Instead of discussing particular politicians and aldermen, these people are more interested in public questions—in subways, budgets, tenement house reform, municipal ownership, Socialism. They are almost all radicals.—The World's Work.

THE FIFTY-FIRST PSALM

By Dr. Max L. Margolis

Written for the B'nai B'rith News.

From the initial words the fifty-first Psalm is known among Christians as "Miserere." With the "De Profundis," the one hundred and thirtieth of the collection, it stirs the hearts of men, wherever the spirit droops under the weight of sin and contrition takes possession of the soul. Sin and contrition are no Christian discoveries. It is true, Christianity has made a dogma of Original Sin and a modern Jewish divine has vindicated for Judaism the doctrine of Original Virtue. But as a matter of fact an overbundance of virtue has never troubled the pious mind. Jewish literature deals frequently with the good desire and the evil desire, but the evil desire by far predominates in letters as it does in life. The eternal warfare of good and evil is a constant theme. The meek voice of the good counsellor is contrasted with the boisterous promptings of passion. Passion is recognized as the builder of civilization: were it not for the evil desire men would not build houses nor marry nor rear families. Judaism makes allowance for the frailty of man. The law hedges him about and guards him against the deadly sins. There is still a boundary large enough which is free from restriction. Things are forbidden and things are permitted, but it is the mark of the saint to exercise restraint in the things that are permitted. Judaism by no means condemns asceticism. Withdrawal from the world is not for everybody or else the world would cease to be. All civilization would come to a standstill if all men were to shut themselves up in cloisters. But the community must be leavened by a body of men who cherish the ideal of saintliness, who by withdrawing from the strifes and passions of the world remind men of the invisible order of things which alone is worth while. Moreover, the Jewish saint withdraws from the world only after he has done his duty by the world.

Judaism certainly teaches that man's inclination is evil from birth. The pious bard who penned the Psalm of Penitence emphasizes this point in a manner nowhere else to be met with within the range of the Hebrew Scriptures. "Behold, I was shapen in iniquity; and in sin did my mother conceive me." The words may be understood superficially, after the fashion of the rationalists. Man acknowledges that at the moment of birth, nay of conception, sin was implanted in his nature. As we should say, the propensity to sin is inherent in the first organic cell of the embryo. But the words mean vastly more. It takes a poet to understand the poet, it takes a religious mind to catch the deepest thought of a religious poem. Rashi and the majority of Jewish commentators are nearer the mark and have grasped the innermost intent of the Psalmist's appeal when they declare that from the point of view of the poet the very act by which a human being is "shapened. conceived," is attended with sin. It is not a sinful act, it need not be one. Judaism enforces the propagation of the species as a duty. Celibacy is discountenanced. Yet Ben Azzai chose the Torah for his bride. Men of finer feelings cannot help knowing that the purpose for which man and woman cleave unto each other is too frequently lost sight of and that passion dominates the union. Man is therefore the offspring of sin. What then can be expected of man "born of woman?" How can anything pure come out of that which is impure, asks Job. And, if we follow the lead of Rashi, the Psalmist's confession of his misdeeds is coupled with the fine appeal that the offense was committed to justify God. Test me, the royal singer had asked in a spirit of self-sufficient assurance that he was above temptation and sin. He was tested. Now, argues David, had I conquered my evil desire, as it was in my power to do, I should have been justified in my boast. In other words, God would have been the loser in this wager between God and man. "Against Thee, Thee only, have I sinned, and done that which is evil in Thy sight; to the end that Thou mayest be justified in Thy ordering, and be clear in Thy judgment."

The difference between Christianity and Judaism is that the former has made a day of atonement of every Sunday. The Jewish Sabbath must not be marred by undue dwelling on sin and evil. It is a day of rest, of spiritual rest. Its groundtone is joy, not sadness. Some [illegible] men there are who say that the Jewish Sabbath was borrowed from Babylonia and that there it meant a day of evil omen. To the credit of the Jew be it then said that he has transformed a day of evil into a day "which is wholly good" and which means a foretaste of the future bliss. But we have our day of atonement when out of the depths the sinner's soul cries out for forgiveness. Sin has many Synonyms in Hebrew and so is the Hebrew language rich in words denoting the forgiveness of sins. One term is borrowed from commercial life. Sin is a debt incurred; it is placed on the debit side of our account in the heavenly ledger. Forgiveness means a blotting out of the record. Or sin is compared to an impure disease, it is a leprosy of the soul which requires the cleansing rites known to the priest. The sinner is an outcast. He has lost communion with God. He is without the joy of the clear conscience. His soul is depressed. His best impulses are gone; the holy spirit of God has been taken away from him.

God is forgiving. He abounds in loving kindness and tender mercies. Man turns to God as a child to its father. What we ask of God is not merely to forget and forgive. The Psalmist, imbued with the knowledge how perverse the human heart is and how futile are the promises which are seldom made good. prays for a re-birth for a spiritual transformation. "Create in me a clean heart, O God. and renew a right spirit within me." The cleansing must be performed within, the evil eradicated at its root. And the cure can only come from the great Physician of the soul.

The Psalmist offers no sacrifices in expiation. Sacrifices are a necessary element in the religion of the community. Ceremonial of one kind or another is indispensable to organized piety. But a far greater sacrifice, requiring effort of the will and complete self-effacement, is "a broken spirit, a broken and contrite heart." Contrition denotes sorrow of the soul and betokens utter helplessness. In it are the germs of the new birth. Sin is a religious term. A trespass against an abstract moral code is not sin. When the categorical imperative is transgressed, there is no hope for the transgressor. Stern morality says in the words of the prophet, The soul that sinneth must die. But the religious man knows that he has thwarted the Supreme Will, that he has offered an affront to the All-seeing Eye, that he has insulted the Majesty on high. To sin is terrible. But to be contrite and then to be the recipient of God's gracious forgiveness makes sin almost worth while. In the words of the Preacher, the common herd of fools who flock to the sanctuary with their sacrifices do not even know how to sin. Great sinners have been great men. Woe to them if they are so inured to sin that the finer sentiments of sorrow and sadness and contrition have no place in them. But those who sin and sincerely repent surpass the righteous who never tasted of sin.

Religion is for the finer souls. Those that are blessed with a sense of dependence upon a Higher and Holier Will, how happy is their lot. All of us are given to sin. To err is human. But the Psalmist and his like can pray and be redeemed, while the rest of humanity is sunk in the slough of sin. It may be pessimistic to adjudge the world impure and man as shapen in sin, but without an avowal of the unworthiness of man and the futility of his best efforts there can be no conception of the Divine Grace. An optimist, very much satisfied with himself and the world he is placed in, could not have penned the fifty-first Psalm. It is the deep insight into human nature that makes the poem a classic of religious literature, the hope and consolation of all those who, like the royal bard, have tasted of sin, have experienced the bitter sting of the consciousness of wrongs committed that cannot be recalled, and at the same time have had that indescribable joy of self-abasement and contrition, of turning in sheer self-condemnation and utter helplessness to the great Source of spiritual joy.

The Thread of Ariadne

By S. M. Fleischman, Supt. Emeritus Jewish Foster Home and Orphan Asylum, Philadelphia, Pa.

"He hath told thee, oh Man, what is good; and what the Lord doth require of thee; nothing but to do justice, to love kindness, and to walk humbly with thy God."

In this, the Twentieth Century, when an altruistic spirit is dominant in our land, when the Temple of Peace has been dedicated at The Hague, when churches, organizations and foundations social, non-sectarian and scientific, endeavor to uplift, and to lift up the suffering and the submerged, we find nations armed to the teeth, wholesale murder, dignified with the title of "holy war" devastating God's beautiful earth, and unnameable atrocities committed by races who call upon God to bless their handiwork. We find capital and labor engaged in a deadly conflict, the shambles close to the palatial residence, the poor and the rich, envious and haughty, and turn where we will, we see one man's hand raised against another. Selfishness, hate and superstition run riot through all the world, while at the banquet table of our boasted civilization, the Beiliss trial, the Huerta regicides and the poor house pop up like Banquo's ghost and "will not down!" "As one born in the land, shall be unto thee the stranger," as well as the injunction, "Even as you do it unto them, so do you it unto me," seem to pass unheeded, and where there should be the reign of peace and prosperity there is the carnival of hate, avarice and superstition. Since man began to think, he has endeavored to improve his condition. The law of self-preservation found expression in more ways than mere physical force, and before history was written nations had their cults, their mythologies and their philosophies.

What have they accomplished? Lewis, in his "Biography of Philosophy" asserts the state of Europe to be this: "Religion opposed to religion, philosophies opposed to philosophies, and religion and philosophies opposed to one another." He also makes this startling admission: "Grand indeed has been the effort of philosophy; great the part it has played in the drama of civilization, but the part is played out!" Now, in view of what has been proved, we ask have religions (theologies) succeeded where philosophy has failed? Can this be said of religion, and if not, why not?

The preservative power of religion is in faith. Every religion contains the essence of divine truth, the belief in a Supreme Being, whose relation towards man is that of a father devoted to the welfare of his children. Exclude philosophy and destroy religion and nothing remains but agnosticism and scepticism. One says "I don't know" and the other in life's darkest moment will act upon the advice of Job's wife: "Curse God and die!" Kant says: "God, the soul and the world are three ideas of reason." The reason, therefore, for the perpetuation of religions lies in the proper knowledge of God, the development of the soul and the promotion of the world's happiness. Yet theologies, like philosophies, have signally failed to solve the riddle of the Universe. or bring peace and good will upon earth.

Not only that, they have disrupted mankind, loosed the hydra of superstition, and, like King Minos of Greek mythology, have thrown millions of human beings' body and soul to the Minotaur, with the bull's body and the human head, religious persecution. Faith is of God, religion (theologies) is of man, and, while the force of gravitation in every religion is the soul's faith in God, theology or the expression in word and deed, in everyday life, is due to heritage, training and environments. As Oliver Wendell Holmes puts it: "Everyone is an omnibus in which his ancestors ride." Fichte tells us that "Faith is the ground of all conviction, moral and scientific;" to possess it, three qualities are needed, will power, mental concentration, and spiritual insight. Again quoting Fichte: "It is not knowledge, but a resolution of the will to admit the knowledge." "Think and thank," was Moses Montifiore's motto, the moral guide of a man, whose life complete or in detail, rounded to the fullness of a century, happy in its private sphere, and beneficent in its public activities, demonstrates the dual and harmonious influence of faith and its ally (science).

Twenty-five hundred years ago Socrates admonished Aristomedus to consider "that the soul which resides in the body can govern at pleasure, why not then should the soul of the universe which pervades and animates, every part of it govern in like manner. It is only when man comes in touch with the Infinite that he can hope to understand the grandeur of creation, losing himself in its mysteries, he either stands thoughtless before its prodigies, perhaps becomes a pantheist, perhaps one of the praying cattle, "Betvieh," or with the aid of spiritual insight (Faith) and scientific discoveries, learns to see the Creator in the work of his hands.

A classical education is not needed for revelation. Abraham, without it, understood God on Mt. Moriah, and the inspired psalmist, who, a thousand years ago, sung, "Day unto day uttereth speech and night unto night showeth knowledge," was no graduate of a university. Faith is the rejuvenating force of the spirit, and, as it manifested itself in early days among various people and in various forms, so is it today the common heritage of all. The beautiful ode of Joseph Addison, which we cite as a perfect specimen of spiritual insight is but a classical elucidation of the 19th Psalm, and, though written two hundred years ago, unsurpassed by any succeeding poet, fully justifies his dying exclamation: "Come and see how a Christian dies."

ODE.

The spacious firmament on high,
And all the blue ethereal sky
And spangled heavens, a shining frame
Their great original proclaim.
The unwearied sun from day to day,
Does his Creator's power display,
And publishes in every land
The work of an Almighty hand.

Soon as the evening's shades prevail,
The moon takes up the wondrous tale
And nightly to the list'ning earth
Repeats the story of her birth.
While all the stars, that round her burn,
And all the planets in their turn
Confirm the story as they roll
And spread the truth from pole to pole.

What though in solemn silence, all
Move round this dark, terrestrial ball
What though no real voice or sound
Amid their radiant orb be found
In Reason's ear they all rejoice
And utter forth a glorious voice;
Forever singing as they shine:
"The hand that made us is divine!"

We read in Greek mythology that when Theusus resolved to slay the monster in the cave of Daedelus, Ariadne, the king's daughter, prompted by love, gave him a sword wherewith to slay the Minotaur and a clew of thread to find his way out of the labyrinth. The story relates his success. This then is the analogy. God, in His infinite mercy, has placed in our hands the sword of absolute knowledge (science) and the thread of faith. With the one we have already fought many a valiant battle against prejudice and superstition. With the other many a doubting and distressed soul has emerged from the labyrinth of conflicting doctrines into the pure air of mutual toleration and into the sunlight of God's universal love. Already there are rifts in the clouds.

Sir Oliver Lodge in his recent declaration, that as a scientist he believes that "personality exists after death," has wonderfully strengthened Faith; while the universal public condemnation of Russia's ritual murder trial by the Christian clergy and laymen, inspires bright hopes for the future. From the eastern coast comes the voice for fraternity between Jew and Gentile, and on each Thanksgiving day the nation joins in worship of one God. Patriotism will even our path to universal brotherhood, science will level the separating walls of theologies.

Then faith and science, rich in store, shall slowly move along the plain,
Encircling all the earth once more, come gladly back to God again,
And from the land and from the sea, a joyous anthem shall arise,
Arouse us to activity and lift our souls toward the skies.
All praise to Thee, oh Lord, is due, who
hatest strife and bigotry;
We bring this offering to Thee, for peace, for truth and liberty.

NEWS FROM LONDON

BY OUR CORRESPONDENT DR. M. EPSTEIN

London, May 21, 1914.

The outstanding event of the month in London has been the simultaneous appearance of three plays of Jewish interest. It may be a common occurrence in America; here it is unique. Mr. Israel Zangwill's Melting Pot was first on the scene; at the time of writing over 100 performances have been given. It has been appraised as to its merits in the daily papers; it has been talked about from the pulpit, and it has been discussed in drawing-rooms. That only shows how deeply its impression must have been felt. It certainly brought the Jew to the notice of the intelligent playgoer; it presented a vital aspect of the Jewish problem. There is the less reason to give the details here, seeing that the play was staged in the States a few years ago, long before it came to England.

The second play of which we must tell also comes to us from America, and our readers' memories will no doubt recall the peals of laughter that resounded as the adventurers of Abe Potash and Mawruss Perlmutter proceeded apace on the stage. Mr. Montague Glass has certainly scored a success; the house is crammed full every night and the bookings are already months ahead. The play of Potash and Perlmutter has been extraordinarily well received, and, as one prominent critic put it, has achieved more in showing the world the Jew at his best than a hundred pro-Semitic treatises might have done. There is truth in the remark. In these days the stage is one of the great educators of public opinion, and a telling presentation leaves an impression on the average man, especially when you first put him into good humor. Mr. Glass has deserved well of his co-religionists; we are glad to note that by birth he is English.

Consequences by Mr. H. F. Rubinstein is the third play on the list. It has had only a short run as yet, but it was very well received. As you are to have the play in America there is no need to go into details as to the story. Suffice it to say that it is described as a comedy in three acts dealing with the behavior of a Gentile and of a Jewish family, when the madcap daughter of the Gentiles wants to marry the high falutin' son of the Jews.

The point of importance is that here we had in London three theaters to which people flocked in order to see a Jewish play. Did they go because they were interested in the Jews, or because of the humour in the plays? Possibly for both reasons. There is only one word that can describe the most marked feature of each of the plays and that word is "Chine." Mr. Glass's comedy possesses it in the highest degree; are not both its author and its principal actors Jews? But apart from that, there can be but little doubt but that the Jews are an attraction. A peculiar people from of old, the Jews are certainly interesting. They have been persecuted more than any other people; was it not Zangwill's phrase that "the people of Christ have become the Christ of peoples?" They are persecuted still. The method alone is different. And often enough there is a bitter humor about it.

Only today the papers report the revelation made by the Socialist Deputy in the German Imperial Parliament, Herr Liebknecht, concerning the sale of titles. What is it all about? It appears that a certain Dr. Ludwig, who is assistant manager of the "Imperial League for combatting Social Democracy made offers to medical men who desired the title of Professor to obtain the coveted honor for them. The cost is 10,000 dollars and 375 dollars by way of commission. But a higher price is demanded of foreigners than of Germans, and of Jews than of Gentiles! No wonder some American (was it not Mark Twain?) wrote of "the land of damned professors." The story in itself is interesting enough as casting a lurid light on one aspect of German life. But the touch about the higher rate of Jews is comic. Was not the Beiliss case also comic—but for its tragedy? And yet, despite little incidents like these, we may often come across announcements like the following: "The King dined at Palace House, Newmarket, on Wednesday, as the guest of Mr. Leopold de Rothschild." Truly, we are marvelous people; a people whose vicissitudes and characteristics are so eminently dramatic. No doubt it is one reason why the Jew on the stage is so attractive.

From plays to books is no great step. One of the best known books in Anglo-Jewry—we venture the assertion that a copy would be found in every Jewish home in England, Scotland, Wales and Ireland—is Singer's Prayer Book. That is its familiar title. Officially it is the "authorized" daily prayer book of congregations under the jurisdiction of the Chief Rabbi, translated by the late Reverend S. Singer. Before he died Mr. Singer had planned a commentary in the book in the shape of a series of notes, and this has now been completed by the late Mr. Singer's learned son-in-law, Dr. Israel Abrahams, of Cambridge. As it is published now, the prayer book, with its fine notes and comments, is probably the most useful and interesting Jewish prayer book in the world. It is a source of gratification to English Jews, and if The Jewish Encyclopedia comes from America, Singer's prayer book (together with its commetary) hales from England. The truth is, and indeed, it is the higher view, that learning is international, and Jewish learning, in a sense, even more so than general learning. Hence all Jews will also welcome the latest book of Mr. Claude Montefiore, containing two essays about Paul of Tarsus. It is possible, it is even probable, that some readers will not agree with all that Mr. Montefiore sets forth in the little volume. But it is certain that all will be charmed by his argument, and above all by the happy presentation of traditional Judaism which appears in the first essay. Incidentally Mr. Montefiore requires for his consideration a sketch of what traditional Judaism stands for. He supplies it himself, and traditional Jews without exception will read it with pleasure. If only for that alone the book was worth publishing.

The first Sunday in May is what is familiarly termed "Election Sunday." Election for what? The answer is for officers of the local synagogues that form part of the United Synagogue. This last organization rules the Synagogues, whose property they are, in general matters; for local affairs there are annually chosen wardens and committees of management. But these local questions cannot be of any very great living interest seeing that comparatively small attendances were the rule at almost every synagogue. No grave matters of importance came up; in seven synagogues the question of giving votes to women was raised; in one only was it defeated. But do not imagine that in the other six the principle will at once be carried into practice. Not so. Until the Council of the United Synagogue has agreed, these votes are merely pious expressions of opinion. The local congregation may decide whether or not the Priestly blessing (Duchan) shall form part of the service; it cannot decide definitely whether the vote shall be given to its lady members. This is only one instance of the rigidity (and therefore the weakness) of the United Synagogue as a social organization. It may have served its purpose a generation ago: to-day its constitution needs reforming. But the powers that be are somewhat afraid of reform. Hence we jog along, the United Synagogue remaining what its critics have called it—a financial corporation chiefly interested in burying people.

In our London letter last month we mentioned the great appeals that were before Anglo-Jewry. It may interest our readers to learn that those already closed did not realize what they set out to obtain. The Jewish Historical Society asked for 5,000 dollars; it got only 3,000. The Jewish Religious Education Board wanted 75,000 dollars; only 50,000 dollars came in. These are the most serious of the appeals. Three possibilities may account for the comparatively small response. Perhaps the collections were badly organized. It's personal effort that moves the world; perhaps personal effort was lacking or there was not sufficient of it. It may be so. Or possibly our charities require to be co-related in order to avoid overlapping. The same sources are tapped. The tapping should therefore be properly organized. Or it may be that Anglo-Jewry won't give. This does not seem to be the case. When we consider that pennies accumulate into thousands of pounds, that the poor help the orphans and the incurables and the aged, it does seem that the last diagnosis cannot be right.

But we have proof positive. If the wells of Israel had dried up, would so careful a body of people as those who are striving for the Jewish hospital decide to proceed with their plan and put up their building? Yet such is the case. The land is there; the bricks and mortar are coming shortly, at a cost of over 50,000 dollars. So great is the optimism of the promoters of the scheme that in face of the unsatisfactory response to the collections mentioned, they are going ahead. That means more collections. But enthusiasm in such a cause is good. It ought certainly to command the sympathy of every member of the First Lodge of England. A rather interesting feature of the seventh annual meeting of the London Jewish Hospital Association was the introduction to those present of a boy of ten who was president of the thriving children's branch of the Association, consisting of 300 members, each paying one half penny (say 1 cent) per week, and of a little girl who had collected on an average during the year some 10 dollars a week for the Hospital.

It is only fair to state that the idea of the Jewish hospital meets with a good deal of opposition. Some people hold that it is not necessary, seeing that the general hospitals in this country number Jews among their subscribers and their patients. The reply to that is that there is room for yet another temple of healing. More to the point is the criticism of others who ask how the hospital is going to be supported. Only an intense optimism is the reply to this argument; and certainly the promoters of the scheme are to be congratulated on their faith. Whether their faith will be justified time alone will show.

"As a mark of the friendly feeling which happily exists between the Ashkenazi and Sephardi sections of the community" the "Gentlemen of the Mahamad" (so the Council of the ancient Spanish and Portuguese Congregation is still called) invited Dr. Hertz, the Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi, to preach in their uptown synagogue. This is a sign of the times. A few generations ago, a Sephardi, with all the pride of a Spanish Don, would have scorned to marry the daughter of a "German" co-religionist. To-day both sections of Anglo-Jewry work in harmony, like brothers. In work of charity, in religious education, in Shechita, a common cause is theirs. The compliment paid to the Chief Rabbi was not paid so much to the man as to the office, and the intention clearly was symbolical to hold out the hand of friendship to the larger and more important, though less historic, section of the community. The whirligig of time accomplishes much. One is inclined to ask, whether there will ever be one united congregation, Sephardi. Ashkenazi, even Reformers too, in England.

From Spain we are getting good news; shall we ever hear good news from Russia or Rumania? From the first named country we learn that Matzoth were sent to the Czarina as usual this year; but in restricting the rights of joint-stock companies the Government forbids them among other things to elect Jews as members of their Boards. Was ever blindness so obvious? A man is usually not elected to the board of a company by virtue of his race or religion. Surely business capacity is the sole test. Now given an elected board of a joint stock company, imagine any government decreeing that red haired men shall not in future be eligible for election. Would not this be madness? Yet substitute Jews for red-haired men and the case is perfectly analagous. The conditions seem so hopeless that the voice of the charmer (and there are some, for instance, Professor Nekrassoff, Vice-President of the Cadet Party) who foretells a time when liberty shall be dominant in Russia too, sounds like a far-off dream.

Russia's example is having evil effects on her neighbor, Rumania. During the negotiations that preceded the treaties of London and Bucharest, the world was assured in high-sounding promises that Rumania would continue all their rights to the inhabitants of the territory ceded by Bulgaria. A country 2,969 square miles in extent with a population of 286,000 people is involved. And now? Once in possession, Rumania is putting off the redemption of her promise. Small wonder! Europe allowed her to snap her fingers at the provisions of the Treaty of Berlin. Is it remarkable that now when she is in a much stronger position she would do so again with impunity? Righteousness and justice still need to be preached to the world; the Jews' mission is far from being ended.

The First Lodge of England is steadily, if slowly, increasing its membership. The standard for admission is a high one; nevertheless it is hoped that we will number one hundred by the end of this year. More members necessarily means greater capacity for further undertakings. It means moreover that the spirit of the order, the special point of view with which to regard all Jewish problems, will be carried into different channels of Jewish life to a greater degree than before. It is due to Brother Augustus Kahn, our President for the year, that the question of increased membership is being tackled once more. Besides this, Brother Kahn is winning golden opinion for his qualities as a chairman. This is no reflection on our past presidents. On the contrary, we are glad to feel that we are establishing a tradition in this respect and a healthy tradition is perhaps the most valuable asset that a brotherhood like ours can possess.

THE TOMB OF MAIMONIDES.

A committee has been formed in Tiberias for the purpose of erecting a protecting wall around the burial place of Maimonides and the neighboring graves of Rabbi Johanan ben Sakkai and his disciples, also of Rabbi Jesaiah Hurwitz, author of the work, "Sh'ne Luchoth Hab'rith" (Sh'loh); to place a memorial stone upon the grave of Maimonides, to purchase the adjoining lots and establish thereon a Jewish quarter under the name of Maimoni and to build a house for the study of the Talmud, bearing the name of this great scholar; also to establish a publishing house under the name of "Maimonia" for the publication of "Talmudic works and books of the science of Judaism. At the head of this committee stand the well known Sephardic scholar, I. M. Toledano, and Jachia Nagari, former Rabbi of Beja, Tunis.

Degree Team of Springfield Lodge 684, I. O. B. B.

Top row, Harry Elkin, Wm. F. Katz, David E. Hertzmark, Walter A. I. Widlansky, Joshua J. Davidson.

In the short space of two years the degree team of Springfield Lodge No. 684, has won a place among the leaders of the District in degree work. It has become noted as one of the best, if not the best, team in District No. 1. At every meeting a request is received from some lodge asking that arrangements be made for a visitation, and as the team pays its own expenses many of them have to be declined.

At the convention of District No. 1, held in Springfield in February, 1914, a class initiation was prepared and worked out by the Springfield Degree Team that evoked the hearty praise of the visiting delegates. This paragraph from the report of the proceedings of the convention tells its own story:

"The most conspicuous feature of the entire convention was the initiation of thirty-three candidates to Massachusetts lodges by officers and Degree Team, showing signal ability in the delivery of the ritual. The excellent vocal and instrumental music made a beautiful service practically perfect."

The team was organized in February, 1912, composed of the following officers: William M. Ziff, president; Herman Krotinger, vice-president; Hyman Ehrlich, monitor; Dr. Myron Wessler, assistant monitor; Daniel Hertzmark, secretary; M. L. Ganz, warden. The team made a number of trips, including Worcester, where they initiated 12 candidates; New Haven, where, in the presence of over 500 members, they initiated 14 candidates; Holyoke, where they instituted the lodge with 30 candidates, and Pittsfield, where, in the presence of President Joseph Silverman, they initiated 10 candidates.

The new Degree Team, with the following officers traveled to New Britain in March of this year and initiated 15 candidates: Frederick Rabinowitz, president; Herman Krotinger, vice-president; H. B. Goodman, secretary; Rabbi Samuel Price, monitor; Dr. Myron Wessler, assistant monitor; Harry M. Ehrlich, warden.

The team has its own choir and orchestra and in this way makes the degree work all the more impressive.

The members of the lodge have formed a Degree Club in order that the work may be facilitated. It is planned to have substitute ready for every speaking part so that no matter what happens, the work of the team can go on. The club also makes possible the formation of a marching squad, as in order to become a member of the Degree Club the member must take some part in the degree work.

JOSHUA LODGE, PHILADELPHIA.

At the meeting of Joshua Lodge Tuesday evening, May 12, a committee of twenty-five was appointed, with M. S. Meyerhoff, grand treasurer of the district, as chairman, to devise way and means to assist the Home for Orphans and Friendless Children, at Erie, Pa., and a strenuous campaign will be conducted. The May meeting was made exceptionally interesting by talks by prominent members of the lodge, the following making interesting addresses on the welfare of the lodge and order: Leon J. Obermayer, J. Solis Cohen, Jr., and Charles E. Asnis.

The president of the district, Abe Weil, reported a most healthy condition of the order in the district. In the western section, from which he had just returned, after paying an official visit to the lodges in Pittsburgh and other cities, he reported a steady growth in membership. At McKeesport, Pa., he was greeted by 1,200 people at a public meeting, showing the interest being taken by the people at large in the welfare of the new Home.

Refreshments were served after the meeting, which were partaken of by over 75 members of the lodge.

Grand Lodge Officers Visit Pittsburgh

If the enthusiasm displayed and the sentiments expressed at the great B'nai B'rith gathering that was held in Pittsburgh on Sunday, May 10th ,are indicative of the character of the work which will mark the administrition of Abe Weil of Philadelphia as president of District Grand Lodge No. 3, the two years, during which he will occupy the administrative leadership of the district, may be depended upon to bring much success and considerable progress to the cause for which the order stands. With the spirit of optimism as its keynote and the pledge of personal service as its platform, the assemblage which was Allegheny county's tribute to the new President of the District was indeed an inspiration to the officials of the Grand Lodge and to the rank and file of the membership of the district.

Sunday's meeting was held at 2 o'clock in the afternoon in the meeting room of the Jericho Lodge, No. 44, Century building. An outpouring of B'nai B'rith members that filled tier after tier of seats in this spacious hall greeted the president and his colleagues, and throughout the afternoon's exercises this large gathering evidenced their loyalty to the principles of the order and their desire to assist the new head of the district in the work which now rests upon him and his official family. Every lodge of the order in Allegheny county participated in the event, and from every one of them came groups of members to encourage Mr. Weil in his undertaking and to pledge their support to his labors.

The meeting opened with a large class initiation, conducted by a degree team composed of A. L. Solomon of Pittsburgh, past president of the district, as president; Isidore Sobel, of Erie, also a past president, as vice president; Oscar H. Rosenbaum, of Pittsburgh, a past president of the district, as monitor; Isidore Reizenstein, of Pittsburgh, as assistant Monitor and Max Arnold, of Pittsburgh, as warden. Incidental music for the initiatory exercises was furnished by Joseph Buka and Albert Pulaski of Saar Sholem Lodge. The exercises were excellently conducted, the liturgy of the order being expounded in an admirable and impressive manner.

Addresses by Officials.

Mr. Solomon acted as master of ceremonies, and presented, as the first speaker of the day, Mr. Weil, the president of the Grand Lodge. This was Mr. Weil's first visit to Pittsburgh since his elevation to the presidency and in his address he struck the keynote of his administration. Mr. Weil indicated that his leadership of the district will be marked by a strong effort to increase the size, strength and efficiency of the membership, lodges and work of the order in this part of the country. He predicted that by the end of his administration the membership of District Grand Lodge No. 3, will have reached the number of five thousand, and the spirit of his address bore evidence that he will put forth the best human effort in the attempt to fulfill this prediction. Mr. Weil also made a strong plea for support for the B'nai B'rith Orphanage and Home for Friendless Children, at Erie, Pa., and called upon the membership of the district to give to it their unstinted moral and financial aid.

Mr. Weil was followed by M. S. Meyerhoff of Philadelphia, treasurer of the grand lodge. Mr. Meyerhoff spoke of his observations of the lodges of the order in Germany, as the result of his visit to that country during the past year.

Louis Sulzbacher of Braddock, secretary of the Grand Lodge, was the next speaker, and made a strong plea for a greater interest in the lodge work by the members of the individual lodges. Mr. Sulzbacher also lauded the unselfish character of the order's work and praised the altruistic spirit with which the members of this fraternity have given of their labors to the services of mankind.

Stirring Appeals to Members.

An address which will long be remembered by those present at Sunday's meeting was that delivered by Judge Josiah Cohen, of this city. Judge Cohen spoke in a stirring manner of the call to duty which the spiritual side of the work of the B'nai B'rith sounds to every Jew—the call which arises not from the mere symbolism of the order, nor from the ritualistic observances incidental to its meetings, but the call which demands of every member that his life be Jewish in the highest sense of that name, and which requires of him that his character shall be such that all the world may know that Jewish thought and the philosophy of the Jewish religion have not been without value in moulding his character as a man. The speaker referred in glowing terms to the worthy example of life and living which the Jew has given to the world in the years that are gone by and appealed to his auditors so to fashion their lives that they might indeed be true and worthy sons of the Covenant in these days, as their ancestors were in bygone years. The Judge's remarks were greeted with great enthusiasm and made a profound impression on all present.

Judge Cohen was followed by Hon. Isidore Sobel, of Erie, president of the B'nai B'rith Orphanage and Home for Friendless Children of District No. 3. No man knows the cause of the needy child better than does Mr. Sobel, and from his wealth of experience in dealing with the parentless and the friendless, tempered by a heart that beats in close sympathy with their appeal, he drew in his address of Sunday afternoon a series of pictures associated with the work of the institution at Erie that went straight to the hearts of the assembled brethren and inspired them to greater effort in the cause of the unfortunate child.

Concluding Addresses.

Leon B. Stein, of Wheeling, was the next speaker. Mr. Stein told of the work that is being done by his own lodge and assured the members of the Allegheny county lodges that Wheeling may be depended upon in the future to contribute its share of service to the cause for which the B'nai B'rith stands.

Following Mr. Stein's remarks a very interesting address was made by Leonard S. Levin, Esq., of this city. Mr. Levin appealed to the members present to sacrifice self for the general good of the order and of mankind as a whole. He reminded the members that a man is to be judged to a considerable degree by the amount of service of a personal character which he gives to the community in which he lives, and he appealed to the assembled brethren to carry into actual practice the teachings and the principles propounded in the lodge room.

Hon. Adolph Edlis, of this city, a member of the general committee of the district, made a plea for a greater interest by the membership in the work of the lodges themselves and impressed upon the brethren the necessity of attendance at meetings and the benefit which is to be derived from the spirit of the work which is generated at these gatherings. Mr. Edlis's remarks were heard attentively by the members present at Sunday's meeting and will no doubt result in much that is good for the future of the district.

Preceding the afternoon's meeting a luncheon had been held, with Mr. Weil and his colleagues as honor guests, at the Fort Pitt Hotel. The luncheon was attended by some fifty members of the order. Earlier in the day a meeting of the local members of the general committee of the district was held, as was also a meeting of the propaganda committee of western Pennsylvania.

All in all, the day was one which cannot help but spell success for the work of the B'nai B'rith in Allegheny county and the whole District No. 3. No member present could have missed the inspiration which the gathering gave to the cause of the order, and none there were, but must have been stirred to the depths by the splendid appeals contained in the afternoon's addresses. As for the honor guest of the day, Mr. Weil, his must be the realization that Allegheny county stands solidly behind him in his administration, and that whatever there is of useful and progressive work to be done by the district western Pennsylvania members will heartily join, in doing it, with him as their leader. The president takes home with him from Allegheny county the loyalty and devotion of many hundred members of the B'nai B'rith, and when the two years of his administration have run their course he will have found that the western end of Pennsylvania has not been remiss in its duty and its efforts to place District No. 3 where Mr. Weil would have it.

McKEESPORT LODGE CELEBRATES TENTH ANNIVERSARY.

McKeesport Lodge, No. 573, of McKeesport, Pa., celebrated the tenth anniversary of its institution on Sunday evening, May 10, 1914. The celebration was held at the Altemeyer's Theater and the place was crowded to its capacity. The splendid attendance was a tribute to the President of the District, Brother Abr. Weil of Philadelphia, on the occasion of his first official visit to McKeesport Lodge.

Accompanying President Weil were Mr. M. S. Meyerhoff, Treasurer of the District Grand Lodge; Isidor Sobel of Erie and A. L. Solomon of Pittsburgh, both ex-presidents of the Grand Lodge; Louis Sulzberger of Braddock, Secretary of the Grand Lodge; Adolph Edlis of Pittsburgh, member of the General Committee.

A feature of the evening was the assembling on the stage of all the Past Presidents of the Lodge.

The meeting was opened by an invocation by Rev. Dr. Louis Brav and was presided over by Mr. Joseph Rubin, President of the Lodge, who gave a recital of its activity for the past ten years.

The speaker of the evening was Mr. Abr. Weil. In his address he congratulated the lodge upon having reached the tenth anniversary and made a plea for an increase both in the size and strength and efficiency of the membership of the lodge. Mr. Louis Sulzberger, Secretary of the District, who was instrumental in organizing McKeesport Lodge, followed with a stirring address. Mr. M. S. Meyerhoff in his remarks emphasized the need of loyalty to the order and expounded its true principles. Mr. Isidor Sobel, president of the Orphan Home of Erie, spoke on the orphanage.

The meeting was brought to a close with the benediction by Dr. Brav. In the course of the evening a piano was disposed of, which had been offered as a prize in the raising of money for the benefit of the orphanage.

BUTTE, MONT.

Grand President Morris N. Schneider and Grand Orator Rabbi M. Friedlander, both of Oakland, Cal., were entertained at a meeting of Baron de Hirsch Lodge No. 420, of Butte, Mont., on May 4, 1914.

Following the business meeting and initiation of a class of candidates the two visiting Grand Lodge officers addressed a public meeting, talking on the aims and objects of the Order and the immigration question on the Pacific Coast when the Panama Canal shall be open to traffic.

At the close of the meeting the visitors were entertained with a dinner, which was participated in by the leading members of the lodge.

BOISE, IDAHO.

Nathan Falk Lodge No. 481 of Boise City, Idaho, was paid an official visit by District Grand Lodge President Morris N. Schneider and Grand Orator Rabbi M. Friedlander, both of Oakland, Cal., on May 1st and 2nd, 1914.

They were entertained with an automobile trip viewing all points of interest.

On Friday evening, after services at the Temple, Mr. Schneider delivered an address, taking for his subject the duty of the members of the Order to eradicate any wrong done to the Jew, also about the work and problems of the Order. Rabbi Friedlander spoke on the subject "Who is a Jew?"

After the services were over the visitors were escorted to the Owyhee Hotel, where a banquet was served and a jolly good time enjoyed by all. Short talks were made by the visiting Grand Lodge officers and others. Mr. Henle acted as toastmaster.

SEATTLE, WASH.

The B'nai B'rith lodges of Seattle held a joint special meeting in honor of visiting Grand Lodge officers, President Morris N. Schneider and Grand Orator Rabbi M. Friedlander, of Oakland, Cal. The visitors addressed the meeting on the work of the Order and its accomplishments during the past year and succeeded in arousing much interest and enthusiasm among the members.

Leaving Seattle, the visitors made a tour of the state for the purpose of organizing lodges in various parts of the state. They also visited Vancouver and Victoria.

JOINT MEETING OF WASHINGTON AND MACCABEE LODGES, NEW YORK.

By far the most interesting and important meeting held in the Metropolitan District since the beginning of the year was that held on Thursday, May 21st, at Terrace Garden, when the members of Maccabee Lodge paid a formal visit to Washington Lodge.

The meeting was opened by the officers of Washington Lodge and after the Lodges were in session a number of musical selections were excellently rendered by the Washington Lodge Orchestra under the direction of Brother Goudeket.

There followed a lecture on "Philo Judaeus and His Times," by Brother W. D. Dreyfus, Ph. D. Brother Dreyfus discussed the history of the Jews in Alexandria at the beginning of the present era and dwelt on the philosophy of Philo Judaeus.

After the lecture the officers of Maccabee Lodge, Brother Samuel M. Roeder, President, and Rabbi Herbert S. Goldstein, Vice-President, were with due ceremony escorted to their respective stations and Brother D. V. Meyer, M. Stark, President of Wahsington Lodge presented the gavel to Brother Roeder and the officers of Maccabee Lodge presided during the remainder of the evening.

The room was then prepared for initiation, and a large class of candidates were initiated by a Degree Team composed of both Lodges.

Under good and welfare the following brethren spoke: Henry Meyers, of the Board of Governors of the Home; I Irving Lipsitch of the General Committee; Reginald E. Zunder, Secretary of the District; Clarence Y. Palitz, Past-President of Maccabee Lodge, and Mayer M. Stark, President of Washington Lodge.

Brother Cuencia of Constantinople Lodge delivered an address in German, telling of the work done in the Orient by the B. B. for the betterment of the Jewish people and what efforts the Oriental District is making in combatting the traffic in White Slavery.

Brother Harry G. Fromberg made an eloquent plea for B'nai B'rith work on the East Side to educate the Jewish youth in that section in the principles of their religion.

Two of the newly initiated candidates, Brothers Polak and Behr, spoke feelingly on the impression they received on joining the Order. Brother Polak was recently elected Register of Bronx County.

Upon motion, Brother Samuel M. Roeder thanked the officers and members of Washington Lodge for their generous hospitality. He pointed out that these two of the largest Lodges in New York City had met jointly for the first time in a large Lodge Room, every seat of which was filled and that most important work had been accomplished. He hoped the feeling of friendship would continue, and invited the members of Washington Lodge to return the visit. Brother Stark, on behalf of Washington Lodge, responded fittingly and accepted the invitation.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.

On Monday, May 11th Adullam Lodge No. 326 held a very interesting meeting. The speaker of the evening, Past Grand President of the District Brother Charles M. Stern, who was introduced by State Deputy Brother Leo Zander, referred to the splendid achievements being accomplished by the Order and the District, and of the indefatigable work of the members of the Lodge in recruiting its ranks. The membership has almost doubled in the past year and in consequence thereof a greater interest has been manifested in its wellfare. There is no doubt that when 1915 rolls around Adullam will be up among the leaders. This will be accomplished under the able and efficient leadership of its officers. Several candidates were initiated by the Degree team, and the brethren of the Lodge have promised that the team will be busily occupied performing the initiatory ceremony.

THE CINCINNATI LODGE.

On Monday evening, May 11, 1914, the Cincinnati Lodge No. 4 initiated a class of nine candidates. The attendance was unusually large and the work of the degree team most impressive. For the past three meetings the lodge has been initiating candidates and there are several classes on the list, which together with an additional number of new ones, are expected to be initiated before the summer recess.

What Our Lodges Are Doing

JORDAN LODGE, NEW YORK.

The first six months of the administration of David Kraus, President of Jordan Lodge, is about to draw to a close, and the final initiation for this season was held on Thursday, June 4, 1914. At this initiation there were present the various Presidents of the Lodges of the City of New York, as well as members of the Intellectual Advancement Committee of the District, and the officers and members of Akiba Lodge, as the degree team of Jordan Lodge initiated on this night candidates proposed for membership in Akiba Lodge as well as in Jordan.

Jordan Lodge, always looked upon as one of the banner lodges of the District, has upheld its reputation during the past six months and the officers of the Lodge have left no stone unturned to bring success to the lodge and District. A great number of candidates have been proposed during these six months; interesting meetings have been held at which it has been the pleasure of the officers and members to listen to addresses delivered by the President of the District, Rev. Dr. Silverman, and the first Vice-President of the District, Brother Herman Asher, a member of the Lodge: we have also listened to addresses delivered by Rev. Dr. H. Periera Mendes, Dr. Eugene H. Lehman and Brother William Asher, Past President of the Lodge, and Joseph Rosensweig. We have also been honored by visits of Brother Charles Hartman, Past President of the District, Honorary member of Jordan Lodge and member of the Executive Committee.

The Entertainment Committee, under the leadership of Brother Jesse Friedlander, has rendered loyal and faithful service, and through the efforts of this committee, a state of brotherly love and friendship exists amongst the brothers never heretofore achieved within this Lodge. The recent theater party was a great success, and in the fall the Bowling Club will again hold its weekly meetings.

The Degree team of this lodge has assisted whenever called upon to initiate candidates of other lodges, and in the fall additional members will serve on the team and continue this work.

RESOLUTIONS

Upon the death of Brother Sim M. Lion, the following minute was adopted by Maccabee Lodge No. 1, I. O. B. B.

Our Brother Sim M. In his private life, his gentleness, kindness and charity endeared him to all who knew him.

We greatly deplore his loss. His place in our Order will not easily be filled.

We tender our heartfelt condolences to his widow and children, assuring them, that his memory will always be cherished by our members, with hearts full of love and gratitude, that we were privileged to work with him in his labors of love.

JUBILEE CELEBRATION OF ANHALT LODGE NO. 389 OF DESSAU, GERMANY.

On March 3rd, 1914, Anhalt Lodge celebrathed its 25th anniversary. The Lodge was established at a time when the German District was in the beginning of its development and was seeking to build up an activity founded upon the principles of the Order. Anhalt Lodge was at all times earnestly endeavoring to co-operate in this work of upbuilding. The ceremonies of the celebration fully demonstrated this fact. On that day 18 new candidates were initiated in the Lodge. The initiation of the new candidates gained special distinction from the fact that it was conducted by the most worthy Grand President, Brother Timendorfer, and was witnessed by more than 100 brethren, 60 of whom were from sister Lodges. In his address to the candidates the most worthy Grand President confined himself to the explanation of the signs and forms of the Order, but he brought out of these external forms of the Order such a wealth of inner value of the same, that not only the newly initiated brethren but also the old members of the Order gained a thoughtful understanding of the aims and aspirations of the Order and all enjoyed a truly elevating hour.

The six founders of the Lodge, who are still among the living, were honored by the presentation of a gold lodge emblem to each and by assigning to them seats of honor.

The President of the Lodge; Brother Herman Marcus, who was its first presiding officer twenty-five years ago, was honored by having his picture unveiled as a permanent ornament in the lodge room.

The ceremonies were opened by a prologue, composed by Brother Ex-President Rosenbaum. Then Brother Ex-President, Chief Rabbi Dr. Walter, delivered the festal oration. In words of deep sentiment the speaker unfolded the moral treasures of the Order and the ideal strivings of Anhalt Lodge. He pointed to many a deed of the Lodge which redounded to the benefit of the entire district. The oration roused great enthusiasm for the Order and was very much applauded.

Dr. Walter was followed by the worthy Grand President, Bro. Timendorfer, who, as usual, won all hearts by his warm words of recognition and appreciation of the achievements of Anhalt Lodge.

Many delegates of sister lodges and of different associations then expressed their congratulations to Anhalt Lodge, which were received with great appreciation.

The festivities closed with a grand banquet and a theatrical performance enacted by children of the members of the Lodge.

The celebration in general was a grand success. The participating friends and brethren will carry a lasting elevating impression with them which will keep alive enthusiasm for B'nai B'rith ideals and for the benign work of the Order.

EMES LODGE, SPRINGFIELD, ILL.

By Rabbi S. Tedesche.

Emes Lodge, No. 67, of Springfield, Ill., has been holding so many successful meetings that the seating capacity of our lodge room is no longer adequate. Our intellectual programs and the open discussions that follow are popular and the members have so far found the meetings interesting. May 3d, Brother B. A. Lange, local member of the Grand Lodge, lectured on the History of Reform Judaism in Germany. Brother Lange was able to speak at first hand on this subject as for 60 years he has been an intelligent and close student of Judaism, especially in Germany and America. Now, although past three score and ten, with the keen, alert mind and manner of a man much younger, the speaker told of the history and early struggles of the reform movement, vividly describing the great work of Abraham Geiger, Leopold Zunz and their contemporaries. Brother Lange spoke from the fullness of his own personal experience and the large number of members present were truly inspired by his excellent address. The committee on Intellectual Advancement has two more meetings scheduled for this year and all are looking forward to hearing the speakers they have chosen.

HELENA, ARK.

At a regular meeting of Esther Lodge No. 159 of Helena, Ark., held on May 25, 1914, the following resolution was introduced and unanimously adopted:

"Since this is the first time in many years that by fate's decree the presence of Brother Aaron Meyers is missing, we feel the weight of this bereavement to our lodge very deeply, and while suitable resolutions upon the death of our lamented brother, Aaron Meyers, will be spread by the customary committee appointed for that purpose, it is desired to confine myself to a short dissertation upon the untiring services in our order shown by our lamented brother ever since the starting of our District, but more particularly on his activities in behalf of the life and welfare of our own lodge.

Those of us who have been members of this lodge for a period of years remember well and are ready to acknowledge that the very existence of our lodge was many times threatened owing to the utter lack of interest by the meager membership, and it was only due to the determination and the enthusiasm of Brother Aaron Meyers that this lodge not only survived that period, but is today enjoying a flourishing as well as an enthusiastic membership.

In recognition then of his great services to our order, but particularly to our own lodge, the preservation of which we acknowledge we owe to him, and in order that his memory and his life work for our lodge be commemorated by us and those who shall join after us, it is moved, our honorable Grand Lodge consenting, that the name of our lodge be changed from Esther Lodge No. 159 to Aaron Meyers Lodge No. 159."

In submitting the foregoing resolution for the approval of the Executive Committee of the Order, Brother Nat Strauss, of New Orleans, Secretary of District Grand Lodge No. 7, says as follows:

"Aaron Meyers was a man true and earnest, who enjoyed the friendship and esteem of all who knew him. He was one of the remnants of that old band of leaders, and though not a great speaker, modest as he was, he wielded an influence that but few could claim. He was a type of those pioneers who are fast passing away and who will be sadly missed in the councils of the order."

Rabbi Dr. M. Friedlander delivered an eloquent and instructive address, outlining the duties of parents to take care of our younger generations, to teach them morally and physically to be good citizens and good Jews, to respect the countries where they live, to help the poor and strengthen the brotherly love, urging them to organize at the earliest convenience a B'nai B'rith lodge, which stands for the uplift of Judaism. The fact that the Grand President of the District is a member of the lodge, has given Memphis Lodge a fresh impetus and the officers and members are exerting every effort to make the lodge the banner lodge of the District.

DISTRICT NO. 8.

The Grand Lodge for Germany, received a sum of money from a member of the Deutsche-Reichs Lodge No. 332, of Berlin, for the purpose of establishing a Moritz-Manheimer foundation. The Grand Lodge is to announce in the name of this foundation annual prizes for the best treatises on a philanthropic theme in which love of humanity, justice and tolerance are to be designated as the ground pillars of human society. Four prizes are allotted, one of 2,000 marks, one of 1,000 marks, and two of 500 each.

Commercialrat Maximilian Stein of Berlin, who is widely known through his active participation in B'nai B'rith and general Jewish affairs, was recently honored by the Emperor of Austria with the award of the Francis Josef order.

The Grand Lodge for Germany has appointed a special committee on eugenics. The betterment of the physical and moral condition of the people is at the present time arousing great interest in Germany. The German Jews are joining the movement and the Grand Lodge recognizes the importance of this timely endeavor.

The Grand Lodge for Germany celebated its 29th anniversary on March 28th, 1914.

Anhalt Lodge No. 389 of Dessau, celebrated its silver jubulee in March, 1914.

A meeting of the Building Committee of the B'nai B'rith Home at Beelitz, took place on Wednesday, April 8th. This institution is in need of more room, especially for more work-shops. At present there are 31 boys and 13 girls in the Home.

Architect Alterturn was instructed to draft a sketch for additional rooms to cost about 35,000 marks.

On March 29, the Curatorium of the Sigfried-Jacobson foundation met at the office of the Grand Lodge for the purpose of disposing of six applications. Each application was considered separately and all were accepted. Two boys were granted 150 marks each, one boy 100 marks, one applicant 200 marks and one 250 marks. During the year a total of 1,000 marks was granted in subventions.

The Jewish nurses organization is vigorously progressing. The stations, the nurses and the students are increasing in number. New stations were established in Wuerzburg and in Berlin. The Home for mothers founded by the Grand Lodge is being rebuilt and practicaly arranged to suit its purpose. The work of rebuilding will be completed in October.

DISTRICT NO. 10.

Brother Heinrich Mendel of Eintracht Lodge No. 562, Vienna, donated 250,000 crowns for the erection of a building for the B'nai B'rith Asylum for Children and Toynbee Hall.

HOPE LODGE, STOCKTON, CAL.

Hope Lodge, 126, I. O. B. B., Stockton, Cal., has been doing some good work of late. A membership committee, of which Bro. Steinhart is the chairman, in one morning's work recently, secured eight new applications for membership, all of which were duly initiated at one time at the regular meting held on Wednesday evening, June 3. The attendance at the meeting was very large, and the work in connection with the initiation was beautiful and impressive. Hope Lodge has an initiation team of which it may justly feel proud. After the regular business was disposed of, the lodge adjourned, and all present sat down to an elegant banquet, to which all did justice. Speeches were made, President Shragge acting as toastmaster. Past Grand President Martin P. Stein spoke on the duties and obligations of a Ben B'rith. He was followed by Bro. Steinhart, District Deputy Safferhill, Bro. L. Isaacs, one of the oldest members, and several other speakers, all of whom made inspiring and elevating remarks.

HARMONY LODGE OF BRIDGEPORT, CONN., DISTRIBUTES PROCEEDS OF THE RECENT CHARITY BALL.

Harmony lodge, No. 711, through Isaac Moss, its president, Abe L. Kline, chairman of the Entertainment Committee, and Charles H. Shapiro, a member of the State Board of deputies, presented to committees of three charitable societies checks for substantial amounts, representing the proceeds of the recent charity ball at the Casino, which met with such brilliant success.

In presenting these checks to the officers of the Ladies' Hebrew Charitable Society, the Hebrew Children's Aid Society and Ladies' Hebrew Aid Society, Mr. Moss stated that Harmony Lodge in planning this charity ball for the benefit of these societies, had in mind the splendid work that these organizations were performing, especially the efforts which were being made by the Hebrew Children's Aid Society towards the establishment of a day nursery and assured them of the lodge's co-operation and support in their manifold activities.

Charles H. Shapiro stated that Harmony Lodge, which had been awarded a banner for the greatest increase in membership during the past year, might now appropriately enter the contest for the prize which has recently been established by the Intellectual advancement committee of District Grand Lodge No. 1 for the lodge which made the greatest strides in communal work during the coming year.

THE PROBLEM OF THE JEW.

We might as well abandon the idea, first as last, of making them Christians in the theological sense of the word. Their race gave the world Christianity in its purest and most spiritual form. They are not likely to receive it back alloyed with the amalgam of Grecian speculation and Roman imperialism! The Jew is unalterably and incurably monotheistic. He knows the mountain sources of inspiration which, flowing through the hearts of his greater prophets, fed with exalted spirituality and noble ethics the life of the primitive church. He knows that the scripture has furnished the world with the seminal ideas of its truest democracy. And, when that world is willing to return to the sweet simplicity of true Christianity, it may reasonably and hopefully expect the Jew to put the crown of reverence upon the head of his greatest prophet and the world's supreme master in the realm of spiritual things. To utter in choral affirmation the keynote of Humanity's best faith, "Hear, O Israel, the Lord, the Jehovah, is one. And thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy soul, heart and mind. And thy neighbor as thyself."—this sublime faith creates no heretics. The Jew has come to this land to stay. We ought to have the wisdom to thank God for it.—Christian Register.

B'NAI B'RITH KINDERGARTEN AT ZICHRON-JACOB COLONY.

Adolf Kraus Lodge No. 689, located at Zichron-Jacob Colony, near Haiffa, Palestine, a year and a half ago established a Kindergarten under the name of Har Sinai, to commemorate and in honor of late Brother Siegmund Bergel, who was instrumental in organizing the lodge. From a small beginning, the Kindergarten has greatly developed and the number of pupils has considerably increased. It is now attended by 70 children, ranging in age from 3 to 6 years. Most of those are children of poor people who are unable to pay anything, children of immigrant Jeminite Jews who came from the distant land of Jemen. The lodge is contributing the greater part of the cost of maintenance.

LECTURES BY PROF. HERMAN COHEN.

To the extreme annoyance of the anti-Semites, Professor Herman Cohen's lectures at St. Petersburg on the Jewish religion have proved a great success. They drew large and enthusiastic audiences of Jews and Christians. The Philosophic Society elected the Professor a member, and many other societies sent deputations to greet him. Baron Gunzburg gave a banquet in honor of Professor Cohen, who also had a hearty reception at the Great Synagogue on Saturday. The Professor stated that he was struck by the patriotism of the Russian Jews. In the various provincial centers he has met with equally cordial receptions.

WINNIPEG, CANADA.

At the annual election of Winnipeg Lodge No. 650 of Winnipeg, Manitoba, Canada, held on June 4th, the following were elected to office: Bros. M. J. Finkelstein, President; E. R. Levinson, Vice-President; M. O. Finkelstein, Treasurer; M. Gardner, Assistant Monitor; L. Leipsic, Trustee; B. Schachter, Trustee; A. J. Abromovitch, Trustee; M. Brotman, Warden; S. Sachs, Outside Guard; H. E. Wilder, Secretary.

The ticket appears to be a particularly well balanced one, all the members elected being eminently suitable for their respective positions. If every one of them will only devote his energy and attention, given his capacity, the Lodge will undoubtedly show a splendid record during their term of office.

Previous to the election of officers the President delivered his annual message and the various committees submitted their annual reports, which were well received. The installation of officers will take place on the 18th of this month, and according to arrangements made promises to be one of the best social events that we have had in the city during the year.

JEWS OF SERVIA.

Dr. Alcalay, Chief Rabbi of Servia, has made a journey through the territories now annexed to that kingdom, with the view to examining the moral and material situation of the Jews in these districts, to reorganizing and reforming them, and to placing spiritual chiefs over them. Some considerable time before the second Balkan War the government of Servia had requested him to prepare a detailed report on the number of Jewish inhabitants of each town, their educational and philanthropic institutions, their requirements and their relations with the authorities. The data which the Chief Rabbi collected showed that in New Servia there are about 20,000 Jews, who are concentrated chiefly at Monastir, Uskub, Istip, and Pristina. In all these places he will arrange for the appointment of Chief Rabbis, whose salaries will be paid by the State. In his report Dr. Alcalay recommended the formation of a Central Jewish Consistory with the Chief Rabbi of Servia at its head and with its seat at Belgrade. The proposal has received the approval of the Government. In Old Servia there are only about 6,000 Jews, of whom 5,500 reside in Belgrade and the remainder at Nisch and Chabatz.

LABOR BUREAU OF THE BERLIN LODGES.

The work of the Bureau suffered greatly from the unfavorable economic conditions. The daily number of applicants for positions was greater than ever and not all of them could be satisfied. Still the Bureau placed 4,773 persons, 142 of whom were given permanent employment without having to work on the Sabbath day. The applicants consisted of 313 from Austria-Hungary, 73 from Russia, 15 from Roumania, 58 from different places outside of Germany and the rest were from various parts of the German Empire. The flow of unemployed elements to the capital is regulated in a remarkable manner by the union of Labor Bureaus of the Grand Lodge, which maintains bureaus in 60 places in the German empire. These endeavor to find work for applicants according to their qualifications, either in their home towns or in the adjoining territory. The intention of the Union is to spread the net of bureaus over entire Austria-Hungary. This would save many applicants, who cannot cope with the conditions prevailing in the capital of Germany, from hasty departure from home and guard them against suffering distress and disappointments. The work of the writing room department which helps out with temporary employment, was quite satisfactory. Six hundred and thirty-one orders were filled which brought 3,800 marks in earnings to persons in need of immediate help.

BENEVOLENCE BROTHERLY LOVE AND HARMONY
VOL. VII SEPTEMBER, 1914 No. 1
Entered as second-class matter September 16, 1913, at the post office at Chicago, Illinois, under the act of August 24, 1912.

First Genera Convention of District Grand Lodge No. 11.

The first general convention of District No. 11 was opened in Constantinople on June 13, 1914, and lasted until June 16. Six sessions were held in all, and each one was well attended. The enthusiasm of the delegates ran high, and much good work was accomplished for the benefit of the Order and the welfare of Judaism.

Grand President Bro. J. Niego installed the new members of the Grand Lodge and then delivered his opening address, which will be published in the official report of the convention.

Bro. Nissim Rousso read a letter containing a detailed report of the recent institution of the new lodge at Jamboli.

The convention resolved to send a telegram to the Grand President of the Order, Bro. Adolf Kraus, informing him of the opening of the convention, and conveying greetings. A committee of eight brethren was appointed to bring the greetings of the convention to the Chief Rabbi of Turkey, Haim Nahum Effendi.

The second session was opened by the Grand President in Hebrew, and Rabbi Bidjerano delivered an eloquent, poetic prayer in the same language.

Among the many telegrams of felicitations read, was one from Mr. Adolf Kraus, president of the Order; the Sephardic world organization of Vienna; Bro. Dr. Ehrenpreis, Chief Rabbi of Bulgaria, who expressed his regret at being unable to attend; and Bro. Dr. Adolphe Stern, Grand President of the Roumanian District.

As a mark of gratitude and honor to the memory of the late Bro. Seigmund Bergel, the founder of District Grand Lodge No. 11, the convention resolved to transmit an expression of sympathy to his son in Berlin.

Bro. Bedjerano described the terrible misery which still exists in the community of Adrianople and appealed for aid to the Grand Lodge. Bro. Niego explained that on a journey which he is about to undertake as a representative of the Ica, he will pass through Adrianople and will study the situation in that city in order to be able to report to the proper authorities.

Bro. Dr. I. Auerbach, Grand Secretary, read his general report of the activities of District Grand Lodge No. 11.

The convention resolved that the General Committee shall send a committee to Palestine and Egypt to investigate the condition of the lodges in these countries.

Bro. Dr. I. Auerbach delivered an address upon "The Greater Development of District No. 11." His expression of the deep gratitude which District No. 11 feels for the Executive Committee of the Order, as well as for all other great Jewish organizations, for the aid which they had extended to the Jews of the Orient during the catastrophies of the last years, was received with demonstrations of long continued applause.

Bro. Auerbach offered the following resolution: (1) The lodges of the different countries and provinces of the District shall form several groups. These groups shall draft uniform laws for themselves, exchange experiences, study the general interests of Judaism in their respective countries, and unite upon measures for the spreading of the principles of the Order, for establishing new lodges, as well as for the elevation of Judaism in their respective countries. The District groups shall elect from the lodges composing them, one from each lodge, or group of lodges, a committee which shall correspond with the General Committee of the District concerning all questions of general interest. The deliberations and activities of these District groups are to be brought to the timely notice of the General Committee by the group lodge or committee, they must be in harmony with the laws, spirit and constitution of the Order, with the laws of the District, and must follow the instructions given to them by the convention or the General Committee. (2) The convention resolves to create a monthly "Review," as an organ of the Grand Lodge, and instructs the General Committee to carry out this project according to the plans of the finance and press committees. (3) The convention authorizes the General Committee to contribute to the traveling expenses of the delegates of such lodges which are unable to undertake these expenditures.

The first of these motions was adopted and the other two were referred to a committee for study and report to the General Committee.

The convention accepted an invitation of Bro. Morgenthau, ambassador of the United States in Turkey, to a tea at his summer residence in Jenikoj.

The Chief Rabbi of Turkey visited the convention. The Grand President welcomed him. Bro. Rabbi Bedjerano delivered an appropriate address, to which Rabbi Haim Nahum responded.

Bro. Rabbi Abraham Danon of Consantinople read his report of the cultural condition of the Jews in Turkey. He closed with the motion that a list of questions, which he had prepared, should be sent to all the District Grand Lodges in order to gather statistical data on all points concerning the cultural condition and the spiritual life of the Jews in the different Districts. This motion was unanimously adopted.

Bro. Nissim Rousso then read his lecture on the economic condition of Jewry in Turkey. He recommended the founding of consumers' companies.

The Grand Secretary moved that a list of questions, similar to the one submitted by Bro. Donan, be prepared by Bro. Rousso in regard to the economic condition of the Oriental Jews and the same shall be forwarded to all the lodges which shall obtain the information necessary for answering the questions in the list. This motion was adopted.

The convention authorized the General Committee to establish a lodge in Tantah.

Bro. Minahemoff, of Rustshuk, depicted the economic and cultural condition of the Jews of Bulgaria. He referred to the differences existing there between Zionists and anti-Zionists, who are for and who are against Dr. Ehrenpreis. The convention resolved to send a delegation of members of the General Committee to Bulgaria to investigate the conditions, and to make an attempt to bring about union between the parties.

Bro. Reschawski, of Belgrade, read his report on the economic and cultural conditions among the Jews of Servia.

The following resolution was unanimously adopted: The General Grand Lodge convention of District No. 11 resolves to levy a tax of 1 franc per capita in favor of the Emergency Relief Fund of the Order until the creation of a general law by the Constitution Grand Lodge in the year 1915.

The monthly Review will appear mainly in the French language, which is understood by all the Oriental lodges. A certain part of it may also be published in Hebrew.

Bro. Rabbi Hedjerano expressed satisfaction with the harmony which is now existing between the Ashkenazim and Sephardim. This harmony is the work of the B'nai B'rith, and it is to be hoped that it will endure in the interest of Judaism.

Bro. Matalon, of Salonika, read his report on the economic and cultural conditions among the Jews of Greece.

A telegram of congratulation was received by the convention from the Medjiliss Djismani, the Central Consistory of the Ottoman Jews, it read as follows:

Social and Economic Justice

Address of Brother Jacob Billikoff Delivered at the Sixty-Second Annual Convention of District Grand Lodge No. 2 . O. B. B., at Toledo, Ohio June 7, 1914.

On November the 1st, 1913. the Social Service Committee of this District addressed the following self-explanatory communication to the wardens, the managers and the superintendents of the various State institutions to be found in our District:

"Dear Sir:—The Independent Order of B'nai B'rith is an international organization which aims to advance the welfare of the Jewish people throughout the world.

"The Social Service Committee of District Grand Lodge No. 2, which comprises seven States in the Union, is attempting, among other things, to determine the number of Jewish inmates in the penal and eleemosynary institutions throughout the District, with a view of devising ways and means to restore them to useful manhood and to useful womanhood. What is more, in co-operation with other agencies the Committee proposes to strike at the causes responsible for delinquency and defectiveness.

"As the Chairman of this Committee, I take the liberty, therefore, to ask you to advise us at your earliest convenience, how many Jewish inmates there are in your institution, their names and original addresses and what percentage they constitute of your entire population. Also, be good enough to indicate along what lines we can be of help to you in your work, and will you inform your inmates of the existence of our Committee so that they may know that there is an agency which is vitally interested in the promotion of their physical and moral welfare."

In response to which letter, followed up as it was by subsequent communications, gratifying replies were received from 68 out of 76 institutions. And that you may get a fair appreciation of the manner in which the authorities responded to our appeal for data and our offer of co-operation I shall, with your kind permission, read excerpts from a few of the replies. Thus, for instance, the Warden of the Federal Penitentiary in Leavenworth—an institution with 24 Jewish inmates out of a total population of nearly 1,000, wrote as follows: "I am tremendously pleased to note the interest your Committee is taking in the Jewish prisoners and your readiness in offering the support of your great Order in behalf of discharged individuals so that they may lead good and clean lives. We need not tell you how grateful we are for your co-operation." Later one of the officers sent a note to this effect: "We were certainly delighted to have had you and Rabbi Bernstein visit our institution and let me assure you that your visit has given the Jewish inmates a great deal of hope and satisfaction. The realization on their part that so important an organization as the B'nai B'rith is solicitous about their welfare is bound to instill in them new hopes and new aspirations." And one of the prisoners in another institution confirmed the statement. Listen to the quotation from Oscar Wilde's "Ballad of Reading Gaol" which he sent, as indicative of the sentiments often entertained by himself and his fellow-prisoners:

With midnight always in one's heart
  And twilight in one's cell,
We turn the crank, or tear the rope,
  Each in his separate Hell,
And the silence is more awful far
  Than the sound of a brazen bell.

And never a human voice comes near
  To speak a gentle word;
And the eye that watches through the door
  Is pitiless and hard;
And by all forgot, we rot and rot.
  With soul and body marred.

And thus we rust Life's iron chain
  Degraded and alone;
And some men curse, and some men weep,
  And some men make no moan;
But God's eternal Laws are kind
  And break the heart of stone.

"And, perhaps," added the writer "through the cheer and comfort which your committee may bring us, each day will cease being like a year—a year whose days are long."

From the Superintendent of a Reformatory for Boys there came this note: "I wish to say that I am heartily in sympathy with your desire to assist in every way possible the young men who are released from this institution and I shall be very glad, indeed, to report to Rabbi 'X,' a member of your Committee, every time a Jewish young man is authorized for parole and is about ready to leave this institution so that the Rabbi may lend such encouragement as would be a service to him. Of course, you understand, that the parole department of this institution secures for each man definite, satisfactory employment during the first year that he is out on parole, and sees that the young man is kept employed at a good job, so that he has no trouble in maintaining himself financially, for at least that period, if he has a desire so to do. But we are pleased to have your moral co-operation which will facilitate our work greatly."

And from the commandant of a Soldiers' Home there came this letter: "It gives me great pleasure to inform you that we have no Jewish members in our institution. It gives me pleasure because I know that many of your people served in the Union army, and the fact that in the fifteen years and more that I have been connected with this Home not one has applied for admission proves that their service did not render them dependent, but, on the contrary, when their military service ceased they became provident members of society, and prepared for an independent old age."

Another inmate of a certain penal institution, after being informed of the aims of our Committee, wrote: "I desire to congratulate you and your organization on the work you are undertaking, and knowing of the splendid things which your organization has achieved in the past, I am somewhat surprised that such a movement—that is, a movement along intensive lines—was not started long ago.

"I am of the opinion, in spite of the fact that it is the second time that I am serving a sentence (and I honestly assure you the last), that ninety per cent of those of our faith confined in penal institutions can be redeemed and made useful members of society, if the proper steps are taken to restore them and that can be done at very little cost to your organization.

"But may I suggest that in the work your Committee is undertaking in behalf of those who have done wrong to consider us unfortunate ones, in the words of the poet who said:

"In men whom men pronounce as ill
You will find so much of goodness still
In men whom men pronounce divine
You will find so much of sin and blot
That you ought hesitate to draw a line
Between the two where God has not."

"Wishing you success, which you so justly deserve, and assuring you that if at any time I can be of service it will be a pleasure to me to aid you, I remain sincerely yours, C. B."

And, indeed, it is largely through the advice and efforts of C. B. that your Committee succeeded in re-establishing several men, who, were it not for his splendid co-operation, would be aimlessly wandering today over the country, ever conscious of the heart-breaking, monotonous existence they led in the oblivion of the cold, gray walls and fearing to face their fellow-men in their process of readjustment.

SOCIAL AND ECONOMIC JUSTICE.

But expressions such as are contained in the above letters are to be found in most of the communications received by the Committee from institutional authorities or inmates, and I have cited these particular excerpts not because they are distinctive, but because they are, as already stated, typical of the attitude which the men and women in charge of the institutions or in confinement feel in relation to the problems undertaken by your Committee.

Now as to the statistical data procured from the 68 institutions and such observations as these data suggest. (And I trust that you will be patient while the figures are presented, if for no other reason than to compensate the Committee for the difficult task of collecting the information which follows.) In the 21 out of the 27 penal institutions in the District, and by the term "penal" I mean State industrial schools, reformatories and penitentiaries, there are 14,640 inmates, of which number 125 or 0.84 per cent are Jews. To be more specific, in a population of 3,392 in the industrial schools, there are 42 Jewish boys and girls; in a population of 4,126 in the reformatories, there are 49 Jewish young men; and in a population of 7,122 to be found in our prisons and reformatories, 34 are Jewish men. The summary does not include the Federal Penitentiary in Leavenworth, which has a population of nearly 1,000 with 24 Jewish inmates, and all of whom are recruited from seventeen of the Western and middle Western States. I desire now to call your attention to the fact that the census of 1910 shows that the entire population in our District amounted to 15,868,511, and that, according to the Jewish Year Book, the Jewish population in the District on the basis of the 1910 census was about 196,000, or 1.23 per cent of the population in the District as compared with 2.22 per cent for the entire population in the United States. Considering, then, the fact that we constitute approximately 1.23 per cent of the population in the District and that the proportion of Jewish offenders to the entire number of inmates in penal institutions is only 0.84 per cent, it becomes quite evident that the ratio of Jewish to non-Jewish offenders is smaller and that criminality among our people is not so great as it is among the rest of the population. There is no question that an investigation covering all the penal institutions, including work-houses and jails, would bring the proportion down considerably. For instance, on the Municipal Farm in Kansas City, which is a local institution and is not embraced in our study, there are at the present time about 325 inmates of whom only two are Jews, and the same proportionate conditions would be found to prevail in cities like St. Louis, Cincinnati, Cleveland and Denver. Furthermore, a large percentage of offenses committed by immigrants and which are punishable by fines and workhouse sentences are such non-criminal offenses as the violation of city ordinances and sanitary codes which do not imply actual criminality or criminal motives on the part of its violators. There is no question that the Jews have a decidedly slighter disposition to act in an anti-social manner than our neighbors, the Gentiles. And any attempt to prove racial moral inferiority is completely disproved by criminal statistics not only in this District but wherever statistics on crime among various ethnic groups have been gathered in the past. But a study of the causes responsible for the commitment of the 125 Jews in our reformatories, industrial schools and penitentiaries, unfair though it be to generalize on the strength of such fortunately meager figures, confirms the conclusions arrived at by Dr. Fishberg and other anthropologists and particularly by Ruppin who in his "Criminality among the Jews in Germany" recorded the following observation:

"The differences in the criminality of the Jews as compared with Christians can be summarized as follows: The Christians commit crimes with their hands, while the Jews use their reason for these evil purposes."

One thing is certain and that is: any attempt to account for the differences between Jewish and Christian criminality by innate qualities of race is deceptive and misleading. Social conditions are almost entirely responsible for differences in criminality. The Jew is largely engaged in mercantile and commercial pursuits: he is everywhere an urban dweller and it is perfectly natural that offenses of which he is guilty should be of a "gainful character." But perhaps the tragic feature in connection with the entire problem of criminality among foreigners, and particularly among our people, lies in the fact that when a Jew commits a crime, the fact that he is a Jew is mentioned in conspicuous type in the metropolitan press, and the impression of the incident unfortunately strengthens the already existing antipathy towards us. Then follow very hasty generalizations. All of us are pigeon-holed. And such hasty generalizations are curiously indulged in even by men of scientific trend of mind. So eminent a scientist as Professor Davenport, of the Smithsonian Institution, tells us in his book on Eugenics that the Jews "show the greatest proportion of offenses against chastity and in connection with prostitution, the lowest of crimes." Such statements, of course, are unduly exaggerated. And because they emanate from such sources it becomes even more imperative that we help eliminate that infamous traffic. To the everlasting credit of the B'nai B'rith be it said that it was through its efforts that a bill, making pandering an offense, passed the Illinois Legislature; and other States followed the example of Illinois, and that subsequently the United States passed the Mann Act. I dare say that several of the Jewish inmates of the Leavenworth Penitentiary, serving sentences for the violation of the Mann Act (and there are 12 of them in the Federal Penitentiary at the present moment) were caught, convicted and punished as a result of the efforts of our distinguished President, Mr. Kraus, and his confreres, whose policy it has ever been, to quote his own words, "to aid the authorities in the enforcement of all laws, especially against offenders in our midst."

We come now to the problem of mental defectives. In 30 out of 34 institutions, including the sanitarium maintained by the city of St. Louis, there are 378 Jewish insane, feeble-minded and epileptic men, women and children, or 1.09 per cent. of all the inmates. To be specific, out of a population of 27,749 in the 21 insane institutions there are 295 Jewish wards, and out of a population of 6,817 in the colonies for the feeble-minded and epileptic there are 83 Jews. You will note that, while the proportion of the Jewish population in the entire District to the non-Jewish is 1.23 per cent., the ratio between the subnormal among our people and the rest of our institutional population is 1.09 per cent. If we could have secured data from the hundreds of poor houses, alms houses and infirmaries scattered throughout the District we would have found in these county asylums thousands of defectives with, perhaps, not a single Jew among them, and were their number added to the number of individuals in the State institutions, the proportion of the Jewish to the non-Jewish insane would be considerably lower, although the fact must not be lost sight of that in every large city in the District dozens of Jews are to be found who suffer from neurasthenia and other such border line cases of insanity. Every physician, with considerable practice among the Jews, particularly the immigrant class, can readily testify to the existence of many cases of neurasthenia, and the relief organizations have numerous such records. However, most alienists who have labored among our people and most students of the question are united in the statement that insanity is more frequent among the Jews than among the Christians. Figures for the State of New York and other congested districts show a decided perceptible increase. It is not to be wondered at! As already stated, we are pre-eminently town dwellers and the heavy strain of the nerve shattering city life to which we are constantly subjected has helped to deplete our nervous energy. We are not only urban dwellers but we lead sedentary lives and through the lack of physical exercise and gymnastics our muscular system has become much more prone to enfeeblement. As Leroy Beaulieu has pointed out, "no other human being has had to tax his ingenuity so severely in order to subsist. It is only by miracle of will power and industry that the Jew manages to eke out his existence." No one realizes this truth more than those of us who are thrown in contact with the immigrant population day after day. To cite only an isolated case, out of about 1,800 men and women and children whose existence in Kansas City is due to our co-operation with the Galveston movement and the Industrial Removal Office there is not at the present time a single family dependent upon the charities for support; they are self-sustaining; and in spite of the fact that on their arrival in this country every one of them was friendless and penniless; unaccustomed to our language and unacquainted with our economic and industrial machinery. In addressing recently a large commercial organization in this country I related our experiences with these 1,800 individuals and propounded this query to my audience: "How many of you, who from early childhood have enjoyed advantages infinitely superior to the advantages of those concerning whom I have just spoken to you, would, if transplanted to any continental country, accomplish in the short period of two or three years what these immigrant men and women have achieved?" But creditable and almost unbelievable as the achievements of these so-called "Undistinguished Americans" are it can not be denied that their achievements have been accompanied by a feverish intensity which, in certain cases at least, has tended to overstrain their nerves and disturb the complex network of their cerebral fibers. "The Jew is peculiarly a cerebral individual because he lives more by his brain."

In attempting to ascertain the individual causes responsible for the commitment of the 295 Jewish insane it was found difficult to obtain any definite data, largely because nervous diseases present such a diversity of symptoms, there being over 200 divisions, most of them subject to constant revision, and the classifications in most of our State institutions are very loose and lack scientific value. I imagine, though, that, in a general way, the observations of Dr. Fishberg, Ruppin, Leroy Beaulieu and other students of insanity among the Jews would hold true in the case of those confined in the different institutions of the District. And these observations are to the effect that the Jew is particularly subjected to the affections of nerve centers, especially to spinal and cerebral diseases; that hysteria and neurasthenia are, in the words of Dr. Fishberg, "the characteristic privileges of the children of Israel." In fact, more than any other ethnic group the Jews are afflicted with neurasthenia.

Paranoia is met with in about the same proportion among both classes; mania and melancholia are much more frequent among our people, whereas locomotor ataxia and insanity, due to syphilitic antecedents, are rare among the Jews, and alcoholic insanity is practically non-existent

We come now to the deaf, dumb and blind institutions. In 14 asylums with a population of 2,438 there are 22 Jewish inmates or 0.9 per cent.—a lower ratio than that which exists between the Jewish and the non-Jewish population in the District, although on this point Dr. Fishberg maintains that deaf-mutism is a defect which is no less frequent among the Jews than the people among whom they live, and that the etiological factors responsible for deaf-mutism among our people vary but slightly from the factors which govern other racial groups.

Only three States in the District have established tubercular sanitariums—Indiana, Missouri and Ohio—and out of a population of 574 in these institutions, 16, or 2.09 per cent., are Jews. On the face of which it would seem as though we have a larger percentage of consumptives than the non-Jews, but, as a matter of fact, 574 is only a slight fraction of the number that should be receiving custodial attention, whereas the Jewish consumptive is taken care of better and more expeditiously than his neighbor. It is very rare, indeed, that a Jew suffering from tuberculosis in any of our large cities is not immediately looked after by the Federated Charities, while in the case of the non-Jews there are numerous instances of neglect, which accounts for what appears to be a higher percentage among us

In addition to the 76 institutions with which the Committee carried on a more or less extensive correspondence (and hundreds of letters were exchanged) an attempt was made to determine the number of Jewish inmates in the Homes for Veterans, and only one person was found in an Ohio institution. At the request of the Commandant of the Home arrangements are being made now by the Committee to furnish Comrade B. with artificial limbs for which the State of Ohio makes no provision.

Altogether, then, we found that out of the 52,217 inmates in the 68 penal, charitable and eleemosynary institutions from which we secured definite data 541 or 1.03 per cent. are Jews. In this connection I wish to reiterate that if we could have secured statistical information from the hundreds of city and county workhouses, jails, almshouses, infirmaries and county hospitals we would have undoubtedly found that, relatively speaking, in this District at least, the non-Jews furnish perhaps from 75 to 100 per cent. more defectives and delinquents than are furnished by the Jews notwithstanding the essential fact that, in the last analysis, with but few slight variations, the causes which underlie moral turpitude and mental weaknesses among the non-Jews operate with equal force among our people. So much for the theoretical phase of our problem.

Right here the Committee wishes to make the recommendation that the various District Lodges in the Order be requested to make similar studies to determine definitely the nature and the extent of defectiveness and delinquency in this country, so that proper measures be devised to check whatever anti-social and subnormal tendencies to be found among our people. True it is that very interesting investigations have already been made in New York City by the Kehillah; true it is that splendid work has been done in cities like Baltimore and one or two other Eastern cities; true it is that the Bureau of Personal Service in Chicago, under the leadership of that remarkable little woman, Miss Minnie F. Low, has for years and years kept intimately in touch with the various penal and eleemosynary institutions in the State of Illinois, but as yet no effort has been made to obtain definite information for the country at large, and the Committee is strongly of the opinion that the movement should be nationalized. And by the term "nationalized" the Committee means not only the mere acquisition of statistical data, but an extensive survey of the home conditions of the prisoners and the insane so as to determine to what extent these deficiencies were due to hereditary and to what extent to environmental conditions. For various reasons, the agency best fitted to deal with the entire situation is the B'nai B'rith.

Now as to some of the practical things which your Committee attempted to accomplish. But, before coming to this phase of the work, permit me to make one or two observations, based upon experiences lasting for a period of years. As a member of the Board of Public Welfare of Kansas City—a municipal institution which is in charge of various penal and charitable agencies—I have had occasion to observe that in the average penal institution (and I speak now of 90 per cent. of the penal institutions in the country), the inmate is robbed of his self-respect and will power. Nothing is done toward starting him in the right direction. No effort is made of curing him of his weakness of will, his lack of self-respect, his proneness to idleness and his diseased appetite. He leave the workhouse and jail and penitentiary with a will power that has been dwarfed and paralyzed. His health shattered, his courage gone, he has a shifty bearing, a bitter distrust of his fellowmen and a loss of ambition to win back a place in life. He goes out of the institution in an infinitely worse condition than when he entered it. And if little is done for the man inside the prison walls, less is done for him upon release from imprisonment. No serious efforts are being made with a view of reclaiming the fallen after they have paid the legal penalty exacted by the State. No steps are taken to provide for the care of the prisoners' families. This being the case, it becomes vitally important that we should look after our co-religionists upon their release, not only for their individual sake, not only for the sake of those immediately dependent upon them, but for the sake of the Jewish people who are disgraced and stigmatized whenever one of our own falls by the wayside. Remember, every time one of our own does fall by the wayside, the task of the Anti-Defamation League becomes so much more difficult.

That the majority of men and boys will make good if given a chance; that the majority of men and boys can be restored to usefulness, if at the psychological moment in their lives proper interest is manifested in them, is best evidenced by the fact that of the 10,000 prisoners who, during my connection with our Board of Public Welfare, have been paroled or discharged from our Municipal Farm, at least 65 per cent. have made good, about 15 per cent. left the city for parts unknown, and only

BY PROF. GOTTHARD DEUTSCH, Ph.D.

The ghetto has a cradle song that begins "Moishele werd lernen Toire; Toire is de beste S'choire" (commodity). This explains to us the fact that we find in western Europe the Jews in secondary schools represented six to eight times their pro rata. Even in Galicia, where the majority of the population still is opposed to secular education, one-half of the lawyers, and more than one-fourth of the physicians are Jews, while the Jews form only eleven per cent of the population. Even in Russia, in spite of all restrictions, we find the Jews represented in professions above their pro rata. The ambition that Moishele shall study Toire was merely changed in the subject. When Moishele was changed to a Moritz, he studied law or medicine instead of Talmud, but he studied. This explains to us the ardent interest taken in educational questions since the thirties of the nineteenth century. In a previous article I spoke of the opposition of the rabbis of the old school. This opposition which was so bitter in the last decades of the eighteenth century, practically ceased in the nineteenth. Nehemias Trebitsch (1779-1842), the last Landrabbiner of Moravia of the old school, in his Glosses on the Jerusalem Talmud makes a passing remark on the growing habit of speaking the language of the Gentiles. He also strongly opposed the election of Rabbi Abraham Neuda to one of the congregations in his district, because the latter was supposed to have studied "Taitsch." He did, however, not say it frankly, because the government wanted educated rabbis, and as early as 1820 contemplated the establishment of a rabbinical seminary. This opposition, however, did not go so far as to condemn primary education. It merely objected to an academic education of the rabbis because this would lead, as it actually did, to the abandonment of Talmudic studies. While Trebitsch was Landesrabbiner, a primary school of five grades was opened in Nikolsburg. Five years after his death the seat of the Landesrabbiner was filled by the election of Samson Raphael Hirsch (1808-1888), a native of Germany, and a university graduate, who could not have spoken Yiddish, no matter how hard he tried. He met with considerable opposition on the part of the rabbis of the old school. They looked upon him, much as the Russian immigrant rabbi in America looks upon his American born colleague, whom he considers a sort of dilettante. Hirsch, himself, felt out of place, for after having held his office for four years (1847-1851) he resigned to take charge of the little congregation of orthodox Jews in Frankfurt-am-Main, which had no corporate rights, nor any official standing, though it enjoyed the advantage of being backed by Baron Anselm Rothschild, the oldest of the five Frankfurters. I have it on the authority of my teacher, Isaac Hirsch Weiss (1815-1905), that some of the rabbis who came to Nikolsburg to be present at the installation of the new Landesrabbiner, tried to trip him by starting a Talmudic discussion. Hirsch at first refused to be drawn out, but when he finally made a remark, our rabbi, Marcus Trieschet, turned around and laughed.

During the administration of Hirsch, the momentous changes of 1848 occurred. These changes made the old law on the election of a Landesrabinner obsolete. The Austrian government, always fond of procrastination, appointed temporarily Rabbi Abraham Placzek of Boskowitz as acting Landesribbiner, and he held this practically meaningless office up to his death in 1884. The congregation of Nikolsburg elected, after a vacancy of four years, again a rabbi of the old school, Solomon Quetsch (1798-1855). Quetsch did credit to his name. He was an insignificant looking little man, and the story goes that this name gave occasion to a clever pun. Quetsch, referring to the reformers, amongst whom were many, whose name ended in "son" like Mendelssohn, Jocobson, Philippson, said, "This is just what the Passover Hagadah tells us, 'Our trouble, this means the sons.'" One of the reformers replied, "The Hagadah continues 'suffering that is oppression' (Quetsch)." Rabbi Solomon officiated only a few months, when death took him away. At his funeral, so I was told, the first assistant rabbi, Itzig Weinberger, who being of the school of Marcus Benedict, saw the glory of the old Kehillah waning, delivered a funeral address on the verse, "Because of the mountain of Zion, which is desolate, the foxes will walk upon it." "Yes, he exclaims, pointing to the coffin, "on this Mount of Zion, which is now desolate, foxes are walking, foxes, Lumpen, Taitsche Rabbonism." Rabbi Itzig died in 1868 in his seventy-sixth year and another German rabbi was installed in the place, sanctified by so many great Talmudists of the old school. In 1861, after a vacancy of six years, Dr. Maier Feuchtwang, a native of Pappenheim in Bavaria, was elected rabbi, and although he was strictly orthodox, men like Reb Itzig, saw in his election a downfall of the Torah. Poor Reb Itzig lived long enough to see the time honored position abandoned. The congregation, which up to 1848 counted 620 legally recognized families, or 3,400 Jews, in a population of 8,000, rapidly began to decline. The greatest strain came through the attraction of Vienna, situated about sixty miles distant. Another large number spread over the small towns and villages of the adjacent province of Lower Austria. Many of the Nikolsburg Jews had previously made a living there as peddlers, though they were not permitted to take up their residence since the expulsion of 1670. This exodus vacated a number of houses in the ghetto and Christians took up their residence there. It, therefore, became inconvenient to keep up the time honored custom of "Schulkoppen." Many houses still had a tin plate on the door, where the sexton made his three knocks, to indicate the beginning of services, but it had become useless. The same was the case with the custom of the sexton walking through the streets on Friday evening and Sabbath morning to indicate the beginning of the services by the call "Kabbolas Shabbos," or "In Schul!" The Jew was not the exclusive master of the ghetto any more, and these customs gave occasion to the Christian gamins to mock at them. Another innovation was the introduction of a boys' choir It was true, even in olden times, the Hazan had either a choir or at least the accompaniment of a bass—hence the frequent Jewish name Bass—and of a tenor (Singer, also a frequent Jewish family name), but the innovation was an attempt to read music and to dress the boys in gowns. Feuchtwang, while orthodox, had no objection to these innovations, which had long ago been silently adopted in Germany. Rabbi Itzig, however, saw in them the ruin of the old Kehillah, and expressed himself to this effect in a sermon delivered in his synagogue. The leading men of the congregation were naturally in favor of these reforms. The ghetto had, and still has even today, its own municipal administration, making the president of the congregation the burgomaster of the "Israelitengemeinde." The burgomaster called a special meeting of the council, and cautioned Rabbi Itzig to stop his agitation under penalty of dismissal from office. The old man had children who were quite well to do, and could have done without his salary, but to give up his office, which he had held for forty years, would have meant death to him, so he submitted, but to the rabbi he never spoke a word. Even on his deathbed, when Feuchtwang called on him, Rabbi Itzig turned around, refusing to speak.

I must turn back, however, to Rabbi Solom Quetsch. I did not know him personally, but I knew his widow quite well. She lived in a house adjoining the one in which I lived, if one may speak of adjoining houses in that ghetto, which consisted of rooms irregularly built in the bee-hive fashion. I boarded with a teacher of the Jewish school, Maier Froeschels, who was a disciple of Quetsch's and spoke of him with the greatest veneration. He also attended to the little business of the widow, writing her letters, and collecting her rents, so that I had a good opportunity to obtain some information on the life that existed previous to the change created by the revolution of 1848. For Hirsch, Rabbi Solomon had no particular love. The "Taitsche Chosid" was very unsympathetic to him. He saw in his orthodoxy a mere pose. Amusing were the stories current on R. Solomon's relation to his wife. The "Rebbezin" was always a typical shrew. It may actually have been so, because the Bocher was usually poor, and therefore glad to get a start by marriage. In addition he was not worldly, he never had moved in female society, and he took it for granted that it was his destiny to marry the woman that was proposed to him. A little ancedote would serve to throw light on the situation. "Why," somebody asked, "is it that in former times the rabbis' wives were homely, and altogether undesirable, and now they are not?" The answer is this. In the baker shop the foreman will examine the cakes, as they come out from the oven. If he finds one that is somewhat burned, or not sufficiently baked, or misshapen, he puts it aside, and it is served to the help. It is the same with the Almighty; if he finds a woman a little hunch-backed, or cross-eyed, or half-witted, or otherwise undesirable, He puts her in the corner and says, "This is for My people!" As long as the rabbis were good and "frum," God reserved for them the undesirable women. Now, however, the rabbis have ceased to be "frum," they are no more considered God's own people, and therefore do not get the undesirable females as their mates. However this may be, Rabbi Solomon Quetsch had in the selection of his Rachel, been treated like one of God's most intimate household. The story was current that when he was sick, the Hazan, a well known wit, said, "Rabbi, you will never get well unless you make a pilgrimage to Rachel's grave." The rabbi himself was quite a wit, and when Rachel lamented in his sickness, exclaiming, "My crown," he replied: "The same here with a little change, you are my Kren" (horseradish, symbolizing in the Seder service, the bitterness of life). The following story I remember from personal experience. The Rebbezin Rochel lived with a sister, also a rabbi's widow, called Rebbezin Pessel. Pessel was sick, and the doctor ordered a syringe. According to the primitive conditions of the place, the midwife acted as professional nurse. She was sent for, and came ready for her job. When she arrived both women were in bed, and she didn't know who her patient was. As no one else was present, she asked to whom she should give her services. Pessel was too sick to reply, and Rochel said, "I am the patient; Pessel is just taking a nap." Rochel begrudged her sister the pleasure of the syringe.

The relation of Maier Froeschels to the rabbi showed that there was no animosity against secular education. The school was conducted in a strictly orthodox style. Needless to say, there was no instruction on Sabbath and holydays, and even the minor festivals of the calendar were respected. Friday afternoon was free, and so the afternoon of Rosh Chodesh, although this day had no holyday character in business. Each class had three to four hours instruction in Hebrew every day, and for the advanced boys there was even a Talmud teacher employed. When I arrived in Nikolsburg (1870), the Talmud teacher, Reb Yossef Hasch Knoepfmacher, was still living as an old man, but was retired. I enjoyed the privilege of visiting him once or twice a month, when my Talmud teacher, Reb Shimme, who was his nephew, took me there to show off by reading a passage from the Talmud that was assigned to me for extempore reading (Leienen). One room in the school building was still reserved for a class of beginners in Talmud, under the tutelage of Isaiah Krakauer, who had the formidable surname Reb Schaje Rebeller. How he acquired this name I do not know. It must have stuck to the family for at least one generation, because when I asked about it, I was told that he and his brothers were always called the "Rebellerlech." He may have had in my time still a class of six boys, most of whom abandoned the Talmud when they left school. There was, however, a higher class, conducted by Reb Selig Loeb Hahn, who taught the boys in his own home. In this class I was enrolled, when I entered the Gymnasium, and there were only four students, of whom two were attracted by the prospect of a stipend of fifty Gulden ($20), which came from the interest of a legacy. While the study of the Talmud had declined, primary instruction in Hebrew was very thorough. It comprised the prayerbook, the Pentateuch, and some of the historical books of the Bible. Great stress was laid on the practice of reading the services, and every afternoon before the class was dismissed, the evening prayers had to be read. Very often the teachers had private pupils, especially girls, who were trained in reading their prayers correctly. The change came in 1868, through a legal enactment, which the Jews, and especially the teachers, had greeted with great joy. It was always difficult for the congregation to raise sufficient money for the running of the school. A new school law of 1868 took all the schools under the charge of the state. The teachers were under civil service, were appointed for life, and assured of a pension. The city had to take care of the buildings, but the state also meddled with the curriculum. It was found that some schools had forty hours and more instruction a week, and no vacation. The new law reduced the number of hours to twenty-five or thirty, and the victim was the Hebrew language. State schools allowed only two hours per week for religious instruction, and even the extra hours for Hebrew which the congregation paid, were limited. The fear of the antagonists of Moses Mendelssohn was only too well founded. The systematic instruction in Hebrew dealt a death blow to the Talmud, and the secularization of the school reduced Hebrew to such a small dose that even the ability of reading the services, formerly found in every Jew, who was not directly illiterate, became the exception. The shifting of the population to the large cities. where the schools did not have even the Jewish tradition, did the rest. To our fathers the Bible with the translation in Hebrew characters, was all the literature they cared for; we of the following generation, could at least read it fluently and intelligently, the next generation cannot even do this much. The spiritual life of the Kehillah is dead.

JEWS WIN HIGHEST HONORS AT ANNAPOLIS.

Congressman Edward T. Taylor, of Colorado, in addressing the House of Representatives at Washington, after having attended the graduating exercises of the 1914 class of the U. S. Naval Academy, pointed with pride to the record of two Jewish boys of Denver. He said:

"I had the pleasure yesterday of visiting the United States naval academy at Annapolis and attending the graduating exercises of the class of 1914.

"That class started four years ago with 231 members and graduated only 154. There were three Colorado boys in the class and all three of them were within the ten honor graduates of the closs.

"Midshipman Edward Ellsberg of Denver graduated with the highest honors and was the first one to be presented with his diploma by President Woodrow Wilson. Young Ellsberg not only graduated at the head of the class of 1914, but he led his class during the entire four years' course, and was the honor man at the end of each year.

"In addition to the distinction of making the highest record in scholarship during the entire four years, he won several highly prized medals. He won the splendid silver cup annually donated by the Daughters of the American Revolution for the one in each graduating class who attains highest proficiency in seamanship and international law. He also won the honorary prize of a navigating sextant presented annually by Col. R. M. Thompson of the class of '68, for the highest proficiency in navigation. Also a medal for fencing, another for the championship in duelling, and two or three others for the best English essay work.

"Another boy, Midshipman Frederick E. Pelton of Denver, stood fourth in the class one year, fifth another, sixth another, and graduated eight in the class.

"I am supremely proud to say to the house that those two Colorado boys were my first appointments to Annapolis. They were the two highest in a competitive examination which I held during my first term in congress.

"The other Colorado boy that graduated with honors was Abraham Marron, also of Denver, appointed by the late Senator Charles J. Hughes, Jr. His standing was ninth in the class. I believe I am safe in saying that no state in this union has ever equalled this record. It speaks well for our school system and is an inspiration to the youth of our state. Colorado is proud of these boys, and they are entitled to this mention and this record, because the course at that academy is very hard work.

"By reason of their rank, Midshipman Ellsberg was allowed to select his ship, and he chose the new battleship Texas, while I understand young Pelton and Marron chose the Battleship Maryland, to which they will be assigned."

THE JEWS IN VIENNA

In a series of articles published last year we dealt at length with the gradual decline of the birth-rate among the white races. At first the decrease in the size of the average family was considered to be peculiar to France; we now know that all the nations belonging to the white race are moving in the same direction and that the time is not far off when among most of them the number of births will no longer exceed that of deaths. In the case of no other race is that change coming with greater rapidity than it is in the case of the Jews as soon as they emerge from the East-European ghettoes.

That New York City does not form an exception to that rule is well known to anyone acquainted with the life of its Jewish community. It would, however, for several reasons, be difficult to get at the exact figures which would show us the rate at which the births are declining among the Americanized Jews; i. e., the group in which the decline is strongest. Our vital statistics take no account of the religious confession of the persons concerned; and even if we had exact religious statistics at our disposal, we could not distinguish the children of recent comers from those of the older immigrants. On the other hand, the birth-rate of the whole Jewish population of New York City is not likely to fall rapidly, as long as immigration continues at its present rate, however much it may be falling among those settled for a longer time. Among the Jewish immigrants the annual number of births must necessarily form a high proportion as the immigration consists chiefly of young people of between fifteen and forty-five years of age and includes an almost equal number of women. Should we therefore find that the average birth-rate of the Jewish community in New York City is the same as that of the Jews in Russia, we would know that it is in reality sinking rapidly, as it would mean that a community containing a much larger number of women of child-bearing age multiplies only at the same rate as that from which, on the contrary, a great number of young people had withdrawn.

The statistics of the Viennese Jewry give us to some extent the figures of what we know from experience to be happening among the second generation, and often even in the first generation of the Jewish immigrants to America. By far the greater number of Viennese Jews are not born in Vienna, but are immigrants from Bohemia, Moravia, Hungary, Galicia and Russia. This immigration does not, however, consist of members of the working classes as it mainly does in case of our own Jewish immigration. A considerable proportion of these immigrants are members of the liberal professions, merchants or office clerks, seeking the wider opportunities offered to them by the capital of the Austrian Empire. They correspond, therefore, in education and social standing, not so much to the average Jewish immigrants as we know them in this country, but rather to their American-born children. The statistics of the Viennese Jewry are further of interest, being those of the third-biggest Jewish community in the world; only New York City and Warsaw exceed it in numbers. The following table gives the most statistical facts concerning the Jewish community of Vienna for the years 1890, 900, 1910 and 1911:

	Jewish population in Vienna	Number of Births	Birth-rate	Number of deaths	Death-rate	Excess of the number of births over deaths
890	100,078	1,222	12.19	998	2,220	22.19
900	145,000	1,800	12.91	1,348	3,228	22.17
910	178,268	2,186	12.26	218	2,404	13.5
911	180,000	2,308	12.82	20	2,288	12.7

Thus the third-largest Jewish community in the world has not only ceased to grow of its own strength but, should immigration stop, would in the future show a decline in numbers. Of the increase of the Jewish population of Vienna between 1900 and 1910 only about one-fifth was due to natural growth. In the five years, 1901-1905 the number of births among the Viennese Jewry exceeded that of deaths by [illegible] in the five years, 1906-1910, by 2,379, together, the total natural growth could have accounted only for an increase of little over seven thousand. In reality, the increase would have been even smaller, owing to the great number of Jewish baptisms. Hence, immigration during these ten years (1901-1910) must have amounted to more than the 26,000; that is the figure which we would get by deducting the natural increase from the total growth of the Jewish population of Vienna. During the ten years, 1900-1910, 6,177 members of the Jewish community changed their religion, whereas only 1,266 members of other confessions joined the Jewish community, leaving it with a net loss of 4,911. (A very large proportion of these changes of religion were necessitated by the Austrian marriage laws, which do not admit marriage between persons professing different religions.) Thus, were there no immigration the annual decrease in the size of the Viennese Jewry would be even more considerable than it appears from the figures giving merely the numbers of births and deaths.

It ought further to be noticed that the frequent baptisms make both the birth-rate and the death-rate among the Jews appear lower than they are in reality. It often happens that Jewish parents, wishing to smoothen the path of their children in an anti-semitic country, as Austria is, baptize them as infants; these children of Jewish parentage never appear among the Jewish births. On the other hand Jews who baptize never die as Jews and thus keep the death-rate at a lower figure than that which it would reach had they remained members of the Jewish community. It is, of course, almost impossible for us to evaluate in exact figures the changes in the Jewish birth-rate and death-rate caused by these two factors.—The American Leader.

FIRST GENERAL CONVENTION OF DISTRICT GRAND LODGE NO. 11.

"Medjiliss Djismani, happy that the convention B'nai B'rith is held in the Osmanic capital, heartily greets its delegates, wishes fruitful work, rich in benefits for Judaism."

Haim Nahum Effendi, Chief Rabbi of Turkey, sent the following letter to the convention:

"To the members of the B'nai B'rith "convention: Dear sirs and coreligion-"ists—At the close of the labors of your "convention I feel the pleasant duty to "send my hearty greetings to all the rep-"resentatives of the B'nai B'rith lodges "of the Orient who participated in the "work and to assure them that I enter-"tain the best wishes for the success of "the work for humanity which form the "basis of your association.

"The common sentiments, the tradi-"tional ties of Jewish brotherhood which "unite your brethren, and the interest "which they manifest in all the moral "and material sufferings of our corelig-"ionists are a symptom of the develop-"ment of solidarity in the midst of the "younger generation. Your convention "is the first manifestation of it and I "wish with my whole heart that its ac-"tivity may bring good fruit for the "welfare of Oriental Judaism.

"Requesting you to convey my sincere "greetings to all our coreligionists in "your lodges, I subscribe myself with "the expression of exceptional high es-"teem.

"HAIM NAHUM."

The Ashkenazic congregation of Constantinople, the "Maccabi" organization of Jewish turners, as well as the editors of a number of Jewish papers which appear in the capital, also sent telegrams of congratulation.

The following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

1. In compliance with the wish of Salonika Lodge, regarding the emigration of the Macedonian Jews, the convention resolves that the lodges in the cities where immigration is most possible shall establish immigration offices or committees. These offices or committees shall work in harmony with the Emigration Committee of Salonika Lodge.
2. The convention recommends to all the lodges of the District to establish Labor Bureaus and instructs the General Committee to work out a plan for uniform organization with a central bureau in Constantinople.

Bro. Isaac Epstein, of Salonika, spoke of the part taken by the Order in the work of elevating the Jews of the Orient from the standpoint of education. He offered the following resolutions, which were adopted:

1. Each lodge shall endeavor to introduce manual training in the schools of its respective community.
2. Each lodge shall send at least one student to Palestine to contribute thereby to the training of good Hebrew teachers.

The following resolutions were also adopted:

1. Moved by the danger which threatens the education of the Jewish youth in the Orient in consequence of the propaganda of the missionary institutions, the convention resolves that (a) It is the duty of the lodges to enlighten Jewish public opinion through lectures and the public press, concerning the dangers of the education in these institutions, and to influence the parents so that they should send their children to the secular schools only. (b) It is the duty of the lodges to work for the creation of Jewish schools in which those children can enter who leave the schools of the missionaries. (c) It is the duty of the lodges to work for the introduction of instruction in Jewish history, religion as well as in Hebrew, into the non-Jewish schools, and to see to it that their respective communities make the necessary appropriations for it.
2. The convention resolves to take the following measures in regard to the training of capable rabbis for the congregations in the Orient. (a) The lodges are bound to provide stipends from their own funds, or to induce the congregations to do it, for young men who attend an intermediate school with the intention of studying later on in a Rabbinical seminary of the Orient or in Europe. (b) The lodges have to work for the purpose of having their respective congregations appropriate annual subventions for establishing and maintaining of a higher educational institute, such as an intermediate school, teachers' seminary and Rabbinical college for the Jews of the Orient.
3. The convention approves the initiative taken by the General Committee to form a committee of brethren to combat the traffic in girls in Constantinople, and recommends to all the lodges of those cities, where the traffic in, or the prostitution of Jewish girls exists, to form similar committees, which shall be caused by the General Committee to establish a united organization with a center in Constantinople.
4. True to the principle of brotherhood and harmony which forms the very basis of the Order, the convention of District No. 11 affirms the following: The lodges of District No. 11 I. O. B. B. present a neutral field for every Jewish energy or activity which is fostering the welfare and elevation of the Jewish people. The lodges maintain an absolutely impartial and neutral attitude towards the various rites, currents of opinion, movements or parties in Judaism. The belonging to one or the other of these rites, movements or parties, can form no hindrance to the admission of a candidate as a member of a lodge.

The lodges must not only avoid the assumption of a combative attitude towards any party or controversy, but are demanded always to work with all their power for the adjustment of such conflicts and to help to restore peace in the midst of Jews.

The election of officers resulted as follows:

Grand President, J. Niego.
First Vice President, Elie Sidi.
Second Vice President, Naggiar.
Grand Secretary, Dr. Israel Auerbach.
Grand Treasurer, Isidor Franco.
Monitor, Chief Rabbi H. Bedjerano.

The next meeting of the Grand Lodge will again be held in Constantinople.

MINISTERING TO THE NEEDS OF . JEWISH INMATES IN PENAL . INSTITUTIONS.

At the monthly meeting of the Board of Managers of the U. A. H. C. it was reported that the Department of Synagogue and School Extension has entered into co-operation with officials of two B'nai B'rith grand lodges for the purpose of ministering to the needs of Jewish persons. In District No. 3 a special committee of the B'nai B'rith, under the chairmanship of Mr. Robt. Davidson, on behalf of the Committee on Social Service, provides voluntary visitors for the various penal and correctional institutions. The department of the U. A. H. C. is supplying such visitors with religious literature. In District No. 2 similar arrangements have been made by the B'nai B'rith with Mr. Jacob Billikoff of Kansas City as chairman of the Social Service Committee.

THE JEWISH CHAUTAUQUA SOCIETY.

The success of the Jewish Chautauqua Society is demonstrating the need of this widespread system of popular education, and the propaganda which it has made throughout the entire country showing practical results, has proved of the utmost importance.

Upon the invitation of the Union of Jewish Literary Societies, Dr. Henry Berkowitz, Chancellor, and Dr. William Rosenau, Vice-Chancellor of the Society, were invited to London to explain this great movement to that body.

The response, spirit, and outcome of the meetings was most enthusiastic. Circle work will be reawakened, lectures will be instituted, and finally a Summer School Assembly will result, the Chautauqua Course Books being used.

At a meeting at Jews' College more than one hundred teachers were present.

Dr. Berkowitz spoke on the "New Education in Religion," emphasizing the "new," explaining that the Chautauqua had adopted this system of popularization of Jewish knowledge, and for twenty years has stimulated and aided thousands of persons in all parts of America to pursue reading courses in Jewish History, Literature and Religion

The whole system had gradually expanded and enlarged its scope of effort from syllabi and plans for study circle to the development and establishment of a school for the Teacher and Parent. In all of these efforts, the attempt has been made to apply the principles and methods of New Education.

"The child's study is our master mission. The child is central in the educational plan. All else is contributory to its requirements."

Dr. Rosenau, Dean of the Faculty, explained the origin and organization and development of the Correspondence School; that he had been met on all sides with the expression of the urgent needs of religious education and the opportunities for training efficient teachers for Religious Schools.

He emphasized the fact that the Courses of Study were written without any bias, the aim being to make them suitable for every phase of Jewish Education and religious activity, and that the student body included not only teacher, but parents.

So much interest was created by the addresses of these two officers that they were requested to meet in joint conference under the auspices of the Jewish Historical Society and the Union of the Jewish Literary Societies at Mocatta Library University College. A large and representative gathering, including members of Constituent Societies, officers of the various congregations, University Lecturers, graduates and undergraduates, members of Oxford and Cambridge Universities, representative business men and many ladies were present.

Dr. Israel Abrahams presided and explained that the purpose of this meeting was to discuss the desirability of holding a Jewish University extension course. As the Jewish Chautauqua Society, through these two officers, had been devoting themselves to the promotion of Jewish study, the Union wished to confer with them and obtain information and assistance for parallel work.

Dr. Rosenau also outlined the work of the Society in arranging lectures at American Universities, that the aid of the Society had been evoked by the United States Commissioner of Education, and emphasized the value of these lectures in removing a deal of ignorance and prejudice concerning the Jews in various parts of the States.

Registrar of Toynbee Hall said that they would gladly welcome such an activity and the Christian population in the East End had much to learn concerning their Jewish neighbors and that the lectures would also be of value to Jews

The Haham expressed the hope that the plan would materialize and that the value of the courses proposed would lie in correcting the shallow dilletantism which is now too prevalent.

A meeting of the British Committee with Dr. Berkowitz and Dr. Rosenau will be held in London and final arrangements consummated for the establishment of the British branch.

The Fourth Western Summer Assembly recently held in Los Angeles, California, was a most successful one attesting the value and strength of the growing process. The Fifth Annual Western Assembly will be held in San Francisco, California, in 1915, and already efforts are being made to make this meeting a notable one.

The Chairman of the Western Assembly is Rabbi Martin A. Meyer, who is also a Director of the parent organization.

Russia and Her Jews

A few weeks ago the "London Times" published an article under the heading 'Russia and Her Jews." We herewith reprint an editorial comment by a London weekly, "Darkest Russia":

A SIGN OF THE TIMES.

The leading article which appeared in last Friday's Times, under the heading "Russia and Her Jews," is in its way a monument of ineffective reasoning tricked out with frothy anti-Semitism. We have become accustomed of late to the process of screening the follies and outrages perpetrated by the Russian Government in which that journal has seen fit to indulge, and with a shrug of the shoulders and a lifting of the eyebrows we have concluded that this is the inevitable tribute to the requirements of the Entente as they are understood in Printing House Square, and to the generous advertisement orders showered on the Treasury in St. Petersburg upon the purveyors of so many amiable Russian Supplements. The article before us, however, is more insidiously harmful to the cause of Russian freedom than any that has gone before, and none the less so because in its earlier part it wears the mask of friendly criticism. It is only towards the end that its real character is allowed to become visible, and then the anti-Semitism that inspires it breaks out in all its reckless and prejudiced stupidity. Seven years ago such an article in such a paper would have been unthinkable. But the effect of the Anglo-Russian Entente, it appears, has been to overthrow some of the highest traditions of British journalism no less than of British policy. Even within the past few months the attitude of the Times toward Russian affairs has suffered deterioration; and we should be blind if we failed to notice that since Mr. Steed became its foreign editor the anti-Semitism that used continually to inform his messages from Vienna has been reflected in the leading columns of that journal.

The ostensible motive of the article is to comment upon the financial crisis produced in Russia by the Government's decision to impose new restrictions on the participation of Jews in joint-stock companies. Having thus linked up the cause and the effect (in spite of Russian official disclaimers of any connection between the two episodes), it would be difficult to imagine how the Times could acquit the Government of blame. But this it proceeds to do in a highly ingenuous fashion. The sole author of the new restrictions, it is maintained, is M. Maklakoff, the Minister of the Interior. The blame, then, rests upon M. Maklakoff, and the Government as a whole is without sin in this matter. "The Prime Minister has not the control over his colleagues in the Cabinet which statesmen holding the same office enjoy in constitutional States." It is satisfactory to learn that the Times does not at any rate imagine that Russia is a constitutional State—an illusion which its Russian Supplements have always seemed designed to foster. But how absurd is the argument that the Government is not responsible for the iniquities of its individual members. There is M. Maklakoff hounding down the Jews, putting a premium upon official lawlessness, and making himself the best-hated man in Russia; but the Minister of the Interior is not the Government. There is M. Kasso waging war upon education; but the Minister of Public Instruction is not the Government. There is M. Schegovitoff trampling Russian justice in the mud; but the Minister of Justice is not the Government. And so in every Department of State we may condemn the policy of the Minister in command; but we must not on that account condemn the Russian Government.

But, even if this preposterous theory could be supported with regard to other Ministerial activities, it could not hold water for a moment when applied to the new company restrictions. It may have been owing to M. Maklakoff's manoeuvring that they were at last enforced; but M. Maklakoff, useful though as he may be as a scapegoat, is not their author. As we pointed out last week, they represent the first step in a campaign long since conceived by the new Minister of Finance, M. Bark, who is an out-and-out Nationalist, and from whose inventive brain the "nationalisation of credit" scheme originally sprang. There are, perhaps, one or two members of the Cabinet who are opposed to the latest restrictions; but there is not the slightest doubt that the majority of Ministers supported their imposition. As for M. Goremykin, whose want of influence over his colleagues the Times admits, we need only recall that at the time of his appointment to his present post we described him as a dummy Premier.

Having thus given the Government credit for wishing to remove the "artificial obstacles" which M. Maklakoff is alleged to have placed in the way of the country's progress, the article proceeds to discuss the general question of Jewish disabilities. There is a widespread demand for the removal of all restrictions upon the rights of the Jews in Russia. "But this demand," we are told, "betrays utter ignorance of the real situation. It is impossible for any Russian Government to abrogate at a stroke of the pen all the disabilities to which the 5,000,000 of Russian Jews are now legally subject." The Russian Jews, it may be remarked in passing, would be content for the present with something less drastic in the way of reform than the removal of all their disabilities "at a stroke of the pen"; but, so far from removing or lightening a single one of them, within the past few years the Government—not this or that Minister, but the Government—has consistently intensified them and added to their number. That is a fact of which the Times is sublimely unconscious, and as it proceeds to enlarge upon its theme its ignorance and anti-Semitic prejudice become more and more patent. We have to realize, we are informed, not only the "immense difficulties" but also the "real dangers" of a general emancipation of the Jews "in the present state of the Russian Empire." And the "dangers" of what is after all an act of simple humanity are described in the following remarkable fashion:

"The Russian peasants are ignorant and needy, and there cannot be much doubt that were the Jews free to move and trade amongst them at pleasure they would very soon 'eat up' the tillers of the soil. Peddling, liquor-dealing, and money-lending are the pursuits to which the Oriental Jews naturally take, and no Russian statesman can desire to see these industries extended."

Here we find expressed, with an assurance that must be simply amazing to every one in Russia, arguments which even the most extreme Russian Nationalists and anti-Semites have long since discarded. They have been discarded because the "exploitation"' theory has been exploded by the peasants themselves and by statistics that admit of but one interpretation.

We are not going to argue the question, because there is in fact no room for argument. All we have to say can be expressed in a single sentence, and we challenge any one to deny its truth. In the Jewish Pale of Settlement, where Jews enjoy comparative freedom of movement and trading activity the peasants display a marked superiority as regards both their material and moral welfare over the peasants outside the Pale. The very obvious cause of this phenomenon is that outside the Pale the elimination of Jewish competition among the middlemen who handle the peasants' produce has created a virtual Trust in favor of an unscrupulous group of dealers who exploit the peasants shamefully and mercilessly, secure in their Christian monopoly. The criminal recklessness of the Times' statements will be appreciated when it is recalled that "liquor-dealing," which is described as one of the natural pursuits of the "Oriental Jews," is in Russia confined by law to the Government itself, and that this very Government has in recent years been guilty of such awful excesses in forcing drink upon the peasants that the Tsar was lately moved to declaim against the traffic in a special Rescript. As for the alleged moneylending exploits of the Jews, it is sufficient to state that the rate of interest prevailing in the Pale is far lower than that obtaining in the rest of Russia, where again Jewish competition has been artificially destroyed.

There are countless other absurdities and gross misstatements in this sorry article. It is implied, for instance, that the Jewish population of Russia is composed mostly of petty traders, whereas the great majority of the Russian Jews are struggling working-men, sharing to the full the poverty and the aspirations of the general proletariat. And in an ectasy of snobbishness it is urged that, while these poor Jews should be held fast in the vice of restriction and oppression, the grip should be loosened for "Jewish financiers," who should no longer be excluded from "the share in legitimate trade and commerce to which their wealth and their abilities entitle them." The whole thing is a pitiful exhibition of ignorance and prejudice. And yet it will no doubt be quoted with glee by all the Reactionary organs in Russia as representing the opinion of the British people; and the gentlemen of the Black Hundred, with joyful surprise, will discover that the arguments in support of the oppression of the Jews which they had cast upon the scrap-heap are not quite so useless as they had thought them. From the land of liberty they will gain a new encouragement in their campaign of calumny, and we may expect shortly to hear of fresh instalments of persecution being dealt out to the poorer Jews —on the Times system.

SOCIAL AND ECONOMIC JUSTICE.

10 per cent. to 15 per cent. had to be sent back to the Farm for violation of their paroles, or because they committed further infractions against the law. Last year, for instance, our men and women, while on parole, earned, to be conservative, about $200,000.00, whereas their incarceration would have involved not only an economic loss to the community but a moral and spiritual deterioration in the men themselves. I am presenting these observations largely to impress the fact that, although on occasion some of the men and boys in whom we might place faith will relapse into their old habits, in the greater majority of instances they will make good, provided there is back of them some agency which will tide them over during their critical days of rehabilitation

Your Committee has had occasion to deal with a few such men and thus far results have been intensely gratifying. Take, for instance, the case of H. G., who was a notorious pickpocket in a city only two or three hundred miles away from Toledo. He had been confined at least a half-dozen times in one institution or another. No sooner did he come out of the workhouse but he was rearrested and sent back because, in the parlance of the police, he was a "timer." No wonder that, if he ever had any moral or spiritual qualities left in him, they were completely crushed by the constant annoyances to which he was subjected! Either as a matter of revenge or because he could not possibly secure a job, he finally concluded to live entirely by his wits. Six months ago the young man was sent to Kansas City by a member of our Committee in the hope that, away from his old associations, he might be redeemed. Your chairman secured the young man a job in a wholesale jewelry establishment, and G. has been working there steadily ever since, earning $12 a week and giving thorough satisfaction to his employer and to those of us who are interested in his welfare.

G. again served three years in one of our large penitentiaries for embezzlement. Upon his parole seven months ago a job was secured for him in a wholesale liquor establishment, and he is at present earning $18 per week as a clerk in the shipping department of that concern.

K. had led a wild life ever since his mother died some eight or nine years ago. His father had no ontrol over him. He became a gambler. Because he stole some jewelry from a lady (?) friend of his, he received a sentence of five years in the Missouri Penitentiary. This being his first legal offense, he was paroled to our Committee after serving six months in the County Jail. A position was secured for him with one of the large news agenies which operate between Kansas City and San Francisco. The fact that only a few days ago K. showed a bank account of $125.00, all of which was earned through his own efforts, shows that the young man has profited by his release and is determined to lead a life of thrift and industry.

F., who left the Ohio State Penitentiary three months ago and whose physical condition was such that he had to be sent to Hot Springs, writes after a stay there of two months: "I shall never forget the kindness of your organization to me. I owe my complete physical recovery to your enlisting Mr. Myer's and Rabbi Rhine's interest in my case. Expect to leave Hot Springs in a day or two for Chicago, where a job has been promised me, and, by my future conduct, I hope to convince you that your efforts in my behalf were not in vain. Perhaps if some one had interested him or herself in me three years ago, when I was physically in a deplorable condition, I would not today be an ex-prisoner."

Several more such cases can be cited to show that the work of the Committee has not been fruitless, at least with the few with whom it had dealings. In addition to which, members of our Committee visited a number of the institutions. Brother Oscar Leonard, for instance, visited the Missouri Penitentiary twice during the year, and Brother David Liknatiz has kept intimately in touch, as he has for a number of years with the inmates of the Federal Penitentiary and Military Prison in Leavenworth. Rabbi Bernstein has visited most of the Missouri institutions. Several members of our organization, notably Brother J. Myers, have kept closely in touch with the work of the various State asylums situated in Columbus, O Rabbi Philo has been of great assistance to the boys of the Boys' Industrial School in Lancaster, O. During the holiday matzos were furnished to the inmates of a number of institutions and services, appropriate to the holidays were held.

But what is even more important than all these things is the fact that the Committee has established such pleasant relations with the authorities that, in the future, the Committee will find its way more readily into these institutions and thus help illumine the gloomiest recesses with cheerful hope and tender service.

But, then, pleased as the Committee is with the results thus far achieved, and we have only scratched the mere surface, justly proud though we be of the establishment of orphan asylums, hospitals, homes for the aged and kindred institutions which owe their existence to our splendid Order; ever conscious though we be of the important role we as an organzation, have played in many of the uplift movements affecting our people, let us not lose sight of the fundamental fact that thus far we have only found satisfaction in those philanthropies which are expressive in brick and mortar; that thus far we have only contented ourselves with trying to save the wrecked remains of human lives instead of saving the lives themselves back in the days before the wreck occurred. Which, in the words of a friend of mine, is "like gathering up what we can of the overflowing wasted waters of a stream instead of conserving it at the source. It is like letting the twig grow rank and unattended and then trying to patch up and repair the gnarled and knotted trunk after the storms have burst upon it and the lightning has riven it year after year. It is like gathering up the wreckage strewn along the beach instead of building light-houses and beacons to warn and guide." Alas, how slow the world is to learn that we can not plant indifference and reap good citizenship; that we can not plant injustice and reap safety; that we can not plant slums and boy gangs and unprotected girlhood and reap public morality!

Heretofore there has been plenty of conventional charity, no lack of almsgiving, but in this doling out of charity the idea of a square deal, which is the ideal of social justice, entered only remotely, if at all. The cry of the world today is for a chance—for two chances in fact, one in the beginning and another to remedy the mistakes which it is only human to make.

And in this inspired movement for social and economic justice, which demands that the dreams of our prophets of old shall be transformed into statutes and that the visions of the seers of old be translated into every day justice, let our, the Bnai B'rith Order, take the lead!

A B'nai B'rith Religious School.

Patchogue Lodge, I. O. B. B., has set on foot a movement for the conduct of a religious school with the idea of establishing also services for the Sabbath and holy days that will appeal to the younger element. This thriving Long Island village has quite a Jewish population and has a small congregation. Its service is of the strictly orthodox character and the young people there, who have formed a B'nai B'rith lodge, felt they would like to have a service that will appeal to them and that will attach their growing children to the synagogue

NEWS FROM THE ORIENT

By Our Correspondent DR. ISRAEL AUERBACH, Constantinople

In the closing part of my last communication I reported briefly about the visit in Constantinople of Mr. S. Cohen, secretary of the "Jewish Association for the Protection of Girls and Women." The presence of this personality in our city has had the effect of enabling the Jews here to continue their work against the shameful traffic in girls. But before I enter into the practical results of this visit, it will be of interest to touch upon the aspect of this question in the Orient in general and the Jewish standpoint in particular.

Constantinople, as well as other centers of the Orient, principally Alexandria and Cairo, are main markets for this inhuman traffic, just as are New York, Buenos Ayres and Rio de Janeiro, across the ocean. Already in ancient Byzantium this wandering women's slavery flourished, and through all the centuries of history the city on the Bosphorus retained its sorrowful fame as the el dorado of the captors and sellers of girls. But it remained for the last decades to see Jews participate in this dishonorable practice. The fearful misery of our coreligionists in the countries bordering on Turkey has brought about this sad degeneration, it caused a number of our unfortunate sisters to sink down into this inferno, and induced the bad elements of the Jewish population to make use of this misery for their own profit. This infection of the Constantinople Jewry with white slavery elements has in time assumed such a vast extent, in a certain part of the city, in Galata, close to the harbor, that to the foreign visitor, who is a superficial observer, the entire quarter appears as exclusively Jewish and gives him the erroneous impression that all the prostitution in Constantinople is a Jewish phenomenon. This impression, though based in error, inflicts deep injury upon general Jewish honor.

From this standpoint one can easily understand that Jewish men of heart who aim to do good to the Jews, men who are everywhere interested in the eradication of this sorrowful human evil, have looked upon the movement here in Constantinople as being of special necessity. The honor of the Jewish people really demands that an end should be made somehow of this defamation of the Jewish name which struts in the streets of Galata. In the Orient it has already become a self-understood fact that the Order B'nai B'rith marches at the head of undertakings for the general Jewish welfare and this was also the basic thought of our never-to-be forgotten brother, Sigmund Bergel. In the founding of District No. 11 he wished to create a center from which this struggle could be carried on with forceful energy and with a prospect for success for the honor of Judaism and for the deliverance of the lost and suffering children of man. In this he acted in the closest sympathy with the leading men of our Order and in harmony with the endeavors which for several years have kept intensely busy the centers of our Order and lodges also in America. The departed brother has succeeded in a praiseworthy manner in vivifying this basic thought by the founding of, and giving life to, Oriental lodges. During the first years of the existence of District No. 11 it was nevertheless impossible to organize the fight for the suppression of the traffic in girls because the legal and financial foundation for it was still missing. The conditions favoring such work have only developed lately. In the last years the conditions have improved socially and legally because the entire international society of Constantinople, the representatives of the powers and the Ottoman officials commenced to give their attention to this problem and to consider the means for its solution. The work was materially advanced because not only is the constitution Grand Lodge of the Order ready to place its forces at the disposal of the leaders of the movement, but also the Grand Lodge for Germany and the "Association for Protection of Girls and Women" in London are willing to assist them with financial means in the difficult undertaking.

The first momentum for the realization of the old wishes was given a year ago, when the presence of your correspondent in Berlin offered an opportunity to confer about this matter with the representatives of the Grand Lodge for Germany and the Hilfsverein der Deutschen Juden. It was then decided [illegible] Jewish preparatory committee [illegible] Constantinople with the writer as corresponding secretary. The fundamental principles of the work which was to be undertaken later were also firmly established. One of the stipulations proposed for the assuming of activity was the existence or the formation of an international organization for combating the traffic in girls in Constantinople, in which the Jewish committee should be represented and with whom it should work together. In the course of last year the preparatory committee has fulfilled the duties which were imposed upon it; the international organization, the seed of which were planted here years ago, but failed to germinate and to show any positive results, was completely reorganized first of all through the telling work of the American ambassador here, our brother, Henry Morgenthau, and also through the urgent agitation of your correspondent. Two members of the Jewish committee, the brethren, Dr. Auerbach and Dr. Marcus, were admitted into the management as representatives of the B'nai B'rith Grand Lodge. All that is now needed to start co-operation on the Jewish side is for the international organization to begin its activity.

It must be stated here that very serious difficulties confront this activity. In Constantinople it is always something very toilsome to amalgamate the various working elements, which are separated by nationality, language and confession. Idealism in social life, the giving of time, force and means for general duties of humanity are very rare things; the Osmanic legislation is still completely devoid of any definitions which could permit proceeding against the white slavers in the courts. The Turkish police are either more indolent than anywhere else in dealing with the malefactors in the traffic of girls, or they are even connected with them through secret relations in a foul manner; but the greatest hindrance is perhaps formed by the written concessions which prohibit the Turkish executive organs from proceeding against foreign subjects and at the same time forbid the organs of the consulates from entering the houses of Turkish citizens; mutual mistrust in both instances contributes the rest to render it difficult to work in common even with the best intentions. Still, the new organization, which came into life under the protection of our brother, Morgenthau, and the well-meaning support of all the ambassadors of the powers, as well as of the Turkish ministers, can become the proper frame within which the stated diverging interests can meet, confer and create a common basis for united action. The future will show how far these hopes are justified. What is needed at present is to find a secretary who is a forceful leader, who will centralize and strengthen the organization, and who will procure the proper agents for detail work. We Jews try, of course, to have a coreligionist fill this position, so that the Jewish interests are safely guarded, that all kinds of missionary work among the rescued girls are excluded and that such men are doing the work as are familiar with the Yiddish, the language of the greater part of the dealers, as well as of the fallen women who are their prey.

But even after everything has been done, a number of problems still remain, for the solution of which the Jews will have to do additional work, in order to create a forum in Constantinople for the general international fight against the traffic in girls. To organize this additional work, at least to foster this organization, by his wise counsel which is valuable on account of his experience gained during many years of work, the secretary of the "Jewish Association" of London was sent here. After Mr. Cohen had gained thorough information by personal observation and many conversations with all interested persons about the conditions and aspects of the local traffic in girls and the chances for a successful fight against the same, a joint meeting with the committee of our Lodge was held when a program for the work of the Jewish committee was prepared and plans were made for obtaining the necessary means. The Grand Lodge of the Orient gives to the Jewish committee the free use of its office and an assistant secretary. The Berlin and London organizations will aid the committee with annual subventions, a certain portion of which the Jewish committee will have to pay as dues to the international organization to obtain the right of a seat and a vote, so as to be able to wield some influence on its work. How much these subventions will amount to has not yet been positively decided, but at any rate it will be on a sufficient material basis.

The general convention of the Grand Lodge, which will take place in the middle of this month, will offer a favorable opportunity for extending the planned undertaking in a practical manner. The question will be taken up for deliberation during the meeting and a motion will be made to organize subcommittees in all the lodges of the cities in which the traffic in girls exists. These subcommittees shall correspond with our central committee and do parallel work.

In case the financial means of the lodges should not be sufficient, then the Grand Lodge of the Orient, which has no funds of its own for such purposes, will appeal to the executive committee, which surely has the work of the extirpation of the shameful existence of Jewish traffickers in girls at heart in the same measure as it has the many other duties for the welfare of humanity and for the elevation of Judaism.

STATE COMPENSATION FOR POGROM SUFFERERS.

The Council of the Russian Nobility have decided to include Jewish victims of pogroms in their scheme of compensation by the State for sufferers from riots. The proposal is said to have been received with marked favor in several ministerial departments. It is felt that pogroms would no longer be permitted if the State were called upon to pay compensation.

RUSSIA PLACES A WATCH OVER HER BAPTIZED JEWS.

By a decree of the governor of Charkoff the baptized Jews in Russia have been placed under police surveillance. It is the duty of the police to watch closely whether these baptized Jews are really living according to laws of the Christian religion, for the officials entertain the suspicion that these converts to Christianity, like the Maranos in Spain and Portugal in other times, are only pretending to be Christians and secretly observe the laws of the Jewish religion. The police are instructed to report their observations to the governor. In the sense of a proposition made by the Archbishop of Odessa, it is the intention of the Russian government to fix a trial period of six months for all Jews who report for baptism and only when the candidates for baptism can furnish proof that during this time they have led a real Christian life will they be admitted into the Christian church.

A JEWISH PAPER IN MOROCCO.

The first number of a Spaniol paper, under the name of "Kol Israel" (voice of Israel), recently appeared in Tangiers Morocco. The paper has undertaken to represent the various interests of the Jews of Morocco, who are mostly Spaniols, and to bring about the organization of these Jews. In his appeal the editor points out the successful activity of the Spaniol Jews in the Orient and states that it is the highest time for the Jews of Morocco to wake from lethargy and attend to their own interests.

Appeal of Roumanian Jews for Justice

The Union of Native Jews of Roumania, of which Dr. Adolphe Stern of Bucharest, president of District Grand Lodge, No. 9, is chairman, issued a special appeal to the Roumanian parliament in view of the pending revision of the constitution of the land. The appeal follows:

"We are addressing ourselves to you, gentlemen, to ask for justice. Millions of Roumanians will be given new life, material well-being, political and moral improvement. These reforms will do away with many ancient injustices. A new Roumania, strengthened within, will march with surer step toward the realization of the goal dear to the heart of every Roumanian.

"We Jews alone, natives of the land, are denied justice.

"For more than half a century we are held in political and economic slavery. We are kept down morally and materially. We are daily wounded in our human dignity and our manly sentiments are trampled upon recklessly.

"Contrary to the ancient traditions of the country, we have been declared aliens. This has had dreadful consequences for us. Tens of thousands of Jews have been expelled from the country, and many more thousands have been compelled to emigrate. Hundreds of avenues for livelihood have been taken from us. The entire Jewish population has been driven into a few branches of activity. Even in these few branches we are being hindered.

"On this account the vast majority of the Jewish population of this country has been plunged into the darkest poverty.

"The old leaders of the country introduced measures calculated to assimilate the Jews in the army and through the public schools. We Jews responded to these measures readily and willingly. But after a short time we were driven from the public schools. In the army the moral status of our sons is beyond description. We have never refused to assimilate ourselves. We have been kept from doing so by law and other means.

"For years a political policy of elimination has been practiced against us. We feel that we have not merited such treatment. Driven from the public schools, we have established our own schools—Roumanian schools in every respect. The young generations are reared as Roumanians in our schools. We have always manifested a deep and sincere love for our country. In spite of oppression and persecution, we have loved our country because it is the land of our birth, the land in which we live. We are bound to this, our native land, by ties of the soul. Our hearts and our interests are with this native land of ours.

"In 1877, in the war of independence, and in 1913, in the Bulgarian campaign, we native Jews have responded with the same zeal and the same enthusiasm that our Roumanian brother manifested.

"Our appeal now is to the lawmakers of this country. We pray you to decide once for all that the native Jews—the Jews who are not subjects to any foreign power—are sons of this land, citizens of Roumania.

"Pray, do not believe the words of those who hate us and who are prejudiced against us. We have done our duty in the past and are doing our duty now toward this country as good Roumanians. We pay the same taxes, we give our lives as readily as our fellow Roumanians. It is, therefore, proper that we have the same rights.

"Those who oppose us are usually men who do not know us and who are prejudiced. Up to this day this country has never undertaken an investigation of the Jewish question to ascertain the facts and find on whose side is the right.

"Gentlemen of the Chamber and of the Senate, the time has come that we, too, may be hard. Injustice has held sway long enough.

"It is the supreme interest of this country, it is her moral interest, it is essential for her prestige, that the injustice against us be corrected. With the solution of the peasant problem must go also the solution of the Jewish problem.

"Investigate carefully and impartially and you will find that the solution of the Jewish problem will benefit the country. The famous Article VII. in our Constitution has nothing to do with us. It refers to aliens. We are not aliens. The Jewish question can be solved through one of the articles which you are to revise.

"It is our hope that an enlightened body like yours will heed the voice of the Jewish population, and you will decide that the native sons of Roumania should be citizens of their native land.

"Citizens of Roumania! Many of you know us and you know that we merit the rights which we ask.

"Those who do not know us we ask that they study the problem before pronouncing an opinion. If they do that they will be with us.

"We appeal to all not to judge us before hearing our side. We are ready to aid those who desire to study the Jewish problem. We hope to carry on a campaign which will enlighten public opinion and help those who are to revise the Constitution give us justice.

"The Roumanian is naturally kind and loves justice. He does not like oppression. We therefore appeal to you, Roumanian citizens, to give us your aid in this struggle for justice. Without your aid we can gain nothing. With it we can gain everything.

"Surely, you justice loving Roumanians do not wish to see injustice against us continued. Our country has gained an honored name among nations after last year's events. We must not allow any iniquity to darken the fair name and fame of Roumania."

A VISIT TO THE WONDER-RABBI OF SADAGORA.

By Karin Michaelis.

In Sadagora we no longer perceived the scent of white violets. All Sadagora is, properly speaking, nothing but a Ghetto village, swarming with half-naked, black-haired children (who called after us "pig" and "satan") and old Kaftan-Jews, with eyes running with tears and ritual locks at the ear. The dung lies in picturesque heaps. The streets are thronged with riding and walking Russians, Roumanians, Bulgarians, and all are inspired with the same belief.

The great open place in front of the dwelling house of the Rabbi looks like a bulwark formed of wagons. Most of the vehicles are covered with street mire up to the axletree. The patiently waiting, devout crowds have taken a position before the door. They only whisper, but gesticulate so ardently that the long beards flutter. In their peculiar garbs they looked as though they just came from the forty years' march through the desert and beheld for the first time the promised land, which is flowing with milk and honey.

The ancient genuine "Wonder Rabbi" died long ago, also his son and grandson. But the power to work wonders is hereditary in his family, and Jews from near and far look up to the Wonder Rabbi who happens to exist as to a mighty and allwise magician to whom all the powers are subjected. His wives hold court, his daughters wear gold shoes. One will travel days and weeks from entire Galicia, Little Russia and Hungary in order to tell the Rabbi of his misfortune and to receive from him consolation and help.

The servant, a type of an Oriental prince, with penetrating, glowing eyes, leads us across the threshold. Properly, the Rabbi does not cast his glance upon a strange woman, he does not even stay in the same room with her. An exception was made in my case, but I was forbidden to give him my hand. And there stood the Wonder Rabbi, hardly thirty years old, a reddish blond man, with a tender white skin and anxious eyes. His stiff, dignified bearing formed a remarkable contrast to his helpless, touching embarrassment. It seemed as though something in his innermost soul was trembling and begging: O leave me in rest. When he was silent or when he spoke he acted like a frightened bird that is seeking a branch in its cage to hide itself.

The men carried on an oppressive formal conversation. I was forced into a sofa corner while the others sat in the center of the room. We stealthily looked at each other; at last I lost my patience, which I had restrained with difficulty, and began to relate how the youth in Denmark is growing up without knowing anything about anti-Semitism and how this praiseworthy ignorance has proved a blessing to the peace of the citizens. While I spoke a change came over him and he listened as though he heard a sweet distant melody which was coming nearer. The other people were forgotten; he listened and asked questions. I had to tell him everything I knew about the Polish and Russian Jews in America, of their sufferings and their prosperity, of their children and their customs. The fine red color came and went on his cheeks. When I was silent he gathered himself up with a jerk and continued his conversation with the men, in which one vied with the other in politeness.

On my way home I expressed my astonishment. How can this tactful, scrupulously virtuous and highly gifted man pose as master of wonders in our skeptical time? Then the truth was explained to me. Nobody knew what was the matter with the first Wonder Rabbi and his son, whether they believed themselves to be in possession of supernatural powers or not. There was nothing to indicate it. Apparently the first Wonder Rabbi possessed such high and cunning intelligence that the peasants of the vicinity came to him because he was wiser than "Moses and the prophets." His advice was asked in times of agricultural distress, he was consulted in regard to matrimonial alliances and sickness, and his advice proved to be good and prudent. The belief in his power to render Solomonic judgment spread over the borders of Russia, Poland and Hungary. The Wonder Rabbit became a fact. In time he increased his knowledge of human nature and extended his widely spread personal connections, and so he became almost omniscient to his oppressed coreligionists. He not only knew the characters of the individual families, but the fact also did not escape him that vice and virtue were inheritable and were transmitted by marriage to other families. It is self-understood that his power and authority rested exclusively upon the superstition which the obscurely religious, unenlightened and eternally persecuted people brought to him. And when the power to do wonders, namely the intelligence and knowledge of human nature, was bequeathed as a tradition in a straight line, it was evident that the Wonder Rabbi had trained his son or sons to enter upon the inheritance after his death. No questions were asked, just as little as an heir to a throne is asked whether he is willing to assume the burden of governing upon himself.

We again rushed through the smell of garlick and untanned skins, while the cry of "satan!" "satan!" by half-naked children sounded after us, away from Sadagora, over the River Pruth back to Czernowitz, which was resting in the quiet of the evening.—Allgemeine Zeitung des Judenthums.

OUR FRIEND? NO!

The American Hebrew, organ of the American Jewish Committee, has at last found an editorial in a sheet named the Houston Herald, which it deemed worthy of reprinting. The editorial is an attempt to belittle the Executive Committee of the Order of B'nai B'rith. It is interesting to note that the Hebrew overlooked another editorial in the same sheet, which is in part as follows:

"They" (readers of the Herald) "recall to memory that something over two years ago a Houston Jew" (editor of the Herald) "said the same thing about the abrogation of the Russian treaty—that it would arouse antagonism and injure the Jews of Russia. Thereupon the whole pack" (members of the American Jewish Committee), "led by Cyrus Sulzberger" (president of the American Hebrew) "barked at him in vicious tones."

It may be said in passing that most of the barking came from the Herald kennel.

Early in 1908, the Executive Committee of the order started a campaign against white slavers. It drafted and caused to be enacted the so-called pandering act in the State of Illinois, which was afterwards copied and enacted in other states, and led to the enactment of the so-called Mann Act by the Congress of the United States. The Executive Committee created a Committee of Fifteen in the City of Chicago, which the president of the order and a few personal friends helped to finance. Similar committees were appointed in several other cities. Care was taken to make them nonsectarian. Those committees made it their business to cause the violators of the new pandering laws to be ferreted out and punished. A number of violators of those laws, are now doing involuntary service in several penal institutions in various states. There is no doubt that there are still a number of white slavers unpunished, but they do not carry on their nefarious trade with impunity as in years gone by. In 1911, three years after the Executive Committee started on that campaign, the editor of the Herald discovered that white slavery existed. He buckled on his armor and went forth with the declared determination to wipe white slavery out of existence. He was aided by about $17,000, placed at his disposal by District Grand Lodge, No. 7. He made New York City the center for his activities. After a year's efforts he returned home with a testimonial, but without having created even a ripple on the muddy waters of white slavery. The usual fate of disappointed men overtook him. His at one time sweet disposition was completely soured. He was invited as one of the speakers at a banquet given by the B'nai B'rith lodges in the City of New Orleans. He there charged the Jews of the East Side of New York with offenses, which if believed would necessarily have the tendency to bring the Jews of the country into contempt. Those who heard the address were amazed. An effort was made by the leaders to suppress its publication, but the Houston editor furnished it to a secular paper and a copy of it was mailed to every member of Congress, thereby furnishing ammunition to those who advocated restrictive immigration measures. The president of the Order took notice of that action, and from that time on, the learned editor of the Houston Herald, proclaiming that he was prompted by motives "to expose faults, lest they destroy," belittled and ridiculed the present administration of the Order. He even allowed his unfriendliness to extend to the members of his District, who in times past have honored him.

In the Herald of July 30th, he charges that the members of District No. 7 boast of what they are doing for the New Orleans Jewish Orphan Home, when as a matter of fact, as he says, they do very little, and if anything, are a hindrance to the orphan home instead of a benefit. The members of District No. 7 need no defense at our hands. They are among the best of American Jewry. They act; they do not boast. In fact, we have even failed to hear them boast of the $17,000 which they spent on a Don Quixote crusade.

It is not in the power of the Houston Herald to injure the Order or stem its progress. The Order is more prosperous than it has been at any time during its history. The convention is the place for members to present their criticisms of the Order's policies and methods and not the newspapers. If unable there to have their own peculiar ideas adopted as the policy of the Order and unwilling to bow to the opinion of the majority as expressed by the action of the convention, they should get out of the Order. A member who belittles the administration of the Order ought not remain a member, he has not the welfare of the Order at heart, and when he pretends that in so doing he acts for the benefit of the Order, he ought to know that he will not be believed.

THE JEWISH INTEREST IN THE WAR.

In agreement with the foregoing editorial, in which we speak as American citizens, we will refrain at this moment from giving expression to our sympathies, if at all we have such. For, be it remembered that American Jewry is as composite as the nation, and that were we to align ourselves with one or the other of the belligerents we might offend a brother Jew who finds himself through early associations linked in sentiment to England or France or Germany or Austria. On the battlefields now spreading out along prodigious stretches of land and water Jewish blood is being spilt freely, and Jew is as much arrayed against Jew as is Pole against Pole and Slav against Slav and German against German, as is Protestant against Protestant and Catholic against Catholic. The head of the Catholic church died of a broken heart over the un-Christian war in which his children are engaged. If the Jews gladly and cheerfully do battle in the ranks of their compatriots, Judaism, the religion of the prophets, has an opinion of its own which no din of cannon will silence. The vision of the day when "nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more," the vision of Micah and Isaiah, it behooves the Jew to proclaim with unabated vigor and to cling to with an undying hope. Until that day has dawned, we Jews have our task still to perform—our work is yet before us. The God of battles is invoked in dome and cathedral, but He whose seal is Peace keeps His own counsel. The Shekinah mourns the agonies of His children, and the cry of the widow and fatherless ascends to His throne. Perhaps that through the battle arrays He is working out the destinies of mankind for a better and purer and loftier civilization which is yet to come. Perhaps that the fate of His people is working itself out in this terrible slaughter. Promises made in the dire moment of distress when a nation strains all its energies to fend off and to attack may not be kept in the sequel. Our Polish friends have good reason to distrust the Czar and his Grand Dukes. It is significant that no such spontaneous promise has been held out to the Russian Jew who, whether as soldier or civilian, will bear the brunt of the affray. Purishkevitch and Milyukov may grasp hands, but the Jew is forgotten. The published reports that the Jews are to be given equal rights do not inspire credence. But promise or no promise, the Jew may find salvation awaiting him when the sound of cannon is hushed. Vast upheavals will certainly follow this unheard of catastrophe. Great losses will come to our European brethren—losses of life and limb and property. There will be an army of the fatherless and dependent which we on this side of the conflict shall be called on to house and to care for. We shall have our hands full to alleviate distress. The Jewish people will be reduced in numbers. If the moment were opportune for forecasts born after all of individual preference the Jewish problem in eastern Europe might find an easy solution. But the outcome is in God's hands and will, and His will be done. Let us hope that the lot of our brethren will be ameliorated. Surely even the Czar cannot fail to see how the Jews of his realm, forgetful of grievances, despite the fact that he has seen fit to treat them as stepchildren, have cast their lot cheerfully with the serried ranks of his armies doing battle for a Slav cause. A nation thus cemented ought to withstand the agitation of the destroyers of national unity who delight in arraying race against race and class against class. We shall patiently wait for the outcome. We Jews shall likewise keep our heads cool. Vast problems await us. Let us stand united to succor and to relieve. Let us at the opportune moment make the voice of our appeal heard, the appeal for justice and humanity. Let the compact that will in the end pacify the battling nations safeguard the interests of the Jewish people. When the sword is sheathed and the sense of justice is again permitted sway, let the Jewish cause find a worthy advocate in the councils of the European nations.

STRICTEST NEUTRALITY.

There is not one among the millions dwelling in peace and security beneath the stars and stripes that has not recognized the wisdom of the President's appeal for the observation of strictest neutrality in the terrible war involving the great and the small powers of Europe and one Asiatic dominion. To be neutral is a duty obviously incumbent upon the nation, that is upon the executive branch of our government. It is an easy task on the surface only. Points of great delicacy arise which are certain to give offense in one quarter or the other and which must be handled with firmness, candor, and an even sense of justice. Overt unneutral acts can be avoided; but there are subtler actions which sometimes slip by the watchful eye of those in responsible positions, and then the mischief is done. As someone has said, to be neutral means not to be caught. Fraught as the actions of our government are with danger, the individual citizen is in ordinary circumstances assured of a wide range of freedom in his sympathies so long as they do not translate themselves into actions. But the present circumstances are by no means of the ordinary kind. We enjoy the privilege of being the only "great" power among the neutrals. Our citizens have ties of blood, language, and culture that unite them to the belligerent nations in Euorpe. A large and not uninfluential portion of our mixed population has believed itself affronted by what it thought to be the unfriendly attitude to the fatherland on the part of the English press of this country. The arraigned newspapers protested that they were not conscious of taking sides, that they printed the news available which happened to be censored or colored, and that they would have cheerfully printed news from the other side could it be obtained. The protestations must be accepted as they are given, albeit the impression that there was a lurking animus in editorial comment cannot so easily be disproved. Be that as it may. the sins of one class of Americans do not justify the offenses of another. For be it remembered that we are all American citizens, that the welfare and honor of this great land are in our keeping. that there is plenty of inflammable material amongst us from which sparks must be kept at a safe distance. The administration has behind it a record unique in the world's history of having averted a long and bloody war by the timely acquiesence in the good offices of mediating powers to the south of us We must not and shall not be entrapped by an uncautious word or act of a group of citizens. We must keep our heads cool while our hearts beat warm, while our instincts prompt us to throw the weight of our influence on the side of one or the other of the belligerents. Stupendous as the European conflagration is in its sweep, momentous as are its effects or consequences, we in this country cannot escape some of the evils which so overwhelming a catastrophe is bound to bring upon us this side of the ocean. But let us remember that Providence has at this juncture set us aside as the standard-bearer of civilization, that civilization which our ancestors and ourselves have brought over from that continent where it is now trampled under the feet of marching millions of soldiery. War is a destroyer of the finer feelings; was is brutalizing at all times But a conflict so gigantic in its dimensions which means to many a nation and power a life and death struggle for its very existence cannot fail to degrade man to depths hitherto undreamt of Let then America stand forward as the torchbearer of order and freedom and the ideals of humanitarianism. The Jews of this country cannot show their Americanism to better advantage than by merging their point of view in the larger one of America. It is a patriotic service we shall willingly perform—for we have distinct Jewish interests and a distinct point of view.

HIGH POST FOR JEWISH GENERAL.

General Valabregue has been appointed Member of the Superior Council for War, the highest military body in France. General Valabregue is at present in command of the Third Army Corps at Rouen, and is the first Jew holding such a command. He will also be the first coreligionist to have a seat on the Superior Council of National Defense, the headquarters of which are in Paris.

BANQUET TO MR. JACOB FURTH.

Mr. Jacob Furth, of St. Louis, treasurer and member of the executive committee of the order for District No. 2, was the guest of honor at a banquet given in celebration of his seventieth birthday by the lodges of the order in St. Louis on June 13, 1914.

Several hundred guests attended the banquet, among them leading members of the order, and the event was a most memorable one Deserved tribute was paid to the celebrant by various speakers for services rendered by him, not only to the order, but to Judiasm and humanity in general, extending over a period of nearly half a century. Dr. Samuel Sale acted as toastmaster, and the speakers included:

Mr. Adolf Kraus, of Chicago, President of the Order.

Dr. S. Wolfenstein, of Cleveland.

Mr. Louis S. Levi, of Cincinnati, president of the Cleveland Jewish Orphan Asylum.

Mr Sol. S. Kiser, of Indianapolis.

Dr. Leon Harrison, of St. Louis.

Judge Philip Stein, of Chicago.

Mr. Carl Vetsburg, of St. Louis.

Gifts and testimonials of various kinds were presented to Mr. Furth by the Executive Committee of the Order, District Grand Lodge No. 2, Cleveland Orphan Asylum, St. Louis B'nai B'rith Lodges and Educational Alliance of St. Louis.

A touching and most eloquent response was made by Mr. Furth, expressing thanks and appreciation for the honor conferred upon him.

In reporting the foregoing event the "American Israelite" speaks of Mr. Furth as follows:

"Mr Furth's services have been too numerous to be recounted here. He has friends by the thousands all over the country and is one of the conspicuous figures in American Jewish history. He has reached the Biblical age of three score and ten, and like Moses, 'his eye is not dim, nor his vigor impaired.' It is to be hoped for the good of the cause that he will so continue for many years to come for he is one of those who could illy be spared and whom it would be almost impossible to replace."

The "American Hebrew" had the following editorial and comment:

"Mr. Jacob Furth, of St. Louis, is entitled to our congratulations. Last week his friends celebrated his seventieth anniversary, and he was the recipient of many good wishes. Mr. Furth is one of the ablest men of western Jewry. In B'nai B'rith circles he is a sagacious adviser, having served for many years as national treasurer. With the late Leo N. Levi, he inaugurated the new era in that order, which is now prospering with a new lease of life, finding itself after its disastrous experience with an ineffectual insurance system. In the affairs of the Cleveland Jewish Orphan Asylum, Mr. Furth was also an active director. He is a man with broad views and strong Jewish feeling. He has our best wishes on his anniversary May he have many happy returns of the day."

DINNER IN HONOR OF MR. CHARLES L. AARONS.

The Central B'nai B'rith Council of Milwaukee acted as sponsor to a dinner given in honor of Mr. Chas. L. Aarons of Milwaukee, the newly elected president of District Grand Lodge, No. 6. In addition to the members of the Council a large number of personal friends, members of the order, were present. The affair was held at the Hotel Wisconsin. Addresses were delivered by Messrs. A. B. Seelenfreund, secretary of the Grand Lodge; Israel Cowen, past president of the District Grand Lodge; Rabbi Chas. S. Levi, Benj. Poss, A. W. Rich and B. Brachman. Mr. Aarons made a fitting response to the laudatory remarks of the speakers.

AN APPRECIATION.

We quote from the message of the president, Dr. Moses J. Gries, to the central conference of American Rabbis at its twenty-fifth anniversary, held in Detroit on June 30, 1914:

"The rabbis of the conference, individually, have lent their influence to the noble work of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith. We welcome the new Anti-Defamation League and its vigorous activity against defamers and slanderers of the Jewish name and honor. May we not find a way to co-operate with the B'nai B'rith in its plans proposed on behalf of the defectives and delinquents and dependents?"

MRS. WOODROW WILSON.

A Tribute by Hon. Simon Wolf.

On the occasion of religious services conducted by Rev. Dr. I. Silverman at the Fabyan House, White Mountains of New Hampshire, on August 8, 1914, Hon. Simon Wolf gave expression to the following tribute:

"On this sacred day dedicated to religious thought, it is most fitting that as loyal, patriotic citizens, we evidence our sincere sympathy to the Chief Magistrate of the Nation; his loss is irreparable, and all the people, not only of the Republic, but of the world, extend to him the hand and heart of good will and condolence. In the fifty-two years I have lived in Washington I have known every woman who presided in the White House, and none of them, Mrs. Cleveland not excepted, surpassed Mrs. Wilson in the graces and virtues of true womanhood. By birth and environments an aristocrat, she was sincerely democratic in her tastes and domestic life, cognizant and appreciative of the dignified and exalted position she occupied, she was nevertheless enlisted in all the works that ennoble and uplift humanity, not enamored of giddy society, not a faddist, a suffragette or seeking excitement through modern dancing. She had a glorious ambition to be helpful, to bring sunshine, cheer and cleanliness into the homes of the lowly, the helpless and poverty stricken, her entire spare time was devoted to measures of relief, and no more fitting epitaph can be written than the final passage of the bill cleaning the alleys and slums of the Nation's Capitol, whose consummation was her heart's concern. A woman whose highest thought was her husband's welfare; how touching and beautiful her constant request that the President should not know how ill she was; patient, self-sacrificing, the angel smile on her lips, she passed from the shore of Life to the Port of Eternal Joy and Reward, side by side in devotion and sacrifice. She stands in the Walhalla of fame with our sainted Mrs. Isidore Straus. In the midst of a gigantic world struggle, in an age more or less materialistic, it is refreshing to find a representative woman, whose idealism is inspiring, whose example is a spur for emulation, whose memory is embalmed in the nation's curriculum. The domestic life of the Wilson family bore evidence of simplicity, added to culture and refinement was the thoughtfulness for the comfort and hospitable welcome to the stranger at their gate. The nation of progress needs such homes, cherishes such womanhood. Let us while capable of doing good work while appreciating the virtues and worth of our dear ones, remember the beautiful words of the poet, Freiligrath:

" 'Lieb so lang du lieben kannst
Lieb so lang du lieben magst,
Die Stunde kommt, die Stunde kommt
Wo du an Graebern stehst und klagst.'

" 'Love as long as love you can,
Love as long as love you may,
The hour will come, the hour must come
When you at the grave, will stand and say"

"Out of the great sorrows, great happiness may come; the divine will is inscrutible; the greatest tribute to the life work of the sainted dead, may be the trumpet call for womanhood to be true to the ancient trust reposed in her, and that the homes of the nation will be purified and sanctified by the glorious example left us as a legacy and inheritance, for all time to come."

MITIGATION FOR RUSSIAN JEWS.

The Russian newspapers report that the ministerial council of Russia is now considering a proposition for the mitigation of the Jewish conditions. It is known that shortly before his death Stolypin issued an order that all Jews who had already settled outside of the pale of residence in 1886, as well as those who took part as fighting soldiers in the last war against Japan, may live anywhere in Russia. After the death of Stolypin the order was set aside. It now seems that the intention exists to revive the politics of Stolypin and to extend the right of Jewish domicile. But it is very questionable whether the prime minister, who is an outspoken anti-Semite, will permit even the slightest mitigation for the Jews. Alas, the last months have shown a steady increase in the field of Jewish persecutions and the faith is missing that these politics will be discontinued.

EX-PRESIDENT TAFT ATTENDS BANQUET OF MENORAH SOCIETY.

The Yale Menorah Society gave a banquet recently at Hotel Taft, New Haven, Conn., to its members and guests. Among the speakers were Professors Taft, Berden and Clay. Professor William H. Taft, Ex-President of the United States, spoke as follows:

"I begin to feel as if I were almost a rabbi since not long ago I attended the peace services at the Free synagogue and was very much interested. Let me say that I regard this society with a great deal of interest. I do not know that I would have been so fifty years ago; but the present time shows the various denominations working together harmoniously and leaves nothing to fear from the possible narrowing effects of such an organization.

"This society is to study Judiasm; you are to possess yourselves of the spirit that has made Judiasm so large a force in the world to strike earth again like Antaeus and get renewed zeal for effective ideals that shall work for the betterment of humanity. You have such an ancient source that I am surprised you do not mention it more often; it makes us feel almost parvenus when we consider what comparative newcomers we are. You have shown that it is the hard path beset with obstacles that leads upwards. Let not ease and comfort soften the fibre that has made you so powerful a force. I congratulate you and wish you success in keeping up your ideals."

GREEK POLITICS IN SALONIKA.

The immigration of the Jews from Salonika has lately been somewhat abated. The Greeks seem to have become gradually aware of the fact that it would be a misfortune for the old commercial city of Salonika if the Jews, who form the principal element, were to leave the city. The governor of Macedonia has recently expressed his wish to the Chief Rabbi of Salonika to come into closer contact with the accredited leaders of the Jews. This wish was complied with and the Chief Rabbi appeared with the Jewish leaders before the governor. The government official received them very cordially and expressed his regret over the hostile agitation in the Greek press. He assured them that in the interest of the country the government wishes to subdue all animosity. It desires that the Jews should feel themselves well satisfied under the new regime and should contribute to the welfare of the fatherland. This address made a very good impression upon the representatives of the Jews and they assured the governor that the Jews entertain the fervent wish to live in peace with the Greeks.

The incident will be greeted with joy as a symptom of the change in Greek politics. But it is very questionable whether the government will be strong enough to subdue the dangerous policy of the Greek press, which has already done much mischief. Words alone will do no good. What is needed is an energetic determination which shall eliminate with a strong hand all obstacles from the path of a healthy development.

AUTONOMY FOR HUNGARIAN JEWS.

During the coming month a congress, consisting of representatives of all Jewish communities in Hungary, will be held to take steps for the protection of constitutional rights of the Hungarian Jews. It is exected that the congress will pave the way for an agreement as to the methods which are best to carry autonomy into effect.

The ministry of public worship and education have been called upon for aid in this movement, and in reply to a petition to that end the ministers stated that the settlement of the question of Jewish autonomy would be of much interest, also to the government.

CHIEF RABBINATE OF SALONIKA ABOLISHED.

The last vestige of Jewish independence in the important Jewish community of Salonika has been wiped out recently by the abolition of the office of Hacham Bashi there. The Salonika Jewish community will henceforth become dependent on the chief rabbinate of Athens, an office which is still in its infancy. The migration of the Jews from Salonika is still continuing and this latest move on the part of the Greek authorities will probably drive many Jews to seek a home elsewhere. Rabbi Jacob Meir, the well-known Hacham Bashi, of Salonika, will probably take up his permanent abode in Jerusalem.

EMANCIPATION OF JEWS IN ROUMANIA.

On June 14th last a convention of delegates of all the local committees of the Union of Native Jews of Roumania was held in Bucharest to consider what action should be taken to influence both the Constituent Assembly and also public opinion in favor of the emancipation of the Jews. At the close of the conference a report was given to the press of which the following are the principal passages:

The Union will organize a monster petition, will hold meetings at a convenient time, and during the sittings of the Constituent Assembly will distribute throughout the country appeals and pamphlets in hundreds of thousands of copies, and will convene at Bucharest a meeting of Jews who were mobilized in the army during the war, with the view of protesting against the injustice done to them and of testifying their solidarity with the native Jews in the fight for emancipation.

The Conference decided to adopt measures so that the political demonstrations of the native Jewish population on the occasion of this fight, shall be of such a nature as to convince the public that the injustice which is being done to us is unmerited and cannot be continued any longer.

The Conference appeals to the Press and to Roumanian citizens to support these steps, for it cannot be to the interests of the country, either from the moral or the national point of view, that a part of the indigenous population which has proved that it is Roumanian and is worthy of being recognized as Roumanian by law, should exist in a state of political and economic slavery

THE CEDARS OF LEBANON.

It fills the mind with sadness to hear that these trees, around which legend wove its golden threads, have nearly died out in their Palestinian home. An American traveler, John D. Whiting, tells how the plateaus and slopes upon which mighty woods of cedars once swayed and rustled in the breeze are today waste and desolate. Only a little grove with a group of about 400 trees which have been protected by a stone wall against the gnawing of the goats remains upon the slopes of the Dshebel el Aretz, the "Cedar Hill," near the village of Bsherreh. The oldest trees of this last cedar grove reach to a height of 27 meters. The circumference at the stem of the highest tree is 15 meters. It may be assumed that some of these giant trees are more than a thousand years old

DINA DEMALKUTA.

The "Univers Israelite" reports the following incident from Salonika: In harmony with the Talmudic principle, according to which the law of the land in which we dwell is also our law, the Chief Rabbi, Jacob Meier, has exempted all the Jews who are employed on barges and wagons in Salonika from the duty of abstaining from work from the fifth to the eight of Sivan, so that they could give their indispensable aid to the thousands of Greeks who were driven out from Turkey, and are arriving daily in Salonika destitute and deprived of nearly everything they possessed. In sacrificing their rest for the sake of ameliorating the distress of so many unfortunates our coreligionists in Salonika, whose own condition in these very critical times is so very deplorable, have done something exceedingly good. It is highly interesting to see how these Jews transport for ridiculously low pay the heavy packs and the tired women and children of these poor people over rugged and steep paths from Salonika to distant places, and how these wornout Jews return exhausted to Salonika where an uncertain fate awaits them They stand between the fighting Turks and Greeks, between the cross and the crescent, their future is unsafe and they may at any time be forced themselves to grasp the wandering-staff, yet they are ready to give their feeble help to the Greek refugees.

RESTRICTION DISCOURAGES CONVERSION.

A new restriction issued by Minister of Education Kasso will be a great blow to the many Jewish students who embrace the orthodox religion so as to be admitted in the Universities. The new law provides that students who adopt Christianity should not be admitted to the Universities unless their parents also become converts to the dominant faith This is explained as a precaution against the bona fide intention of these converts.

SINS OF NATIONS

By Dr. Max L. Margolis

Written for the B'nai B'rith News.

In that grandiose opening of the prophecy of the shepherd of Tekoa, the preamble to the great arraignment of the prophet's own divided nation, six Syro-Palestinian powers are made the target of the moralist's invective. Universalist they call him, precursor of the teacher who in later days taught a band of Jews to disown the prerogatives of their little nation. It may be taken for granted that Amos loved his people dearly, though in the onesided accentuation of justice he overlooked the complement of divine grace, the vision of which opened itself up to the tenderer soul of his northern compatriot, Hosea. Morals are not morals if they do not apply generally, universally. There is no favoritism when right is trampled under foot and might insolently usurps the seat of honor. Wrong is wrong, whether committed by foe or friend. Moab is scathingly denounced, though the victim of his barbarous act was the King of Edom, Israel's arch enemy. And so we may discount the prophet's self-interest when he upbraids some of the other powers for acts perpetrated on Israel. Warfare was no more barbarous then than it is to-day. It is true the slave trade no more exists among civilized nations. But tales are being spread of prisoners treated inhumanely, and in the internecine warfare between races we have heard of cruelties which were in antiquity the pastime of warring soldiery. What transcends the comprehension of the simple-minded child of the desert is that nations should make war upon one another "that they might enlarge their border." Territorial aggrandizement we call it to-day. It is one of the most prevalent sins of the nations of modern times. It is dignified by the name of imperialism, the white man's burden, and what not. The powerful nations speak insolently to the little nationalities, and for trivial causes—pretexts they usually are—an army of occupation swoops down upon a neighbor, and a period of political enslavement ensues.

While religion proclaims the gospel of universalism, the nations are pursuing particularistic policies which border upon selfishness. The dominant race imposes upon the aliens within its borders its language and culture. It is a strange contradiction that the most chauvinistic nations are the most imperialistic. It is clearly impossible for the modern state so to be constituted as to exclude races not kindred. The partition of Poland was effected by the three bordering states, with two of which at least the principle of nationalism is carried to excess. Autonomy was wrested from Poland and Finland by the Russian bear. The Germanization of the Province of Posen was attempted, but little success marked the onslaught against the holiest possession of the subdued race. The dual monarchy is a conglomerate of warring races; here the national principle has broken down completely. The hydra of anti-Semitism raised its head in the Teutonic empire of Bismarckian policies; France, recreant to the ideals of the great revolution, nurtured that ugly beast; philosophic in western Europe, it was translated into bloody pogroms in the East; even England proceeded to discriminate against the alien Jew. Europe is rent asunder by racial antipathies. It is harvesting now the seed of hatred between race and race. It is the principle of nationalism in unholy alliance with imperialism that is breaking down completely in these days. You cannot enlarge your territory without taking in alien races which refuse to be absorbed. A new principle which shall mean not enslavement of races, but the federation of nationalities, the great and the small, each living its own life, each speaking its own tongue, each worshiping its God in its own way, a principle which will make for unimperialistic nationalism is forming in the furnace of the European conflagration. What we have achieved this side of the Atlantic remains to be imitated beyond the ocean. Europe will be at rest when it ceases to grasp and grab, when the land hunger will be appeased at last because men will recognize the ills of territorial aggrandizement, the [illegible] of [illegible] war that the border may be enlarged.

[illegible] would persuade us that all wars, ancient and modern, are rooted in economic grounds. It is not the land hunger, but the greed for trade, for commercial supremacy, for the markets of the world. The modern world and modern statecraft are grappling with the phenomenon of commercial warfare which is international. The laissez faire policy of the middle of the last century has given way to the socialized state. Everywhere the state is proceeding to legislate monopolies out of existence. The rights of the individual are proclaimed to be secondary to the supreme rights of the corporate society. A distinction has been made between legitimate and illegitimate corporation. For a corporation, unless it is state-owned, is but a larger and more formidable individual whose greed must be curbed and whose powers for throttling competition must be held in check. State ownership is downright socialism, but state control is the next step to it. Cornering the market is a sin. Not from any materialistic conception of society. The protection of the weak against the strong receives its sanction from an appeal to the old verities which we were taught had almost been discarded. Across the ages the voice of Israel's prophet rings in our ears which is the gospel of the poor against the rich. Mightier than the sword is the pen, Mightier than the battle cries of warring society is the still, small voice of righteous indignation against them that barter away their soul for dividends and rebates and ill-gotten wealth. Success unless righteously achieved is a sin. The modern watchwords are false; the eternal command alone is true, Thou shalt not steal.

If the greed of corporations within the state bids fair to be curbed by the machinery of national government that bases itself upon the Decalogue and the Golden Rule, international competition is still at the root of the warfare among nations. It were idle to ignore the instinctive antipathies of race against race. Slav and Teuton are not compatible. And were it simply a question of race, I am free to confess that my own sympathies are on the side of the Teuton. It is true the Teuton has been overweening, arrogant. But his culture is the higher, the more valuable. With the hordes of the Czar triumphant, civilization will retrograde. We Jews have suffered at the hands of Germany, but we have suffered vastly more under the ruthless rod of the Muscovite empire. Pogroms and ritual murder trials are too fresh in our memories. But the war of the nations is racial and cultural only to a certain extent. It is much less noble. It is the ignoble ship of commercial rivalry. It is a struggle for the conquest of the routes of commerce. Not because England loves Russia or even France, has Albion abandoned her traditional isolation and horror of entangling alliances. England is making war upon Germany's commercial aspirations. What the outcome will be none can foretell. But here again the international competition carried on ruthlessly and bitterly is not a whit more sacred than the intranational variety. It is a sin, pure and simple. Here again the principle of national isolation and of national commercial aggrandizement is as shortsighted as it is immoral. The federative principle must come into play, the principle which is animated by the concept, live and let live. It must win the day against that besetting sin of greed, of the greed which stalks behind the roar of cannon and which has for its watchword, kill or you will be killed.

There is no cause for despondency. The hordes of Gog and Magog must precede the advent of that kingdom of righteousness and peace which it is the everlasting pride of the Jewish prophets to have proclaimed at a time which was no more propitious than are the gloomy days which we are witnessing now. That kingdom of federated humanity will come though it be delayed. The allies of to-day will be the foes of to-morrow. Perils of all kinds are ahead for Europe. Western Europe will unite some day to crush Muscovite barbarism, or that barbarism will have passed away before an era of enlightenment and broader humanitarian views. And Europe and America may be called upon to drive away a common foe whose religion is a heathenish superstition under the veneer of European culture superficially imitated. And we may close this homily after the traditional manner with the formula, And may the redeemer come to Zion. Out and above the clash of national competition there shall come the kingdom of universal peace, whose roots are sunk in the soil of the mountain of the house of the Lord, when war shall be at an end and all mankind be turned to the one God, the God of Israel.

Convention of District Grand Lodge No. 2

The 62d Annual Convention of District Grand Lodge No. 2 was held at Toledo, Ohio, on June 7th, 8th and 9th, 1914. There were more than ninety delegates and Past Grand Presidents in attendance, representing a membership of over five thousand. A large number of the delegates were accompanied by their ladies.

The convention was called to order by President Harry Simon, Rabbi David Alexander, of Toledo, made the opening prayer. Governor Cox, of Ohio, who was to have delivered the address of welcome on behalf of the State was unable to attend. Mr. W. H. Diemer, President of the Komos Club, substituted for him. Mr. I. Silverman, President of the Toledo Lodge, welcomed the convention on behalf of the lodge. President Simon made a fitting response to the welcome address.

After the convention was fully organized, President Simon read his message which was a resume of the activities of the District and the Order during the past year.

A feature of the convention session was a report of the social service committee, headed by Mr. Jacob Billikopf. This report showed a great deal of work accomplished by the committee and was very gratifying from the standpoint of the number of Jewish inmates in the various penal and eleemosynary institutions.

Another interesting report of the Sunday session was by Mr. David Bressler, of New York, Manager of the Industrial Removal Office, wherein, after citing statistics showing the scope of the work, presented arguments for distribution instead of restriction of emigrants.

During the afternoon the visiting ladies were entertained by a sight seeing tour of the city in autos.

The Sunday evening feature was a reception at the Conservatory of Music, followed by dancing.

The Monday morning session was taken up by presentation of boards of officers and standing committees.

A resolution was adopted to present to Mr. Jacob Furth, on the occasion of his seventieth birthday anniversary, with a memorial made especially by the Bezaled School, as a token and testimonial of the esteem in which Mr. Furth is held by the members of the Grand Lodge. The convention also listened to two interesting addresses, one by Judge Fred S. Spiegel, Mayor of Cincinnati, and the other by Dr. E. N. Calish of Richmond, Virginia, a member of the Executive Committee of the Order of District No. 5. Mayor Spiegel spoke on B'nai B'rith in its relation to Zionism, while Rabbi Calish devoted his address to the aims and objects of the Order.

Monday session of the convention was given over to routine business.

One of the subject matters which called forth an animated discussion was the resolution concerning the age limit of eligiblity to membership in the Order. After a heated debate, the recommendation of the majority of the committee recommending the adoption of a resolution reducing the age limit to eighteen years was rejected by a large majority.

An important incident of the convention on Monday afternoon, was the adoption of a resolution commending the views taken by the President of the United States on the question of a literacy test for emigrants. The resolution urges that the gates of this country remain wide open to all who flee from religious persecution and, further recommends that the Government take up the work of proper distribution of the emigrants.

During Monday afternoon the visiting ladies were entertained at the Progress Club with a musical and in the evening the delegates and ladies enjoyed a moonlight ride on the Steamer Owana

The sessions on Tuesday were devoted mostly to routine matters and the presentation of and action on reports of the various convention committees In the afternoon the election of officers was held and resulted as follows:

Officers.—President, Joseph S. Kornfeld, Columbus; First Vice-president S. J. Kornhauser, Cleveland; Second Vice-president, Karl M. Vetsburg, St. Louis; Secretary, Victor Abraham, Cincinnati; Treasurer, William Ornstein Cincinnati.

Representatives to Constitution Grand Lodge Meeting at San Francisco, Cal., in May, 1915.—Indianapolis, Sol. S. Kiser. St. Louis, Harry Simon, Jacob Furth, Emil Mayer. Columbus, Joseph Kornfeld. Cincinnati, Victor Abraham, Alfred M. Cohen, William Ornstein. Toledo, David Alexander. Denver, Milton Anfenger, Meyer Friedman. Kansas City, Jacob Lorie, Leon Block. Cleveland, S. Wolfenstein, A. Lewenthal, Martin A. Marks, Max E. Meisel. Louisville, Joseph Myers

General Committee.—L. J. Borinstein, Simon Lazarus, Jacob L. Lorie, Moses Schwab, Louis Bernstein, Joseph M. Michaels.

District Court.—Alfred M. Cohen, Nathan Drucker, Shepard R. Evans, A. Biccard, Harry Levison.

The next convention of the District Grand Lodge will be held in 1915, at Columbus, Ohio.

On Tuesday afternoon the visiting ladies were entertained by a trolly ride around Maumee Valley, and a luncheon upon their return, at the Woman's building.

LADIES' AUXILIARIES

By Eliot M. Epsteen of San Francisco

The subject of Ladies' Auxiliaries to the Order of B'nai B'rith demands serious attention. They are no longer in the experimental stage. San Francisco has three such successful organizations. The requirements for membership generally are that the men must belong to the Order of B'nai B'rith, and any woman of the Jewish faith is eligible.

Auxiliaries are forming in other places upon the Pacific Coast. The membership roll of each is large. The meetings are more than well attended. They have become an active, potential factor, capable of the accomplishment of much practical good.

In years gone by, auxiliaries were formed, flourished for a time, then disbanded, leaving no cause of the failure. This lesson should be heeded. The ladies' organizations of today are stronger than any of the past. They have been accorded official recognition by the Grand Lodge of this district.

The cause of the failure of the past has been the lack of some plan of effort, upon practical lines along which to work. There is today, as there was then, no general plan of organization; each auxiliary is now, as then, a separate and distinct entity, sovereign in everything. Each auxiliary today has different membership requirements. Each has different modes of procedure; no general ritual of initiation is recognized, and, of far greater importance, none has given itself anything material or practical to do. As a mere social organization, it cannot endure, and the prophecy serious and substantial work is allotted to them, all these auxiliaries, like their predecessors of the past, will die untimely and unnatural deaths.

The Grand Lodge of the district, in a measure, has recognized this condition, and, in a feeble way, has endeavored to remedy it. A deputy to the auxiliaries has been appointed; also a Grand Lodge committee to Ladies' Auxiliaries, high-flown titles, whose members so far have distinguished themselves by doing nothing.

The condition, then, presents itself: Here are strong, well attended, active institutions, which have allied themselves with the Order of B'nai B'rith. They are composed of the younger set of the community. They constitute an active, enthusiastic, potential factor, capable of and willing to do good work along the lines of general Jewish uplift. They constitute, at present, a disorganized band of well-meaning and striving Jews and Jewesses. There should be unanimity in their work; there should be a parent organization, with sovereignty over them, to direct and inspire them to greater efforts. The Grand Lodge of the district is the only logical place where this can be done. The Constitution Grand Lodge of the order meets in San Francisco in 1915. There should be presented the effort to enfranchise these auxiliaries. There should be made the fight to give them full representation in the Grand Lodge of the district.

Unless immediate and proper steps are quickly taken to conserve and foster this powerful factor for good, these Ladies' Auxiliaries, the Order of B'nai B'rith bids fair to lose the greatest element it has acquired in its history for the advancement of the order, and for the betterment of our people.

NEWS FROM LONDON

BY OUR CORRESPONDENT DR. M. EPSTEIN

London, August, 1914.

"O God! that whole damned war business. Sherman said, 'War is Hell.' So it is. Any honest man says so—hates war, fighting, blood-letting. I was in the midst of it all—saw war where war is worst—not on the battlefields, no—in the hospitals: there war is worst: there I mixed with it: and now I say, God damn the wars—all wars: God damn every war: God damn 'em! God damn 'em!"

Probably my readers know these words; they are from Walt Whitman's Conversations with Mr. Traubel. In our heart of hearts we all feel some such sentiment as that. Be the cause righteous, be the appeal to force never so needful, be the diplomacy that preceded as well meaning as you like, the fact remains that the black cloud of war is over the whole of Western Europe. Countries that but yesterday were cultivating the arts of peace are now at each other's throats, and the simple-minded peasants of many a Belgian village see the August sun go down in blood. "The Angel of Death is abroad in the land; we may almost hear the beating of his wings." And why? The whole trend of modern democracy is for peace among nations. It cannot therefore be the wish of the people. No. There is only one possible answer. The interests of crowned heads, the pride and ambition of all-powerful monarchs who claim to wear their crowns by the grace of God—there's the enemy. Here he is called Czar; there Kaiser. But always he stands for unlimited monarchy; always he is a type of a mediæval institution that is bound sooner or later to be swept away. Possibly that may be one of the good things that the war will bring.

Meanwhile the war and war news occupy men's minds to the exclusion of pretty much all else. And what is true of the general community holds good for Jews also. We hear little of communal activities. True that in the month of August communal activities are at their lowest ebb. But unless the war is over fairly soon, nothing is likely to be taken up. For one thing, a good many businesses have been severely hit. The Stock Exchange is closed; financial and industrial undertakings are exceedingly limited, compared to the volume of trade in normal time. The old economic equilibrium has been disturbed and it will take some time before a new one is established. Hence a good number of Jews, in common with very many of their fellow citizens in England, have small inclination to think of anything but their daily bread. When the war is over there is little doubt that an improvement will set in. But the waiting till then is irksome.

As is generally known, there is a large number of German Jew residents in this country, more especially in London. Some, though they have been here a score of years and more, have not been naturalized. Hence, technically they are regarded as "alien enemies," and as such have to be registered and are subject to certain minor disabilities, such as having to report themselves to the police every three weeks, or being limited to a radius of five miles from their homes, beyond which they are not allowed to travel without special permission. As one can easily imagine, some people with German sounding names are a little nervous. Those who are acquainted with the English character know but too well that such fear is childish. All the same a goodly number of persons of German origin, who are now British subjects, are changing their names to such as have an Anglo-Saxon ring about them. Thus, Hoffman becomes Codrington, Schloss becomes Castle, Gunzenhauser becomes Gee, Schacht becomes Dent, Rosenzweig becomes Rose and Lange becomes Lang. It is one of the humors of the situation; but will anyone condemn these men; Perhaps the acme of the fun is exemplified in a notice in a London barber's window: "This is a Ingelische Shopp."

* * * * *

What of the Jews in other lands? In France, in Germany, in Austria-Hungary and in Russia we know that they are fighting in their country's cause. It is a pity too deep for words that Jew should be forced to kill Jew, but it is only part of the greater tragedy that the German should be forced to kill the Frenchman or the Russian the German. It proves that the peace-ideal receives merely lip-worship in European civilization. As Jews we must deplore this. We have recently been reading the report of the Carnegie Commission to inquire into the Balkan Wars. The details given by this trustworthy document are sickening in their brutality. We deplore them as human beings; we specially deplore them as Jews. Will the present European war be different? The degree may vary; the thing is the same. Shall we not hear of pillage and slaughter and worse? Of lies and tricks and deceit? Of the basest elements in human nature? In the light of this thought, what are we to say of the news which has come to hand this morning, via Paris, that the Czar is very shortly to sign a proclamation giving to the Jews in his dominions equal civil and political rights with his other subjects? Are the people that have dwelt in darkness to see a great light? Are the Jews in Russia to be set free? It sounds too good to be true. It may be only one more of the baits held out to oppressed peoples as a bid for their continued allegiance. The Poles have been given specious promises; the vision of a united Poland has been dangled before their eyes by the Russian Commander-in-Chief. Who knows? It may be. But one feels in such a case that seeing is believing. As the candidate for parliamentary honors promises much and recklessly at election times and does little once he is in the Legislature, so the general of armies about to begin operations, or even the Government whose servant he is, feels moved to be generous in pledges. We can understand it. But we Jews have been tricked too often not to have become a little suspicious of these wordy extravagances. The treaty of Berlin gave the Roumanian Jews, for instance, definite promises of civil and religious equality—promises that were solemnly signed and sealed. Were those promises kept? And when the Treaty of London was about to settle the political fate of many communities in the Balkans, what did M. Take Jonescu, the Roumanian Foreign Minister, say? He gave a written declaration that those Bulgarian Jews who were to become subjects of King Charles should lose not one jot of their existing liberties. What became of that promise? Were the words translated into action?

So in the same way, the new Russian edict may not be worth the paper it is written on. We need hardly say that we hope and pray that it will be carried out. Perhaps the spirit of liberty, which is known more or less intimately in Western Europe and America, is spreading to Eastern Europe, too. Perhaps toleration and justice may become realities in the land wich only a month or two ago was at the feet of Rasputin, a sort of twentieth century Cagliostro. But it all depends on so many circumstances. Will Russia be victorious? If she is, possibly the promise may become a reality. If she is not, what will the promise be worth? Or, say there is a revolution in Russia if she is not victorious? Or, again, suppose Russia has to fight an alliance of the states of Western Europe when the present war is ended? Will the Russian Jews still be in possession of their "equal civil and political rights?" If only it turned out a lasting reality! It would solve many a big problem. It would open a new page in Jewish history.

And will the German Jew be any better off after the war? On paper our German brethren have long enjoyed absolute equality as citizens. But as a matter of fact, as everybody knows, they have had to swallow many a rebuff. It is of no great consequence, to be sure, that Jews may not become officers in the German Army. But as a matter of principle and of right, their exclusion is unjust and intolerable. The same applies to their exclusion from the University Senates. A Jewish ordinarius is a rare bird in Germany; possibly just one degree rarer than a Jewish High School teacher. Not that the capacity is lacking. Only the Jewishness stands in the way. It may be that German Chauvinism (as also its French sister) will learn a lesson in the war. It does not require an extreme optimist to realize that the shaking-up which all the countries in Western Europe have just received is bound, in the long run, to bring great changes. And they will be changes for the better—for more liberty and equality and justice. If this prophecy comes true, the Jews in Western Europe will at least cease dreaming of these elementary rights. They will possess them.

It is not too early, even at this stage, to begin thinking of the Treaty which will settle the destinies of nations afresh and make a new map of Europe. Many questions will have to be decided. Let us see to it that the Jewish question is not neglected. This is the first occasion in the world's history when Jews may claim as a right that they should be heard. The teaching of Rousseau and Voltaire has done its work, and the Jew may come to the bar of "history in the making" and demand his rights as a man and as a citizen. Not favors he asks for; not special treatment, not exceptional legislation. He wants justice—no more. And if the Great Powers show the way, the lesser Powers will follow suit. If Russia and Germany agree to give justice to the Jew, Roumania and Greece will not dare to do less. The coming Treaty of Peace (it must come soon or late: God grant it come soon) ought therefore to find the Jews prepared for their request. The Jews in the countries affected by the present war may be too exhausted to prepare their case. But the Jews in those lands untouched by the conflict must help by clear thinking. Foremost stand our co-religiionists in America When it was a question of a just cause, they have been first in the field before now. We are certain they will not fail on this occasion. It is not only the Jewish cause, though Jews be involved. It is the cause of humanity, a cause very fitting to be supported by citizens of a great civilizing state which as early as 1776 adopted the Declaration of Independence.

It is interesting to speculate whether the present European war will be a turning point in the recent history of small nationalities. Two generations ago, the world was all for cosmopolitanism. We got a universal language. We read cosmopolitan monthlies. We started the Peace Movement. But somehow all this did not last long. National sentiment would not be crushed. We saw it in Macedonia, in Greece, in Bulgaria and Servia, and in the Hapsburg monarchy. But we saw it also in the growth of Welsh and Irish national feeling. We heard of Irish universities, of the Irish theater and of Mr. Synge; we saw the foundation of the Welsh National Library and Museum and we noted a great revival of Celtic. Side by side with all this, we also observed the rise of Jewish Nationalism. Was this a mere accident or was it a movement parallel to the others? Who shall say? Certain it is, however, that Zionism has grown along with Pan-Slavism and Pan-Germanism—or was it because of these? Into all this growth comes the war. Nay, its very origin was rooted in the clash of nationalities. Because the Slav would have none of the German yoke, Austria must needs fight with Servia, and so draw in Russia, Servia's big brother. Whereupon Germany flew to the rescue of its ally and attacked France by way of Belgium, thus involving Great Britian. That is the pother in a nutshell. Now comes the question. Will this nationalism disgust us with its pettiness and spite, and so prepare the way for that new universalism of which Tennyson wrote—"the Parliament of Man, the Federation of the World?" Or will its nobler aspects win the day and divide Europe on a racial or national basis, so far as that is possible? It is an exceedingly interesting question. In either event the Jew will be affected, for, as somebody once said, the Jew is like the chameleon. If nationalism survives the present war and triumphs, Zionism will find an accretion of strength that may surprise even itself. If, on the other hand, the European nations realize that their common humanity is what matters most in life and so open a new era for a more lasting universalism, is it not most likely that Zionism will fizzle out, an interesting and useful interlude in Jewish history? No one will gainsay that the problem is worth cogitating upon. But in any event, the solution will not become apparent for a generation or so.

* * * * *

In the meantime the Present is with us, and we must chronicle one or two matters of interest that occured just at the close of the season and before the war broke out. For the first time in its life, the Jewish Historical Society of England has elected a non-Jew to be its President. The compliment has been paid to the Rev. Dr. H. P. Stokes, of Cambridge, who has certainly deserved well of Anglo-Jewish History. His latest book ("Studies in Anglo-Jewish History") is a fine piece of work and marks out the author at once as well qualified for the position of President of the Jewish Historical Society of England. Dr. Stokes would like to see more work in Anglo-Jewish research undertaken and those who know him are agreed that he will give an impetus to it. In connection with the Historical Society it should be mentioned that last month we heard some very good accounts of your fine Chatauqua and University Extension movements from the two men who run them in America, Drs. Berkowitz and Rosenau, recently honored and welcomed guests in our midst. Whenever distinguished American Jews come over here we always wish that we had more of them; and time and again we have personally longed for an interchange between English and American Jewry of workers and teachers, of scholars and preachers, of men and women of all sorts. Both sides would gain in the process. Nay, more. It might even be extended to Jews of other countries. The fact is we do not know as much as we might about our brethren in other lands. The Order might with advantage set the work going, and possibly the First Lodge of England might be a convenient clearing house.

* * * * *

If such a scheme were carried out, some of the pettinesses which from time to time come to the surface in our communal life like so many ugly pimples would soon disappear. We should be ashamed of them before visitors from abroad, and rise to the best within us. Recently we have witnessed one such incident at our training college for ministers which seems to have become a veritable College of Unreason. It all arose out of the question as to who should teach Homiletics. No great matter, you will say, and you would be right. But this insignificant cause produced much bitterness in people whom one looked up to, and who ought to know better; and worse than all, these same people showed their bitterness, venting their spite on the pate of others. One is ashamed to have to relate this unseemliness, but here, at the time, it was the great topic of conversation and nearly wrecked the existence of Jews' College. Happily all is well again, though the personal feeling is not abated

* * * * *

Two gatherings were recently held in London which merit some attention from thoughtful people. The one was the Conference of Anglo-Jewish ministers; the other was a mass meeting of the Agudas Yisrael. The first was local in its appeal; the second said its appeal was universal. And both ended in nothing very much. Clearly the Conference of Anglo-Jewish ministers is a poor imitation of the Conference of American Rabbis. Like the Agudas Yisrael meeting, the conference lacked definiteness. It wanted to set the tone in religious thought and aspiration, but it could not forget that it was a Trade Union. In saying this no blame is necessarily attached to the ministers or their conference. Both are the results of the peculiar environment here, which we all hope will be gradually changed. One method to this end was to be the establishment of provincial rabbinical authorities. About these we heard much sometime ago, and a large sum of money was going to be collected for their organization. But nothing has been done, nor, as some people think, is anything likely to be done. If we had these bodies perhaps there would be less need for the Agudas Yisrael in England. Dr. Jung, who by the way, has become a member of the London Lodge, and Dr Hildesheimer (of Berlin) no doubt have some clear conception of the possibilities of the Frankfort organization which is now seeking to establish a branch in London, but they have been singularly unsuccessful in making clear to others what they think. The solution of the prevailing Jewish communal problems in the sense of the Torah soundes like a bad translation of a not very illuminating German original. Of course, if the fault lies in the workmanship of the translation, this can, and should, very soon be corrected But in some quarters it is asserted that the indefiniteness to which we refer is constitutional with the Aguda. Whatever be the case, however, only high motives are actuating those who are helping to graft the Frankfort plant in the soil of London

The Anglo-Jewish community had recently to mourn the loss of two of its ministers, the Rev. George Emanuel of Birmingham and the Rev. S. Conquy of London. One had grown gray in service, the other was comparatively a young man; one was an Ashkenazi the other a Sephardi—one was a preacher, the other a Chazan. While George Emanuel died on the evening of his days, Conquy was cut down in the midst of his career. He was ever ready to throw in his lot with his brethren. A respected member of the London Lodge, he is the second whom the Great Reaper has taken from the Brethren; but his cheery countenance will be long remembered. For the moment the First Lodge of London is in vacation; we do not meet again in the ordinary way until October. We are united in many things, but in none more so than the great desirability of largely increasing our membership. We are convinced that the right kind of men, the men we want, exist, and we are determined to reach them.

Tuesday morning session was devoted principally to the presentation of reports, among them one by Judge Philip Stein, member of the executive committee of the Order, reviewing the condition of the Order and reciting its achievements during the past year.

The newly elected officers were installed by the President of the Order, Mr. Adolf Kraus, and at the conclusion he addressed the Convention, giving a synopsis of the history of the Order and its various endeavors and accomplishments in the field of humanitarian service.

Various resolutions were presented and were referred to appropriate committees.

In the evening the intellectual advancement program was carried out with Mr. Edward Sonnenschein as chairman. Addresses were delivered by Dr. Louis Bernstein, of St. Joseph, on "The Highest Social Service" and by Madam Bella Pevsner, of Palestine, on "The Rejuvenation of the Holy Land."

Wednesday morning's session was devoted to the consideration of reports of the standing committees. At noon a memorial service was held and the memorial address was delivered by Dr. Samuel N. Deinard, of Minneapolis. At the conclusion the Convention arose and [illegible] the "Kaddish."

The evening program consisted of an entertainment, styled the "Modern Cabaret," under the direction of Mr H. M. Seligman, and the proceeds were devoted to B'nai B'rith Free Employment Bureau of Chicago.

Thursday's session was taken up with the consideration of the balance of the reports of the standing committees, and the disposition of unfinished business.

At noon the degree team of Central B'nai B'rith Council of Chicago, consisting of Messrs. A. B. Seelenfreund, Wm. Wilhartz, Adolph D. Weiner, and Julius H. Meyer, exemplified the initiatory work, which evoked much applause.

The work of the various charitable, philanthropic and eleemosynary institutions such as the Jewish Orphan Asylum of Cleveland, National Jewish Hospital for Consumptives at Denver, the Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital at Hot Springs, the B'nail B'rith Free Employment Bureau of Chicago was commended, and the lodges of the District and their members were urged to contribute to the full measure of their ability toward these most worthy causes.

The lodges were requested to appoint committees to co-operate with the Industrial Removal Office of New York City in the matter of securing employment for immigrants and to administer to their immediate wants and comfort.

The establishment of B'nai B'rith Libraries of Jewish Literature at the various university centers in the District was recommended.

The work of the various Central B'nai B'rith Councils in the District was endorsed and the creation of further Councils in the District wherever feasible was urged.

STRONG ACTIVITY IN DISTRICT NO. 4.

Five New Lodges the Result of an Official Trip—One More Lodge Forming.

When President Morris N. Schneider and Rabbi M. Friedlander, his Grand Orator, started on their official tour north, late in the month of April, they vowed that they would not be satisfied with the usual routine visits, but that they would come home showing substantial results. They have kept their vow and in consequence the District is enriched by five new Lodges which, though they may not add largely to the sum total of our membership, they at least round off our jurisdictional lines. The importance of organization as such is rarely emphasized, but, much stress is laid upon the meaning of numbers. Now, it cannot be gainsaid that, when a community of two or three thousand Jewish souls, disorganized and isolated from Jewish life and influence, finally organizes, no matter under what auspices, and thereby interlocks its communal existence with other Jewish communities, a victory for Jewish solidarity may be recorded.

The two eminent representatives of the District organized the Jews of the cities of Helena, Mont., Bellingham, Wash., Victoria, B. C., Aberdeen, Wash., and Reno, Nevada. Helena, Victoria and Reno had B'nai B'rith Lodges some twenty years ago, but the original stock of the Jewish population in these cities did not grow apace with the general advance of the western country, while the newcomers seemed to have little in common with the old pioneers or their descendants; the lodges, in consequence, had to surrender their charters. At this period there is a total change in the character of the Jewish population and the responses that came to the invitations of Brothers Schneider and Friedlander were spontaneous and sympathetic.

On June 21, 1914, District Deputy Brother Samuel Goodman of Butte, Mont., assisted by Brothers I. Simon, G. N. Oppenheimer, H. Coddon, J. H. Blaustein and Gus. Weinstock, of Butte, and Brothers Joseph Binnard, a resident of Helena as well as Rabbi, Brother J. K. Levin, formerly of Winnipeg Lodge, instituted Helena, Mont., Lodge No. 755 under the happiest of auspices.

On June 28th, District Deputy Brother J. Harris of Seattle, accompanied by Brothers F. Falk, A. J. Spear, G. Schwartz, David Lipman and J. Lewis, members of the two Seattle Lodges, repaired to the city of Bellingham, Wash., and there instituted Bellingham Lodge No. 756, composed of a promising membership.

On July 5th, the President of Tacoma Lodge, Brother Theo. Feist, took with him a number of members of his Lodge and in company with Brother Herbert Schoenfeld, the tireless and progressive President of Rainier Lodge, Seattle, and Brother Dr. Hartman, then a prospective member of Victoria Lodge, went down to Aberdeen, Grays Harbor in the Southwestern part of the State of Washington bordering on the Pacific Ocean, and there instituted Grays Harbor Lodge No. 757, enrolling in its membership the entire Jewish communities of the two thriving lumber towns of Aberdeen and Hoquiam. Brother Feist had previously attended the inauguration of Bellingham Lodge.

July 19th, Brother D. N. Mosessohn of Portland, Ore., representing President Schneider, instituted Victoria Lodge No. 758, composed of the elite of the Provincial Capitol of British Columbia. He was accompanied by Brothers Falk, Lewis, Meyer Cohen and Schaefer of Seattle, Weaver, Dobrin and Goodstone, of Vancouver, and Verstandig of Bellingham.

August 2d, Reno Lodge No. 760 was instituted by President Schneider, assisted by Rabbi Friedlander and Secretary Aschheim. The Israelites of the thriving metropolis of Nevada state turned out almost a unit and enrolled themselves under the B'nai B'rith banner.

Since the return of the Grand Officers from Reno, a package has been received from Brother Verstandig, containing twenty-nine applications for a charter from the Israelites of Everett, Washington. Action will be taken on those applications at a meeting of the General Committee to take place Tuesday, August 11th. There is no doubt that the petition will be granted and that the installation will take place shortly thereafter. This will make the seventh Lodge in the State of Washington, and, including British Columbia, the seventh Lodge on Puget Sound.

This report cannot be concluded without a word of acknowledgment to each and all of those mentioned in this report, whose zeal moved them to finish the work begun by President Schneider and Rabbi Friedlander. They are all men who typify in their respective communities what is best in B'nai B'rithism and never miss an opportunity of giving testimony of the faith that is in them.

DEDICATION OF B'NAI B'RITH ORPHANAGE AND HOME FOR FRIENDLESS CHILDREN OF DISTRICT NO. 3.

One of the most modern and scientifically constructed homes in the country to be used for the care of orphans and friendless children was dedicated on Sunday afternoon, Aug. 30, 1914, in Fairview Township, Erie County, near Erie. Pennsylvania.

The buildings are to be erected in a series of units of four each, and the cottage plan of architecture will be followed out. Two of such units were ready and were dedicated with interesting ceremonies when many of the best known men in the country attended.

The dedicatory address was delivered by Rabbi J. Leonard Levy of Pittsburgh, and Mr. Isador Sobel, past president of District Grand Lodge, No. 3, and to whom a great share of the credit for the success of the institution is due, was master of ceremonies. Among the many who made addresses were Rabbi Max C. Currick of Erie, Mr. A. Leo Weil of Philadelphia, A. J. Sunstein of Pittsburgh, Morris Schaffner of Erie, Rabbi S. Peiser of Cleveland, superintendent of the Jewish Orphan Asylum located in that city.

Excursion trains were run to Erie from Pittsburgh, McKeesport and several other places. Several thousand people attended the dedicatory exercises, which began at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

Tables were set in the fine orchard not far from the main building, and there refreshments were served by the committee specially appointed for that purpose. In the evening the prominent out-of-town guests were entertained at the Country Club.

The two buildings dedicated are of brick, concrete and slate and are fireproof. They are three stories high. with a deep basement.

As one enters the wide and attractive entrance, a view for miles around is provided from the porch. The main door opens into a reception hall and on one side is a living room, bright and homelike—in fact, there is nothing about the building to indicate that it is an orphanage; it is a beautiful modern residence. The rooms are all large, perfectly lighted and ventilated. The dining room is on the first floor, also reception rooms and offices, etc. On the upper floors are the dormitories for the boys and girls, matron's room, lavatories, etc. Each building will accommodate thirty children.

The four large dormitories are equipped with all the latest ideas in ventilation—in fact, experts say the plan is perfection. Adjoining each are the washstands, shower baths and other accessories. The plumbing is of the latest design and handsome in appearance.

In the well-lighted basement of each building is a large playroom for the children, to be used when the weather is unfavorable. The furniture is now being installed and is of the latest design.

The orphanage fronts on the main roadway, the Erie-Conneaut trolley cars passing in front, thus making it convenient of access from the east and west. There will be a park with the dimensions of four city squares, and this is to be set out with trees, shrubbery walks and drives.

Thoughts and Tidings--A Review of Passing Events

By H. Eliassof

The European War.

Suddenly and unexpectedly a catastrophe of destruction overwhelmed enlightened Europe. The cataclysm of war came like the sudden bursting of a dam. The declarations of war flashed like lightning from all sides, and before the people were fully aware of what had happened they were called to arms in Germany, Austria, France, England and Russia, and were rushed to the battlefields to face untold horrors of devastation and death. The neutral nations of the world still stand aghast at the contemplation of this conflagration, and those who fortunately have not been drawn into the vortex of this war ask one another in amazement and awe: "Has Europe gone mad? What has become of humanity's golden dreams of the dawn of true democracy and of the cheering promises of universal peace? Where are the influences of religion, of modern philosophy, science and art, which our sages and seers, our poets and pastors continually conjured up before our longing and yearning eyes? Is the civilization of the twentieth century, of which we boasted so much, and of which we expected so much, dead and buried? There is only one answer to all these questions: Yes, Europe has gone war mad, the golden dreams of humanity have so far remained dreams only, and the influences of religion, science and art have failed to make the slightest impression, because the peoples of Europe have permitted their crowned heads, their aristocracy and their yunkers to turn the civilization of the twentieth century into an element of destruction. The peoples of Europe allowed themselves to be fooled and hoodwinked by their war lords, who constantly cried peace, peace, and wanted nothing but war. Goaded on by "landlust" and passion for supreme power, they developed a vast militarism, added cannons to cannons, dreadnaughts to dreadnaughts, harnessed all the inventions of modern science and all the ingenuities of modern civilization to their war engines, their weapons of death, and robbed the treasure house of constructive civilization to form and to foster a civilization of destruction.

Henry Thomas Buckle, the famous historian, undertakes, in his "History of Civilization in England," to prove by historical evidence that civilization is divided into four distinct and separate elements: Imagination, understanding, moral and intellectual. It seems to me that the history of the Christian church and of militarism and war suggests to the observing mind a further division of civilization into two additional elements, namely, constructive and destructive. Primitive civilizations were almost entirely of a destructive character. The primitive man was surrounded by too many fierce enemies, and in order to be able to exist, he was forced to invent means by which to overcome and destroy them. He had first to learn how to use a wooden club, how to make an ax of stone and arrows of flint, weapons of destruction, before he could devote his thoughts to the invention of greater comforts of life, such as a better and safer dwelling place, better coverings for his body and a variety of pottery for preparing and storing his meat and drink. His entire civilization was concentrated upon the invention of suitable implements of war, therefore his was a destructive civilization. With the developments of understanding man added constructive civilization to his destructive one. In the excavations in some of the abodes of prehistoric races pottery, and even ornaments are found side by side with stone axes and flint arrows. But also with these somewhat advanced races the destructive civilization still was more predominant. Even later on, when tribes and nations were formed they were mainly warriors, and destructive civilization still had the upper hand in their midst. The ancient Babylonians, Assyrians, Egyptians and Hellenes, who built magnificent cities to dwell in and colossal temples for the worship of their gods, paid their greatest attention and devoted their strongest energies to offensive and defensive wars and their civilization was in the main a destructive one. These peoples worshiped the warrior who killed the greatest number of adversaries. The national bards sang their sweetest and best songs in the praise of the heroes on the battlefield, and the successful military leaders were publicly crowned with wreaths of glory and of fame.

Thirty-three centuries ago a boy was saved from the waters of the Nile. He was named Moses and when he grew up to manhood he transformed a multitude of slaves into an independent people. He led them from bondage to liberty, from the influences of pagan polytheism to the worship of one spiritual God, and from a destructive civilization to a culture of construction, based upon moral law, supported by intellectual force and sustained by truth and justice.

Nineteen centuries ago a Jew named Jesus was nailed to a cross in Jerusalem. He was hailed by many as the "Prince of Peace," and was acclaimed by the world as the originator of so-called "Christian civilization."

Eighteen centuries ago the Romans destroyed the national independence of the adherents of the Mosaic culture of construction. The flaming torch of the Romans laid their sanctuary in ashes, but it could not consume the love of justice and truth which had found an abiding place in their hearts and in their souls. All through the woeful centuries so-called "Christian civilization" strove to extinguish the perpetual light of the Mosaic culture which the Jew carried with him in all his weary wanderings from land to land, but it too failed to accomplish the task.

For nearly two thousand years the world followed the lead of this "Christian civilization," which always failed to influence man in the crises caused by the outbursts of human passion and never succeeded in restraining its followers from committing acts of violence, because it is a civilization of destruction, because it is a civilization based upon imagination, and not upon reason and understanding, and while it emphasizes the doctrine of love, it neglects the principle of justice. It is hardly human for a man to love his enemy, but he may try to do him justice.

In the medieval age, from the eighth to the fifteenth century of the Christian era, Christian civilization lost entirely all the traces of the constructive element and became vehemently destructive in tendency and practice. The crusades and the inquisition, these two cataclysms of destruction, were direct manifestations of the influence of the Christian church, and it requires no stronger evidence to prove the destructive character of Christian civilization. That Europe was able to rehabilitate itself from the destructive influence of the middle age and to revive the element of construction was due to the French revolution and not to the Christian church. The wildly inflamed passions of man burned themselves out in the upheaval of this revolution and during the protracted Napoleonic wars which followed it. The middle age was overthrown by the forces of reaction and not by the influence of Christian civilization. After all this has been said, there is certainly no wonder that religion, which, with the belligerent nations of Europe, means nothing else than the Christian church, was unable to prevent this fearful European war.

The strangest thing about this European war is the entente between France, England and Russia. It awakens mistrust, and is looked upon by the world as a sad misfit. That France, the republic, and England, the liberal constitutional monarchy, could unite with barbaric and tyrannic Russia is hard to understand. They should have known that such a union must bring upon them the contempt of the world. But it seems that France was so blinded by her hunger and passion for revenge on Germany that she was not very choice in the selection of her allies. It now appears that England is already tired and heartily ashamed of her alliance with the Russian Czar, for it is reported that England has advised Russia to mend her ways and treat her people with more decency.

Many public writers and men of prominence are giving expression in the public press to words of hope and reassurance. Oscar Straus stated in an interview in London that in his opinion the great blessing that will result from this titanic world clash will be the obliteration of every monarchy in Europe. H. G. Wells, Forbes and others seem to be assured that a great peace is in store for Europe after this crash is over.

In the first place, it is hard to believe that all the crowned heads of Europe, the winners as well as the losers, will fall so quickly after this war. How will they be obliterated? They certainly will not all abdicate their thrones. Is there any hope that the masses of the people will rise in every country and force their kings and emperors to relinquish their ruling power? This, too, is hardly to be expected. Many of the fighting men who will return home from the terrible war, even those who are victorious, will for a long time be so tired and worn out by the hardships they had to endure, and so bowed down by the losses at home, that they will not be in the mood to rush into new fights and new troubles, and will be glad to let things go on in the old way. It is an alluring dream and nothing more. Is there really a great peace in store for Europe after this war is over? It seems not. The unfortunate alliance of Enland with Japan rather points to new wars right after this war is over. If Germany is successful she will surely wish to retaliate on Japan for its interference in Kiachau, and if England is victorious she will not look with equanimity upon the gain of a merchant marine by the United States and the expansion of our trade in Asia and South America during the European war.

But let us hope for better days—days of liberty and peace for all mankind.

The War and the Jews.

It is estimated that between eight and nine million Jews live in the countries now involved in war and that there are nearly 400,000 Jews fighting in the armies of the belligerents. In the Russian army alone there are 250,000 Jewish soldiers, in Austria-Hungary 70,000, in France 10,000, and in Germany 6,150. The rest are distributed among the other armies. In all the other lands except Russia the Jews, who now again give proof of their loyalty to the flag of their home country, may hope to strengthen their position as citizens after the war is over. The Russian Jews know that they are throwing away their lives, that they are fighting for an enemy, not against an enemy, and often against a brother in faith. This certainly makes the war a thousand times harder for them. The American newspapers recently published persistent rumors that the Czar had promised before the war to better the conditions of the Russian Jews by removing all the restrictions which now exist in Russia against them. It is easily understood that the Russian Jews can place no trust in the Czar's promises, if he made any. They have had too bitter experiences in this direction. They know well enough now that the Czar's promises are soap bubbles and cannot be relied upon. If the Russian Jews hoped to gain something by Russia's alliance with England they must be sadly disappointed, for in consequence of these friendly relations between England, the land of Jewish emancipation, and Russia, the land of Jewish oppression, a part of the English press, like the London Times, has become anti-Semitic and is furnishing the Russian Black Hundreds with arguments, based on ignorance and prejudice, in support of the persecution of the Jews. The Novoe Vremja and the other anti-Semitic organs of the Russian official press gain from the London Times material and encouragement for their dastardly campaigns of calumny with which to crush down the suffering Jews deeper into degradation and misery. The bitter lot of the Russian Jews is growing more bitter, more desperate and more hopeless from year to year, and if Russia is victorious in this war it may even grow worse. We know that a Russian drunk with vodka can become bestial enough to instigate a pogrom, but we do not know what a Russian drunk with both victory and vodka is capable of doing to the Jew.

Modern anti-Semitism was born in Germany after the Franco-Prussian war of 1870. Then, as now, the German Jews fought bravely and willingly shed their blood for their fatherland side by side with their fellow citizens. Many Jews distinguished themselves on the battlefield, and were proudly wearing the iron cross and other marks of bravery and courage. But nationalism ran riot among the victorious Teutons, the bravery and loyalty of the Jew was quickly forgotten and he was looked upon as undeserving of the name of German and unfit for promotion in the army and for professorships in the university. There is danger that if Germany is victorious the Treitschkes and the Stoekers will again raise the cry of Teuton and Arian against the Semite. But, for all that, the Jews cannot wish for the success of the Russian arms against Germany. In Germany at least the Jew can do his duty and hope for the best.

In England, France and Austria the Jew is not now looking for any improvement in his political standing. His citizenship is safe in these countries and he is ready to share in the burdens as well as in the prosperity of his beloved fatherland. He is used to a little zoreh here and there as long as he is sure of his manhood and the respect of his fair-minded fellow countrymen.

THE LEO M. FRANK CASE.

The following communication was sent to the American press by Mr. Walter B. Brown of Chisholm, Minn.:

When race prejudice reaches such a height that a state can hang a man on the strength of it, when the clamor of a brainless mob is given precedence over facts and evidence while the life of a human being hangs in the balance, when the constitutional rights of man are being defiled by a few individuals apparently for self aggrandizement and acquiescence to local sentiment, is it not time that you, an American citizen, should lend a hand in the fray and save this, your country, from the smirch of sectarian hatred, the brand of oppression that "Christian" Russia has borne for centuries?

You have heard of the case of Leo M. Frank, a young Jew, thirty years of age, married, a graduate of Cornell University and superintendent of a large pencil factory in the city of Atlanta, Georgia, who has been convicted of the murder of a fourteen-year-old girl and is now awaiting execution.

From evidence introduced in the case, from mob demonstrations during the trial, from the aroma of racial hatred that fairly impregnated the atmosphere of the community in which he was tried, the conviction of this man under such conditions is the most disgraceful affair that has ever occurred in these United States. The only damaging testimony against Frank, introduced by the state at the trial, was that of a negro roust-a-bout, several times convicted of crimes, and his statement, in direct denial of numerous affidavits previously sworn to, reeked with the stench of perjury.

That there is question about the guilt of Frank, that the state of Georgia is not inquiring deeper into the case is very likely to be committing judicial murder can be concluded from the opinion of Judge L. S. Roan in overruling the first motion for new trial. He said, "I am not convinced beyond a doubt of this man's guilt or innocence, but I consider it my duty to overrule the motion." Oh! where in the history of jurisprudence is there a parallel to this remark. It is presumed that the benefit of doubt belongs to the defendant. At the hearing on second motion for new trial Judge Ben Hill overruled the motion and in the same breath said that he would grant a bill of exceptions to the defendant so the case could be taken to the state supreme court. Such statements as these following decisions adverse to the defendant may be in perfect accordance with legal ethics but to the common lay mind they sound as did the words of that great dictator of ages past, "I am innocent of the blood of this person, see ye to it."

After scouring the country for criminals and questionable characters to give testimony to besmirch the moral character of Frank and turn public sentiment against him, in which they were quite successful and which coupled with hatred of his race were the fundamentals of his conviction, the police of the city of Atlanta place themselves on record at this time with a denial that charges of immorality were ever preferred.

You know of this case. Will you in the cause of humanity and for the sake of our country's boasted justice make an effort to secure full publicity of this case in your community that the injustice of it all may readily be brought to the bar of public opinion and judged by minds free from restraints of conventionalities?

This is not an appeal for the acquittal of Frank. I have never met him and am not interested in him but as an American citizen I am deeply concerned over the methods employed which have denied him his constitutional rights simply because he is a Jew. I am not a Jew and am under no obligation to the Jewish race, I do not proclaim Frank's innocence even though Detective William J. Burns after exhaustive investigation has declared him innocent but I do plead with you to make an effort through publicity to secure a new trial and a square deal for Leo M. Frank. If he is guilty he can be proven so at a second trial but he should be found so in an environment that is not teeming with mob demonstrations and race hatred.

What Our Lodges Are Doing

ANNUAL VISIT OF WASHINGTON LODGE TO THE HOME AT YONKERS.

The friends and members of Washington Lodge No. 19 of New York paid their annual visit to the Home for the Aged and Infirm at Yonkers, N. Y., on Sunday afternoon, June 7, 1914. The occasion was one of the most interesting in the history of the Home, and will long be remembered as one of the most enjoyable afternoons for the inmates and the visitors. The program of entertainment was voted by all present as worthy of the highest commendation. Following the entertainment there was general dancing in the dining room. As this was the very first occasion that dancing was ever permitted in the Home, the innovation was welcomed with delight.

A noteworthy feature of the program was the playing by the Washington Lodge Junior Orchestra, a fine organization of exceptional talent assembled from among the members and their sons, and ably conducted by Bro. William Goudeket of Washington Lodge.

Another feature of the day was the appearance on the program of two active governors of the Home, one, Bro. Henry Meyers of Washington Lodge, the other, Bro. Henry Duschnes of Ed. Everet Lodge; in addition to both these, Mrs. Henry Duschnes, a member of the Ladies' Auxiliary, presented a pretty fairy tale in a most brilliant and entertaining manner.

A specially appointed committee of members and their ladies, headed by Bro. Harry C. Adams, visited those inmates of the Home who, through illness and infirmity, were unable to attend the exercises, and made to each of them individual gifts of flowers and goodies. On the whole, the day was a very happy one.

Addresses were delivered by Dr. Meyer M. Stark, president of Washington Lodge, and Louis Kempner, president of the Board of Governors of the Home.

HARMONY LODGE, BRIDGEPORT, CONN.

A large number of enthusiastic members and friends of Harmony Lodge No. 711 of Bridgeport, Conn., attended a smoker and entertainment given by the Lodge at its club rooms on June 23.

Harmony Lodge has had a very successful season, a number of important events having taken place during the past year.

Among these may be mentioned the presentation to it by the Grand Lodge of a fine banner for the greatest increase in membership for the District; the turning over by it of a large sum of money as the proceeds of its recent charity ball to the three Hebrew charitable societies; the children's Washington birthday party; a reception in honor of the twenty-fifth wedding anniversary of President Isaac Moss; an address by former Congressman E. J. Hill on "Mexico," and the public installation by Col. Harry Cutler of Providence, R. I., one of the foremost Hebrews in New England.

It is expected from the plans under consideration by the various committees that the splendid work already done will even be eclipsed during the fall season and it is anticipated that under the auspices of its "Forum" many speakers of national renown will deliver addresses on subjects of general interest.

An excellent musical program was furnished and luncheon was served during the evening.

MONTEFIORE LODGE, SAN FRANCISCO.

Montefiore Lodge has reawakened. Dr. C. E Schwartz, Robert Karmelinski and Louis Becker have brought in a class of 37 members since their own initiation, May 26th, and a large number of candidates are awaiting initiation next meeting, owing to their energetic work. These three members would make any Lodge of themselves, and their enthusiasm is contagious, as all the members of the Lodge, both those who were working hard before, and those who were dormant, have been straining every nerve getting new members.

Acting Grand President Harry K. Wolff, who is a member of the Lodge is aiding by his presence at each meeting. He took part in the last initiation of a class of twenty-seven, in conjunction with the Initiatory Team of the Committee of Fifty.

DR. MOSES GASTER LODGE, MANCHESTER, ENGLAND.

The President, Brother Samuel J. Cohen, as Chairman of a Special Canvassing Committee in connection with the Manchester Victoria Memorial Jewish Hospital Appeal, succeeded with the assistance of a number of the brethren of the Lodge, in raising the sum to £8,000. The brethren personally combined to contribute the sum of £250 and have thus been enabled to endow in perpetuity a Bed to bear the name of "The Dr. Moses Gaster Lodge, I. O. B. B., No. 720, Manchester."

A continued increase in the number of members on the roll is noticeable. At the last meeting of the Lodge, held on the fifth of May, Brother Augustus Kahn, President of the First Lodge of England, No. 663, London, was present and took part in the initiation of fifteen new members, of whom there now are sixty. While at the inauguration of the Lodge the brethren were almost all connected with the Sephardic section of Manchester Jewry, a large proportion are now Ashkenazim, a fact which must help the Lodge to exercise additional influence in the community, it being the hope of the local committee that it will shortly be possible actively to participate in various educational and other communal movements so proving the Lodge to be a valuable force in the important city. The present officers are: President, Bro. Samuel J. Cohen; Vice-President, Bro. Joseph A. Hamwee; Treasurer, Bro. Joseph A. Susman; Monitor, Bro. Gabriel E. Besso; Guardian, Bro. Jerome Jacobs; Hon. Secretary, Bro. The Rev. Isaac D. Duque; Bros. Solomon N. Arditti, Isaac Cansino, Isaac Levy, Joseph N. Levy and Moise de Picciotto, are the other members of the Council.

INSTITUTION OF B'NAI B'RITH LODGE AT PATCHOGUE, N. Y.

On the afternoon of Sunday, June 28, 1914, in the Supreme Court Chambers, a new lodge was instituted at Patchogue, L. I., under the name of Patchogue Lodge No. 759. The institution ceremonies were conducted by the First Vice-President of the District, Brother Herman Asher, assisted by Brothers M. P. Davidson, Joseph Rosenzweig, and I. Irving Lipsitch, of the General Committee of District No. 1. The initiation ceremonies were conducted by Brothers William Asher and Dr. A. V. Greenstein.

Patchogue Lodge is the only Jewish fraternal organization in the county, and the members thereof look forward with much enthusiasm toward the strengthening of its membership from among the leading Hebrews of the various communities.

The visiting brethren presented the Lodge with a beautiful Bible and a silk American flag, and the individual members of the Lodge were presented with B'nai B'rith buttons by the Grand Lodge.

It is anticipated that in the very near future a Sunday School will be organized, and various other activities will emanate from the new lodge and an efficient corps of officers, who are as follows:

President, Dr. Louis Feldman.
Vice-President, Alfred Blum.
Monitor, Harry Weiss.
Treasurer, Leonard Cohn.
Recording Secretary, Samuel J. Siegel, Jr.
Financial Secretary, M. A. Feynman.
Inside Guardian, Benjamin Churner.
Warden, Sol Cantor.
Trustees: L. J. Feynman, Maurice Beck, Hiram Rossuck.

MANHATTAN LODGE, NEW YORK.

Manhattan Lodge No. 156 held its annual meeting at the Home at Yonkers on May 17, 1914. Rev. Simon Schlager, cantor of Temple Emanuel, and other artists, presented a splendid program.

Mrs. Loth, 80-year-old resident of the Home, made a most inspiring address.

The Ladies' Auxiliary Society held its annual meeting at the same time, which was attended by a large number of its members. At the close of the two business meetings the two societies combined in exercises at the raising of a flag presented by Mrs. G. Falk. The ceremonies were closed with the singing of the national hymn by the assembled multitude.

HEBRON LODGE, NEW YORK.

On June 14th Hebron Lodge No. 5, I. O. B. B., celebrated its 65th anniversary by giving the inmates of the Home at Yonkers an entertainment and collation, and so adding an additional ray of sunshine to the lives of our old and infirm brethren. The occasion was well attend- and everybody seemed to be having a pleasant time. The Hebrew Orphan Asylum Band furnished the music that was much appreciated by all present.

Hebron Lodge No. 5, I. O. B. B., was instituted on April 10th, 1849, and the officers were installed by Bros. Dr. Metzbacher and Renauer. The Charter members were Bros. B. Rothchild, I. Muhlheiser, Joseph Ochs, I. Weinschenck and I. Muslmer. On that same evening 14 members of the Jacob's Sons (a local organization of this city) were initiated in Hebron Lodge.

On July 2nd, 1850, Hebron Lodge voted to have a banner made, and the late Bro. Julius Bien, then a member of Hebron Lodge, was selected to decorate it.

On Sept. 25th, 1850, Hebron Lodge No. 5, in conjunction with two other lodges, gave a ball, the proceeds of which were given for the foundation of the institution known as the Maimonides Library, which was dedicated on Jan. 25th, 1852.

In 1850 the members of Hebron Lodge No. 5 founded a society for the protection of widows and orphans, and it was chartered under the laws of the State of New York in 1851. The first contributor to this fund was Bro. Gerson N. Herrman, who in 1863 became President of Dist. Grand Lodge No. 1.

In March, 1851, Hebron Lodge No. 5 resolved to participate, in conjunction with three other Lodges, in building a hall at No. 56 Orchard street, New York, to be known as the Covenant Hall, and to be used for B'nai B'rith purposes.

On April 2nd, 1851, one of the Lodges withdrew from this pact, but Hebron, with the aid of the other two Lodges, continued to build.

The cornerstone of this building was dedicated in 1851, and the building itself was dedicated in 1852.

On Sept. 7th, 1851, the first session of the Dist. Grand Lodge No. 1 took place.

It is to be regretted that all the records of Hebron Lodge No. 5, between the years 1852 and 1869, were lost in the fire in Orchard Hall, where Hebron Lodge at that time was meeting, but this did not hamper their good work, as the following list of benefits since 1869 will show:

Endowments	$189,800.00
Sick and Convalescent	20,656.50
Charity and Relief	10,328.48
Widows and Orphans	6,799.00
General Fund for the Maintainance of the Home at Yonkers	14,168.77
Maimonides Library	2,427.30

NEW ORLEANS, LA.

A joint committee representing all the B'nai B'rith Lodges of New Orleans held a meeting in the latter part of June, at which a committee was appointed to map out a plan of campaign for the coming fall and winter months. At the subsequent meeting, held July 9th, the committee submitted its report, outlining a plan of activity which was concurred in.

The election of officers of the joint committee was then held, and it was resolved that the six lodges of the city be requested to elect three delegates to the joint committee, and they were urged that only such brethren be selected as would take active interest in the work of the committee and assist personally in its labors.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.

A meeting of the joint committee of the B'nai B'rith lodges of New Orleans was held on Aug. 5, 1914, at which the election of officers took place. Various committees were appointed, among them one for the purpose of securing a suitable meeting place for the lodges and a home for the members of the Order. Another committee was appointed to visit the lodges at their next meeting in order to secure a consolidation of all the lodges into one.

ABRAHAM LIPPMAN LODGE, PITTSBURGH, PA.

Abraham Lippman Lodge, No. 672, I. O. B. B., has, during the five years of its existence, proved to be a tower of strength among the communal Jewish agencies of this city. It has rendered invaluable assistance financially and morally to the B'nai B'rith Orphanage and Home for Friendless Children of the district. It has raised the largest sum of money towards the building fund of any lodge in the district. This was done in co-operation with the Ladies' Auxiliary of this lodge. This Auxiliary, which receives its inspiration and encouragement and direction in the lodge proper, has likewise established for itself an enviable record. It has, in co-operation with existing charitable societies, rendered considerable service to the Jewish poor of the city of Pittsburgh. Abraham Lippman Lodge has assisted financially the Federation of Jewish Philanthropies of Pittsburgh, the Labor Bureau of the Council of Jewish Women and the Vigilance Committee of Dallas, Texas. In 1913 this lodge made a survey of the Jewish religious education that is being afforded to the youth of the city of Pittsburgh, and has also supported the work of the Educational Committee of Allegheny county, whose purpose it is to give religious inspiration to the Jewish boys at reformatory institutions.

In 1913, Abraham Lippman Lodge amalgamated with Iron City Lodge. The latter has had a remarkable record of fifty years of service in this community, rendering a beneficent influence in this city and having on its roll of membership some of the leading citizens of the community. Too much space would be required to enumerate all it has done along benevolent, educational and charitable lines. For a long time Iron City Lodge has given financial assistance to the Irene Kaufmann Settlement, Montefiore Hospital, the Home for the Aged of Pittsburgh, and to the Erie Orphanage, et. catera, et cetera.

NEW LONDON, CONN.

Under the auspices of Fraternity Lodge, No. 743, of New London, Conn., a remarkable meeting was held on the evening of June 9, 1914, when prominent Jews of Rhode Island and Connecticut spoke on the same platform with Christian ministers, all espousing the cause of the brotherhood of man regardless of creed, religion or race.

An audience of more than 300 persons greeted the speakers, among whom were Col. Harry Cutler, of Providence, past president of District Grand Lodge, No. 1; Mr. Charles H. Shapiro, of Bridgeport, district deputy of District Grand Lodge No. 1; Rev. Walter Samuel Swisher, pastor of All Souls Unitarian Universalist Church, and the chairman of the meeting, Dr. E. A. Henkle.

Fraternity Lodge is to be congratulated upon making possible meetings of this character, which tend to break down barriers of creed and race and make for a more united and generally better community.

WOMEN'S AUXILIARY TO OAKLAND LODGE ORGANIZED.

A preliminary meeting for the purpose of organizing a Women's Auxiliary to Oakland Lodge, No. 252, of Oakland, Cal., was held at the home of Mr. Morris Schneider, president of District Grand Lodge, No. 4, on the evening of June 23, 1914. The members of the Hadassah Club discussed the most feasible methods of establishing such an auxiliary and were willing to lend their aid in formulating the new society. Eli Schwartzbaum and Grand President Morris Schneider gave brief talks regarding the importance of an auxiliary to the I. O B. B. Lodge and urged that steps be taken at once for future work. Application blanks will be sent to the members of the B'nai B'rith Society shortly, advising them of plans for the undertaking. Miss Rebecca Kletz, of the Hadassah Club, called the meeting together and made a few preliminary remarks. Mrs. Henry Mauser, who was organizer of several auxiliaries of the order and is secretary of Modin Auxiliary of the I. O. B. B. Lodge, addressed the women and dwelt upon the ideals and purpose of fraternal auxiliaries.

What Our Lodges Are Doing

DEBORAH LODGE, GREENVILLE, MISS.

At the last regular meeting of Deborah Lodge No. 161 of Greenville, Miss. held at the Olympic Club in June, a class of candidates was initiated. Rabbi Sternheim, who has accepted a call to the rabbinate at Baton Rouge, La., delivered his farewell address. After the meeting adjourned an enjoyable smoker was given by the Lodge. The Lodge adopted the following resolution in connection with the departure of Rabbi Sternheim:

Whereas, Our beloved brother, Rabbi Emanuel Sternheim, has accepted a call to the Rabbinate of Baton Rouge, Louisiana, and will shortly depart from our midst for that city; and,

Whereas, In the removal of Brother Sternheim the Lodge has suffered a great loss in being deprived of his helpful assistance, genial companionship, and of the deep and affectionate interest that he has always taken in its welfare and progress, he being a punctual and regular attendant at its meetings where he was ever judicious in counsel, aggressive in view and faithful to the discharge of any duty assigned him; therefore, be it

Resolved, By Deborah Lodge No. 161 of the Independent Order B'nai B'rith, of Greenville, Mississippi, that the removal of Brother Sternheim is a serious loss to our Lodge and a cause of genuine regret to each and every member thereof; that we will greatly miss our brother and personal friend, but though gone from our midst, we hang his picture, framed in love, upon the wall of sweetest memory, feeling that he was a good and faithful brother among us, wise in counsel, and a tireless worker for the good of our beloved fraternity and our holy religion; be it further

Resolved, That it is the fondest hope and prayer of this Lodge that Brother Sternheim and his family will at all times be accorded God's choicest blessings, may their future journey through life lead over a pleasant pathway carpeted with the ever-blooming roses of health, happiness and prosperity; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be presented to Brother Sternheim, a copy sent to the press for publication, and a copy thereof spread upon the minutes of this Lodge.

B'NAI B'RITH OF LOS ANGELES ENTERTAIN GRAND LODGE OFFICERS.

The officers and members of Los Angeles Lodge No. 487 of Los Angeles, Cal., were honored with the presence of President Morris N. Schneider and Grand Secretary I. J. Ascheim, and Grand Orator Dr. L. Friedlander of District Grand Lodge No. 4, on May 26, 1914. A luncheon was arranged in honor of the visiting officers, which was attended by all the officers and past officers of the Lodge. In the evening a well attended meeting of the Lodge at its own club rooms was held, at which a class of candidates was initiated and which was concluded with a smoker and entertainment.

B'NAI B'RITH CLUB BUILDING AT PORTLAND, ORE.

The work of erecting the new B'nai B'rith Club building in Portland, Ore., is now nearly two months under way. The permit authorizing the construction of the building cited $25,000 as the cost of the two-story building, but it is estimated that the completed building, fully equipped and furnished, will cost the association in the neighborhood of $50,000. The exterior will be of light brick, with stained joints and trimming of stone. Included among the features will be spacious clubrooms and quarters for both the men and the women, a large swimming pool and gymnasium, with appointments, a running track and billiard and smoking rooms. Isaac Swett, president of the building association, is authority for the statement that the Portland building will be the largest B'nai B'rith home in the world. The new building will be the home of the Portland lodge and the Theodor Herzl Lodge of the order, of which there are 600 members in Portland.

INSTITUTION OF B'NAI B'RITH LODGE AT VICTORIA, B. C.

On Sunday, July 19, 1914, Mr. David N. Mosessohn, of Portland, Ore., representing the President of District Grand Lodge No. 4, instituted Victoria Lodge No. 758 at Victoria, B. C. amid much enthusiasm. Delegations from Seattle, Vancouver and Bellingham, Wash., were present. Mr. Mosessohn was assisted by Mr. Goodstone of Vancouver, Dr. Falk of Seattle, L. Verstandig of Bellingham, I. Lewis of Seattle, M. Cohen of Seattle, and H. Dobrin of Vancouver.

Following the institution ceremonies a class of 22 candidates was initiated into the Order and this was followed by the election of officers and their installation into office.

An elaborate banquet followed, at which Dr. Hartman, president of the lodge, acted as toastmaster. Responses were made by all the visiting Grand Lodge officers. The feature of the banquet was the reading of many messages of congratulation from the lodges throughout the District.

Mr Mosessohn in officially reporting the institution of Victoria Lodge says: "I cannot help but add that should all newly instituted lodges consist of such a splendid element as Victoria Lodge can boast of, the future of B'nai B'rithism is absolutely assured. The class of membership, their conservatism, their intellectuality and high Jewish ideals appealed to your deputy to the highest degree. I feel justified from the most favorable impression that I received, in predicting for Victoria Lodge a great and glorious future."

INSTITUTION OF BELLINGHAM LODGE.

Bellingham Lodge No. 756 of Bellingham, Wash., was instituted on Sunday, June 28, 1914, with Mr. M. Harris, District Deputy, as installing officer, assisted by Dr. Falk and others. A delegation of 15 prominent members of the Order from Seattle and Tacoma were present. After the ceremonies were concluded the members with their guests repaired to the banquet hall, where the ladies of the members served an elaborate banquet. All the visiting Grand Lodge officers and guests spoke on the work of the Order and Judiasm in general. Much encouragement was given the new lodge by the visitors, who helped to organize a new link in the chain of the B'nai B'rith fraternity.

ACTIVITIES OF McKEESPORT LODGE.

McKeesport Lodge No. 573 was instituted on April 24, 1904. Among the activities of the Lodge may be recounted the following:

Organization of a Sunday-school and maintenance of same, incurring an expenditure of nearly $700 for this purpose.

The organization of the United Hebrew Charities of McKeesport was due to the initiative and active work of the members of the Lodge.

During the floods in 1907 the Lodge distributed among the Jewish sufferers over $1,300.

During the Ohio floods in 1913 it also raised funds and contributed $220.

In connection with the B'nai B'rith Orphanage at Erie, Pa., the Lodge has furnished a cottage at its own expense.

In social service work the lodge has to its credit the rescue of a Jewish girl who was persuaded by missionaries to embrace Christianity.

It took an active part in the campaign against the reading of the Bible in public schools and also opposed restrictive features of immigration bills.

Since its existence the Lodge has disbursed over $4,000 for various charitable, educational and social purposes.

INSTITUTION OF RENO LODGE, RENO, NEV.

Reno Lodge, No. 760, was instituted on Aug. 2, 1914, by President Morris N. Schneider of District Grand Lodge, No. 4, who was assisted in the work by Grand Secretary I. J. Aschheim and Grand Orator Dr. M. Friedlander. A class of twenty-seven petitioners was initiated in due form. This was followed by the installation of the newly elected officers. At the close of the ceremonies a banquet was held in honor of the visiting Grand Lodge officers, at which remarks for the good and welfare of the order were made.

INSTALLATION OF HARDENBERG LODGE NO. 750.

The installation of Hardenberg Lodge at Frankfort-on-the-Oder took place with appropriate ceremonies on March 22, 1914. It is the 80th lodge of the District for Germany, and the 750th of the entire Order. The attendance was very numerous. Besides the 60 members with their ladies and the members of the General Com., many ex-presidents and brothers and sisters of the Order were also present. Grand President Bro. Timendorfer delivered an eloquent oration, in which he explained the principles of the Order and its motto of benevolence, brotherly love and harmony. In the evening a grand banquet was tendered to 200 guests, and the speeches delivered at the festive board enthused every participant for the noble aims and achivements of the Order.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

Under the auspices of the Committee of Fifty, representing the San Francisco B'nai B'rith lodges, a picnic was held on Aug. 23d at East Shore Park. The proceeds of the affair will be devoted to the fund now being raised to entertain the delegates to the Constitution Grand Lodge convention, to be held in San Francisco in 1915.

Athletics, games, dancing and concerts were the features of the picnic entertainment. In the morning a baseball game was played between the San Francisco lodges and Oakland Lodge. A trophy cup, donated by A. J. Simons, was awarded the winning team.

PITTSBURGH, PA.

The members of Abraham Lippman Lodge, No. 672, I. O. B. B., their friends and members of other lodges, will be interested to learn of a series of social affairs, to be held monthly, that have been inaugurated by the Propaganda Committee of the lodge. The plan is to have only one business meeting per month and the second meeting, the fourth Wednesday in the month, to be devoted entirely to matters musical, literary and social.

For the evening of Sept. 23d, it has been decided to hold a corn roast. This is to take place during the festival season, and a large turnout is expected. A very unique entertainment has been provided for in addition to the corn roast. For instance, the Cruso trio have agreed to perform on three string instruments—the mandolin, guitar and zither. Another feature will be a vaudeville act by a German actor recently arrived from Vienna. This act in particular is bound to prove most delightful.

The Propaganda Committee wishes to emphasize the fact again, that it is to be an open meeting and members are requested to bring their friends.

SAAR SHOLEM LODGE, PITTSBURGH, PA.

Saar Sholem Lodge No. 154 of Pittsburgh held a well attended meeting in June before the summer adjournment. A pleasing feature was the visit of some old members, who in their time had been most active in B'nai B'rith work.

The work of the Educational League of the Allegheny County Lodges was discussed. This League looks after the religious welfare of Jewish boys who have been sent to reformatories and schools of correction by the Juvenile Court, and also investigates the merits of individual cases.

INSTITUTION OF GRAYS HARBOR LODGE AT ABERDEEN, WASH.

On July 5, 1914, District Deputy Feist, president of Tacoma Lodge No. 741, instituted Grays Harbor Lodge No. 757 at Aberdeen, Wash. The ceremonies were in charge of the officers of Tacoma Lodge. The installation of officers was of a public nature. Much interest was manifested and the new lodge promises to be one of the active lodges of the District.

After the ceremonies a banquet was served by the ladies, which was very much enjoyed by the members and their guests.

So let the fair white-winged peacemaker fly
To happy havens under all the sky,
Till each man find his own in all men's good,
And all men work in noble brotherhood,
Breaking their mailed fleets and armed towers.

FAIRMONT LODGE NO. 726, I. O. B. B.

Fairmont Lodge was instituted on March 2, 1913, with a membership of 19. The Lodge at once assumed an important aspect in Jewish affairs of the city, and its membership slowly but steadily increased, until almost every Jewish citizen of Fairmont and surrounding communities was enrolled as a member; it became the center of Jewish activity in the social and religious life, and under its auspices many undertakings have been accomplished, that otherwise could not have occurred; co-incidental with the Institution of the Lodge on March 2nd, with the assistance of Rabbi Brill, a Sunday-school was established, which is maintained by the Lodge, and is known as the "B'nai B'rith Jewish Sunday-school;" Bro. Simon D. Goodman was elected Superintendent, and Miss Edith Klaw and Miss Sadie Oliker as Instructors. The interest of the membership is centered upon the success of the School, which has become the pet hobby of the Lodge. Shortly following the organization of the Lodge, a Ladies' Auxiliary was formed, and under the auspices of both, many pleasant social functions have been held.

During the Holy days of 1913, religious services were held by the Lodge, which were the most successful in interest and attendance ever held in the city. All of the important Jewish Holidays are observed by holding services under the auspices of the Lodge, and a Class of eight boys and girls of the Sunday-school were recently Confirmed on Shebuoth. (Feast of weeks.)

No greater good ever came to the Jewish people of Fairmont, than the I. O. B. B. Lodge established here, and although since its inception the Lodge has been successful beyond its most sanguine expectations, much more is expected to be accomplished for the membership and community in the future.

BELLINGHAM, WASH.

On the return trip of Mr. David N. Mosessohn from Victoria, B. C., where he instituted a new lodge, he visited the newly organized Bellingham Lodge at Bellingham, Wash. At a meeting of the lodge specially called in his honor practically the entire Jewish population was present officially to greet Mr. Mosessohn, representing the President of the District Grand Lodge. A class of candidates was initiated, after which Mr. Mosessohn delivered an address upon the duties of the immigrant Jew in the land of his adoption, calling attention to the necessity of rationally modernizing general old country customs and rising above materialism for the uplift of humanity in general. Others who spoke were Rev. Cohen and L. Verstandig, president of the Lodge.

FORREST CITY, ARK.

A regular meeting of L. Barnett Lodge No. 754, of Forrest City, Ark., was held on June 7, 1914, at which initiation of candidates took place and several propositions for membership were acted upon. SUMMER SCHOOL WORK OF THE JEWISH CHAUTAUQUA.

The Jewish Chautauqua Society is emphasizing another phase of its usefulness and activity in its Summer School work in the Universities. This scope of its effort, inaugurated in 1909, has expanded each year to a marked degree of success and increasing interest.

Rabbi Alex Lyons, of Brooklyn, delivered a course of ten lectures before the University of North Carolina on the subject of "The Prophets." The lectures were attended by professors, teachers and students, the discussions evincing such deep interest that he was invited to preach at the union services, not only before the student body and professors, but to the general community.

Rabbi Harry Ettelson, of Hartford, Conn., gave a course of lectures at the University of Virginia on "The Wisdom Literature," which course proved to be of profound interest.

Rabbi Jacob H. Kaplan, of Terre Haute, Indiana, was at the University of Illinois, and the course of his lectures was "Creative Judaism."

This work of the Society is bringing messages of Jewish life in directions where otherwise obtains a pernicious ignorance on the part of non-Jew.

Similar courses of instruction are to be assigned for the next summer season in various summer schools throughout the country. This, at the request of the United States Commissioner of Education.

B'NAI B'RITH IN THE ORIENT.

A meeting took place some days ago in Constantinople which by its form, debates and decision can be looked upon as a pleasing sign, that by consciously pursuing work the Jewish interest and feeling among the Oriental Jewry may be successfully developed.

This was the meeting of the Great Lodge of B'nai B'rith Order, which has grown to be a small Jewish Congress, and no doubt in time will be the beginning of further energetic work for the welfare of Oriental Judaism.

Besides the presence of the delegates of the Constantinople Lodge of the B'nai B'rith Order, many other representatives of the Lodges of the Balkan States, Asia Minor and Palestine participated at this meeting. The debates and decisions could naturally not be made public, but we dare say the conference found lively interest far beyond the number of participants, and at any rate serves best to strengthen the necessary solidarity feeling of the Jews, which is quite indispensable for our purposes.

The American Ambassador, Mr. Morgenthau, received a deputation of the Great Lodge at his summer residence on the Bosphorus. He also was present at the banquet which finished the Congress, and on this occasion made a speech, in which he expressed once more the strong interest he takes in the development of Judaism in Turkey and Palestine.

Under the most able management of Dr. Niego, the Constantinople Lodge, as well as the Great Lodge, has, considering the short time of its existence, promoted excellent work. Here, where up to the present one could scarcely perceive any signs of modern Jewish work, an attempt has been made for the first time through the Lodge to unite the Jews from all different directions and to keep them together in continued positive work. In fact, that is no unimportant merit these Lodges have gained and must be gladly recognized.

THE JEW AS A CITIZEN.

New York City's mayor, whose official appointments have confirmed his words, has just gone on record in praise of the "idealism, sanity and brilliance" of the Jew, judged by his record as a citizen, civic reformer, journalist, philanthropist, and seeker after knowledge since he first invaded the metropolis in large numbers. With the largest aggregation of representatives of this race of any city of the world, New York naturally becomes the focal center for such adjustments to democratic institutions as are necessary among a people so long disciplined by autocratic rule and subject to discriminations that in the United States are escaped. Consequently, if in New York City, with its congested housing conditions, its allurements and its overwhelming tide of commerce and trade, the verdict is so favorable, it must be even more so in communities where the process of fusion and assimilation can be carried on more readily and where the perspective of life is somewhat different.

Students of contemporary politics in the United States, using the word politics in its higher sense, are solicitous about the relatively larger numerical strength of groups and races that have a history of subjection to political and ecclesiastical authority. The political boss and the advocate of State socialism alike welcome the coming of immigrants that are used to being "controlled" and that have little or no intellectual ambition because it never has been cultivated. Standing out in contradistinction to this attitude of so many immigrants is the Jew, independent and individualistic in temperament, passionately devoted to pursuit of learning, reared in a faith that at its best emphasizes personal and community righteousness and generous in support of agencies that increase knowlege and succor humanity. The political boss is finding him intractable, not easily to be "delivered" en masse. Ecclesiastics who would undermine the public schools find the Jew stanch in defense of them. Statesmen and public officials who want administrators will turn to the race that knows, as the demand grows louder for rationalized methods of government and planned modes of community existence

JUDAISM AND MODERN IDEALS

B'NAI B'RITH FUND FOR WAR SUFFERERS.

We have been asked by several members of the Order whether the B'nai B'rith fund will be used solely for the relief of members of the Order. We are authorized to state that the money is to be used for the relief of all sufferers regardless whether they belong to the Order or not. The fund will be distributed by the officers of the Grand Lodges of the Order in Europe, who are in best position to quickly and properly distribute the fund where most needed.

The Executive Committee has contributed $10,000 to the fund. In Chicago Ramah Lodge No. 33 and Oriental-Hillel Lodge No. 72 and the President of the Order started the subscription list by each donating $1,000. A number of $200 and $100 subscriptions have been reported from individual members. A full list will be published in our next issue.

That the ideals of Christendom are rapidly changing there can be no question. One after another the old theological dogmas, which we supposed were as deeply rooted and as unchangeable as the everlasting hills, are being ruthlessly dumped into the scrap-heap of discredited traditions, because they are no longer tenable by any living faith. Most emphatically is it true today that "from scheme and creed the light goes out." The light is going out of the ancient creeds, because the dominant idea that underlay them was the necessity for individual salvation, to be attained only through reunuciation. The new ideals are social rather than individual. Whereas formerly the salvation of the individual soul for the future was the chief concern, today the salvation of society for the present is regarded as of the highest importance and men are content to leave the salvation of their individual souls to the merciful decision of the "Judge of all the earth" believing that He "cannot but do right."

Today the ascetic ideal no longer commands allegiance. Monastic vows, the hair shirt, flagellation, no longer serve as expressions of the piety of a generation that believes social justice in the present is a more desirable as well as a more attainable goal to strive for than future sainthood. In other words, to quote the statement of a prominent Christian writer of our day, "The goal toward which modern Christendom is striving is not the saved individual, nor the saved church, but a saved world."

And so our home missionaries in the South are today devoting themselves to the eradication of the cattle-tick and the boll-weevil as a means of laying a broad economic foundation for their evangelistic work that is to follow. And our foreign missionaries are teaching sanitation and personal hygiene as preliminary to work that was formerly regarded as exclusively their mission.

With such a change of emphasis has come a corresponding change of watchwords. Instead of world-renunciation, we hear much of world-consecration as the phrase best adapted to express the ideals of an age that is coming to believe with the Second-Isaiah that God's highest call is the call to service.

Now this change of emphasis and this consequent change of watchwords, though new in Christendom is not new in the world's best religious thought. It is certainly as old as Israel's prophets whose ideas are an integral part of our modern Christian thought. Well has Emerson said of them:

'The word unto the prophets spoken;
Was writ on tables yet unbroken;
The word by seers or sibyls told,
In groves of oak or fanes of gold,
Still floats upon the morning wind,
Still whispers to the willing mind."

The prophetic word was a demand for social righteousness. They did not believe the world could be saved except through religion, but they unsparingly condemned [illegible] failed to harmonize religion in its ceremonial aspects with religion in what may be called its social implications. Amos, the first of the "writing prophets," announced amid the revels of the feast at Bethel the impending fall of the Northern Kingdom; and declared that this would be the result, not of a lack of ceremonial godliness, but of social righteousness. "Thus said the Lord: For three transgressions of Israel, yea, for four, I will not turn away the punishment thereof; because they have sold the righteous for silver, and needy for a pair of shoes; that pant after the dust of the earth on the head of the poor, and turn aside the way of the meek." The only hope of averting the ruin that Israel's social sin involves is, he insists, in the inauguration of a new era of social justice. "Seek good and not evil, that ye may live; and so the Lord, the God of hosts shall be with you, as ye say. Hate the evil and love the good and establish justice in the gate: it may be that the Lord, the God of hosts will be gracious unto the remnant of Joseph."

EDWARD CHAUNCEY BALDWIN, PH.D.,
Professor University of Illinois.

The prophets who succeeded Amos were not less insistent than he had been upon the idea that social righteousness is the only thing that God cares about. They, like him, stressed in the religious life, not the creed and ceremonial, but righteous living, without which religion is as nothing. "I desire goodness and not sacrifice," said Hosea, and Jesus liked to quote the words. The book of Isaiah begins with a contemptuous description of the means then in vogue with the ritualists of his day for averting God's wrath. "Wash you and make you clean," he says, "put away the evil of your doings from before my eyes; cease to do evil; learn to do well; seek justice, relieve the oppressed, judge the fatherless, plead for the widow." Micah no less emphatically denies that God "will be pleased with thousands of rams, or with ten thousands of rivers of oil. He hath showed thee, O man, What is good, and what doth Jehovah require of thee but to do justly, and to love kindness, and to walk humbly with thy God?"

Jeremiah, also, regarded the social duties of man as of supreme religious importance. Most emphatic is his assertion that social justice is of more account than Temple worship. "Thus saith the Lord of Hosts," he says, "amend your ways and your doings, and I will cause you to dwell in this place. Trust ye not in lying words saying the temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord are these. For if ye thoroughly amend your ways and your doings; if ye thoroughly execute justice between a man and his neighbor; if ye oppress not the stranger, the fatherless and the widow, and shed not innocent blood in this place, neither walk after other gods to your hurt; then I will cause you to dwell in this place, in the land that I gave to your fathers, from of old even for evermore."

Following the example of the earlier prophets, Ezekiel, the priest-prophet of the Exile, whom we should expect to be less radical than his predecessors, indicated not less clearly than they had done the social importance of religion, and insists no less strenuously upon social ethics in these words: "But if a man be just, and do that which is lawful and right ...... neither hath lifted up his eyes to the idols of the house of Israel, neither hath defiled his neighbor's wife ...... and hath not wronged any, but hath restored to the debtor his pledge, hath spoiled none by violence, hath given his bread to the hungry, and hath covered the naked with a garment; He that hath not given forth upon usury, neither hath taken any increase, that hath withdrawn his hand from iniquity, hath executed true justice between man and man, hath walked in my statutes and hath kept my judgments, to deal truly; he is just, he shall surely live, saith the Lord of Hosts."

The preaching of the prophets never varied in its insistence that religion is in the first place a matter between man and his Maker, then a matter between man and society; that it must inspire men to act justly toward others, and that no people can be called religious that does not demand justice for itself and do justly to others. Even the last of them, those like Malachi, who preached when the Jewish religion had become a book religion, and Judaism had narrowed into a church, when even the prophets had become zealous for the law, for the Temple, and its ritual, were by no means blind to the fact that the national church, with its intolerance and its disregard for social justice could not claim the favor of a holy God, who always regarded the inward and spiritual above the outward and visible. Malachi denounces ecclesiasticism and formal observance of a ceremonial cult, assuring his people that God will be a "witness against the sorcerers, and against the adulterers, and against the false swearers; and against those that oppress the hireling in his wages, the widow and the fatherless and that turn aside the stranger from his right and fear not me, saith the Lord of Hosts." Indeed there is no reason to question the justness of Professor George Adam Smith's assertion, when he says, regarding the teaching of the prophets, "The student of the prophets, as he realizes their equal insistence . . . upon the religious and economic rights of every common citizen and upon the substitution, for confidence in ritual, of the ethical service of men, must recognize principles of which all social philosophies and systems since constructed present only the fragments and details."

For Description of Situation in Portions of Germany and Austro-Hungary See Page 7.

As the earliest exponents of the fundamental truth that religion and ethics are inseparable, that the chief concern of religion is development of character, the equitable adjustment of human relationships, and the conquest of poverty and vice, and that these concerns are pre-requisite to a realization of the long-deferred hope of the kingdom of righteousness on the earth, the prophets made a vital contribution to the most important problem of our day.

Our aims are identical with theirs, for we, also, long for a time when righteousness shall cover the earth as the waters cover the sea. To us in this day, confused in our ideas of what religion really is, and groping blindly for a method of hastening the coming of a better day for humanity, the message of the prophets comes with clarifying power, affirming that religion is to "seek judgment (justice) and relieve the oppressed"; and that until we make society religious in this sense, we shall not realize our ancient hope of the kingdom of God on earth which these men promised.

It is a strange thing to reflect upon that though the site of the holy temple is occupied by a mosque, and the soil of Palestine, sacred alike to Jew and Christian, is in the possession of infidels, and the sceptre seems forever to have departed from Judah, Israel is yet furnishing us with the ideal by which we live.

It would be interesting, were there time, to consider what part, if any, the Jewish race is to play in the future progress of our race. That the Jewish race has played its role completely no thoughtful student of history—one I mean who sees in human history more than an unrelated succession of fortuitous events—can possibly believe. They are the only race that has survived the downfall of its national life. They are the only people who do not believe, and who never have believed, that the religious doctrines of some particular period in its history are the last word on religion. What that last word will be we cannot, of course, forsee but that the race has been preserved to make some further contribution to the spiritual life of the modern world seems absolutely certain. Within the last few years the Jewish race in this country has passed through an amazing transition. We have in America now about a million Jews most of whom have come here, after walking through the fiery furnace of European persecution. On their arrival they did just what one would expect people to do who felt themselves suddenly emancipated. They threw to the winds all the old restraints. They followed the apostolic injunction at

WESTERN RECORDER ATTACKS JEWS

Anti-Delamation League replies

Anti-Defamation League,

September 16, 1914.

The Editor, The Western Recorder,
Louisville, Ky.

Dear Sir: In a recent issue of The Western Recorder appeared an article under the caption "The Jew as a Social Factor." The author of the same has made accusations against an entire people, which, if truthful, would indicate a most serious state of affairs. He has fallen into the too common error of accepting as true general misconceptions, and by specious logic has given to these the authenticity of established facts. We assume that the author, as well as those interested in your publication, have no desire to disseminate false accusations against any people in this land, or to defame their character or repute. We assume further that you will welcome any suggestions which may point out to you the fallacies to which you have unconsciously given publication. If we deemed that the article was fathered by any ill will or improper motive, we assure you that we would not have written to you in the spirit which pervades this communication.

First, you charge "in all the great movements that make for the moral uplift of mankind, he (the Jew) is reactionary, first, last and at all times." This is a severe and wholesale indictment,—an indictment so broad and sweeping in its extent that it bears the badge of inaccuracy upon its very face. If you have read understandingly the history of every revolution, you have found that Jewish manhood and genius were always at the forefront, battling in the cause of humanity. In the great and bitter struggles of Europe to wrest from despotism the liberties of the people, you have found the Jew in the midst of battle. The greatest economic revolution of Europe was founded by Karl Marx and Ferdinand Lasalle, two Jews; and in the great struggle of Germany, combating the tyrannic ideas of Bismarck, you have Lasker, a Jew; in France, battling for the advancement of liberty, you have Crimieux, a Jew; and in England, uniting the people of the British Empire under a constitutional government, you have Disraeli, the son of a Jew.

The men, whom we have mentioned, are but a few of those who rose to preeminence in these world struggles. In this country, we find Jews in the early days of the Revolution, struggling to make this the ideal land of liberty. When the great question of slavery overshadowed our country, the Jew was found with his fellow-citizens; thus, Isaac M. Wise with Beecher, and Judah B. Benjamin with Davis. In the great agitation against white slavery, which has recently swept over our country, the Jewish organizations were in the forefront. Their work did not cease with the passage of resolutions. They entered energetically into the campaign; and it was a Jewish organization, the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, which drafted and had inscribed recently upon the statutes of the various states stringent general laws, putting an end to this nefarious traffic. We take it for granted that these were all great movements that make for the moral uplift of mankind.

When you drafted this accusation you, undoubtedly, had in mind the statement made by you that the Jew generally will be found opposed to prohibition. Even if your conclusion in this regard be correct, it certainly is not sufficient foundation for sweeping generalities which condemn an entire people. On the contrary, a careful analyst would see that there are several very good reasons why the Jew has not been more actively lined up with the forces that have fought for prohibition. A large majority of them believe that prohibition does not prohibit, and that perhaps it may not be the best way of solving the problem. You are undoubtedly aware of the fact that alcoholism is practically an unknown quantity among the Jews. There are so few Jewish drunkards that it has never appealed to the Jew as a problem of prohibition, but rather as a problem of education, and of control. A great many of the Jews believe that a stronger manhood can be created by compelling self-restraint, and by the exercise of moral force than by prohibitory laws. Another cause, and one which you have evidently not taken into consideration, is that a very large part of the Jewish population of this country comes from Germany, Austria and Russia, and upon [illegible] they are naturally aligned with the people of those countries. It is a rare exception to see a German, or an Austrian or a Russian who believes in prohibition, and yet would it not be the height of folly to say that the German or the Austrian is against the moral uplift of mankind?

Your further implication is that money lenders and usurers, as a rule, are Jews, and that they are "proverbial for their pawn-broking propensities." This general statement is in the same class with the comparison frequently heard, "he is as rich as a Jew." It requires but a most cursory examination to show that Jews, as a people, are among the most poverty stricken in this country. The per capita Jewish wealth in this country is less than the per capita wealth of any other religious sect, except the negro churches. The charge that you make is frequently heard, and is but the result of the tendency so often encountered, to charge the shortcoming of an insignificant minority of the Jewish people against all Jews. If some Jews in Russia are money lenders, it is due not to a desire to pursue a parasitical vocation, but to the brutal regulations and restrictions of the Russian government, which prevent them from pursuing any other calling. That the charge is untrue, so far as it applies to American Jews generally, was most strikingly disclosed about two years ago, when the Chicago Tribune conducted an active campaign against money lenders and usurers. Their investigations disclosed that practically all of them, especially those most merciless in their pursuit of unfortunate debtors, were non-Jews, and the majority of them women. You can readily verify this fact by going through the files of the Tribune of that period, or by writing to the editor of the paper.

Another misconception is that most Jews are merchants or tradesmen; while the Jew does, to some extent, engage in these pursuits, and has a large representation in the commercial life, it is also true that the vast majority of Jews is engaged in handicraft. The Jew is found in large numbers in the factories of the large cities. Jewish artisans outnumber those engaged in other vocations manifold. The fact that the Jew has not in the past been an agriculturist is not his fault. It was un-Christian treatment by Christians which forced him from the land and made him a tradesman and an artisan. For centuries and centuries the Jew was prohibited by Christian nations from owning or leasing land or from tilling the soil, just as today he is restricted in Russia. He was forced by the laws of Christian despots to eke out an existence in the mart of the world and if by reason of these persecutions his intellect has been sharpened and he has been made a financial genius, as you charge, why should Christians then blame him for these characteristics, which persecution and intolerance have developed?

You further state: "The more we have studied the question, the more we have been persuaded that the persecutions of this people have not been altogether undeserved." We did not know that true Christianity ever espoused persecution in any form. We did not know that a true Christian would ever be persuaded to lend his support to persecution. In fact, this part of your article seems as though it were taken from the pages of the Apologists of the Spanish Inquisition and not the thought of the modern American Christian. If you desire really to inform yourself upon the subject matter, of which you write, we would advise that you study "Jewish Ethics," by Lazarus; and if you wish a full and accurate treatise upon the cause of persecution of the Jews, we advise you to study "Antisemitism, Its History and Causes," by Bernard Lazare.

In conclusion, you ascribe all of the delinquencies referred to in the article to the irreligious attitude of the Jews in this country. You state that "As a race they have ceased to be a religious people." If this be true, it is but an illustration of the tendency which exists in all religious denominations today, and if your logic were correct, the same consequences will follow as to non-Jews as well as Jews.

We believe, that instead of Jews being reactionary in matters that make for the uplift of mankind, they are always to be found in the vanguard; that when eventually the greatest of all moral movements will have been solved, so that universal peace will reign over this world; so that Christian nation will no longer battle against Christian nation, and will not desecrate the most sacred of all things, by asking the benign blessing of the Almighty Father on their murderous arms; that the Jew, in his love for his fellow men, will eventually fulfil his mission and bring peace to all the world. If his dispersion throughout the world and his suffering under bitter persecutions for centuries shall have eventually been productive of the establishment of universal peace, then indeed his mission will not have been in vain.

Respectfully,
EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE,
Sig. Livingston, Chairman.

YOUNG JUDAEA AND HADASSAH TO CO-OPERATE.

Hadassah, the national organization of Zionist women and Young Judaea, the department on junior organization of the Federation of American Zionists, have adopted plans of co-operation for the season's activities.

The Culture Committee of Hadassah, which contemplates opening a school to train women for Zionist work, will affiliate this group of women with the Zionist Training School, established by Young Judaea to prepare young people for future leadership in the Zionist movement. Four groups of this school will be established in New York, others will be opened in Baltimore, Boston and Newark.

Last year a successful dramatic performance was given by both organizations. Another performance in co-operation is being contemplated this year. A dramatic circle of young people is now being organized to produce a new Zionist play in English.

Hadassah plans to render substantial assistance to Young Judaea by urging its members to engage in the various forms of Young Judaea activity.

Young Judaea will take steps to acquaint its older circles of girls, throughout the country, with the activities conducted by Hadassah as a preparation for future membership in Hadassah.

Until such time, these circles will be advised to participate in the activities of Hadassah, wherever possible. At this time they will be urged to sew garments needed by the nurses of Hadassah engaged in district nursing in Jerusalem.

Young Judaea has opened the way to having its circles participate in the open meetings of Hadassah. The entertainments of the circles will be visited and the best numbers may be selected for the programs.

A joint committee of both organizations will be appointed to take charge of National Fund work on Flower Day.

This policy of co-operation will be later supplemented by other plans of activity.

THE PRINCE BISHOP OF HUNGARY AND THE JEWS.

Dr. Johann Csernich, the Prince Bishop of Hungary, recently became a Cardinal. The Jewish community of Gran, where the prelate resides sent a delegation to congratulate him. In his response to the address delivered by Dr. Moritz Aldroi, the leader of the delegation, the Cardinal pointed to the fact that in many places he is designated as a friend of the Jews, which does not displease him in the slightest degree. He acknowledged it openly, he said, that it is his conviction that the Jews have always rendered distinguished cultural and economic services in the Hungarian fatherland for the benefit of the general public, that he would at all times strive to maintain peace among the different confessions and whenever he noticed an endeavor to disturb this peace, he would always work against it to the best of his ability. In his sermons, the Cardinal continued, he often mentions the fact how devoted the Jews are to their religion and how they are always ready to bring the greatest sacrifices. He would be very glad if every Catholic family would follow this beautiful example.

The Cardinal conversed for some time with the members of the delegation and showed himself to be fully familiar with the conditions prevailing in the Jewish community of Gran.

AN HONOR RECORD.

The Jewish Chronicle of London is compiling a full list of all Jews in the British Empire who are serving during the war and at the end of the war when the list is completed the roll of the names will be printed on the finest of art paper and a bound copy will be submitted to the king for his acceptance.

RUSSIA REMOVING EMIGRATION DIFFICULTIES.

The "American Hebrew" states that a cable dispatch to the United States from St. Petersburg announces that a bill has been introduced into the Russian cabinet by the minister of commerce providing for the reduction in the cost of passports for a nominal sum, and abolishing the heavy fines inflicted upon returning citizens who have been away for more than six months, provided that the latter use Russian ships. Hitherto a passport for travel abroad cost about £3.

FREEDOM FOR THE RUSSIAN JEW.

The London Standard publishes the following report of its correspondent at Petrograd:

Jews will in future be admitted as officers of the Russian army and navy.

The announcement of this important change in the position of the Jews in the Russian Empire is made on official authority, and has been well received in all quarters.

Up to the present no Jew has ever been allowed to be a military or naval officer. The decision to admit them to the highest ranks of both services is officially stated to be due to the gallantry which Jews serving as common soldiers have displayed in the battles already fought.

An Imperial decree has enabled the Russian commander-in-chief to confer officers' commissions on several hundred Jews who gained exceptional distinction in the fighting that preceded the capture of Lemberg.

I am authorized to state that the admission of Jews as officers of the army and navy will be followed in due course by the removal of civil law restrictions on members of the Hebrew community. The pale will be swept away, and Jews will be admitted to full rights of Russian citizenship.

Those Russian newspapers which were formerly advocates of a relentless anti-Semitism not only refrain from raising any objection to this startling innovation, but express their approval in the warmest terms.

I find that the same feeling prevails in those circles of Russian society in which it was formerly almost a breach of etiquette even to mention the name of a Jew. The war has swept away this particular remnant of medieval barbarism, and has inaugurated a new era for the Jews of Russia.

NEW COMMERCE TREATY WITH CZAR A POSSIBILITY.

The following telegram appeared in the secular press:

Russia's manifestation of friendship for the United States expressed in her announced intention of signing a peace commission treaty may lead to negotiations for a new treaty of commerce and navigation between the two countries to replace the one abrogated during the Taft administration.

This was the view of many diplomats and officials when it became known that Secretary Bryan had received word of the intention of the Russian government to negotiate a treaty along the same lines as those with Great Britain, France, Spain and China, reported favorably by the senate today.

These treaties would submit all disputes that cannot be settled by diplomacy to a permanent commission for investigation during a period of one year and are regarded by the Washington government as a practical safeguard against the sudden outbreak of war.

Officials expressed the view that Russia's reported modification of stringent regulations against the Jews, because of their loyalty to the government in its struggle in the present European war, might pave the way for an understanding for a new treaty.

CONCESSIONS BY RUSSIAN MINISTER OF EDUCATION.

M. Kasso, the reactionary Russian minister of education, has announced that he will discontinue the system of balloting for Jewish pupils desiring to enter the preparatory classes of the Gymnasia (high schools). Furthermore, when there are vacancies, Jewish pupils may proceed from the preparatory class into the first class without ballot.

The mayor of Zhitomir has telegraphed to the Jewish Duma deputy, Friedman, to assist him in effecting that Jewish pupils in the high schools of Zhitomir shall be accepted without any percentage norm.

BY PROF. GOTTHARD DEUTSCH, Ph.D.

X.

Our conception of history has considerably changed. While formerly it was considered sufficient to gather the external data of people's biography, especially of those who occupy a prominent position, we, owing to our more democratic conception of life, have learned to appreciate the importance of the life of the masses, and became interested in the daily affairs of their existence. This, however, is an exceedingly difficult study, because the material has to be gathered from occasional references in the most different sources. In illustration of these remarks, a few scattered instances shall follow.

A trial, similar to that of Ephraim Pashkoff in Fàstov near Kiev, took place in Prague in 1694. It is not directly connected with the subject that I wish to present, but it is needed to illustrate my statement on the difficulty of gathering sources, and it is in itself interesting. Lazarus Abeles of Prague was accused of having killed his son Simon, a boy of twelve years, because the latter was desirous to become a Christian. Prague was in those days in the hands of a Catholic reaction, led by the Jesuits. Since 1620, when the battle on the While Mountain decided the defeat of Protestantism, the House of Hapsburg employed the dragoons on one hand, the Jesuits on the other, to crush out all vestiges of the Reformation. The devices of the Jesuits were of the most various kinds. One of their schemes was to keep the mob in good humor by an occasional Jew-baiting, and a little miracle connected with it. So the body of this little boy was disinterred, kept for several weeks without being embalmed in a perfect state of preservation, even issuing fresh blood, a regulation miracle in the case of saints. It is very difficult for us to obtain the real facts. We have nothing from the Jewish standpoint, and the documents in the archives, if they are still in existence, have not been studied. For the present our information on the whole incident is the same, if we were to write the story of the trial of Mendel Beiliss from the reports in "Nowoye Wremya." The result was, what could be foreseen, Lazarus Abels, knowing that there was no hope for him, committed suicide by hanging himself in his prison cell, while his supposed accomplice, Levi Kurtzhandl, was tortured to death in a manner in which the Jesuits were past masters, and when every bone in his body was broken, he, so at least the Jesuit author tells us, expressed the desire of becoming a Christian. We was baptized, received the coup de grace from the executioner, and the assembled crowd joined in singing "Te Deum."

This is, however, not the story which I was to tell. One of the principal witnesses against Lazarus Abeles was his servant girl, Sarah Uresin—which very likely means "Sarah the daughter of Aaron-Ures"—Sarah had turned Christian, not in order to be safe against being tried as accomplice, nor because she was unduly influenced by the Christian family, to whom she had been confided to prevent collusion, but because, seeing the cruelty of the Jews, she had learned to appreciate the idea of Christian love. This, however, is also beside the question. In the course of her cross examination, we learn that the family of her employer, consisting of husband, wife, and at least two children—the statement on this point is not clear—and a servant, lived in two rooms. One of these rooms was also used as a shop by Lazarus, who was a glove maker. The servant was paid one gulden (40 cents) a quarter.

Still worse is a condition reported to us nearly a hundred years later, 1782, from Frankfort, a.M. Frummet, a girl of fifteen, had killed her employer, a lonely old widow. The girl was so ignorant that one might call her semi-idiotic, and had been treated by her employer with incredible cruelty. Just as an illustration of the general condition, it may be stated that her wish to be attended by Jewish women on the place of exceution was denied, but two Lutheran ministers accompanied her to the last moment, with the hope of saving her soul for heaven. Frummet, so we learned from the proceedings, received as wages two gulden per annum, and one pair of shoes. Her employer lived in one room, and this room had to be vacated in the morning, for it was rented out to a teacher who taught a class of boys in Talmud.

It is understood that these conditions must be considered in connection with the price of commodities, but these again tell us the lesson of the valuation of labor. We possess little information on the salaries of rabbis and teachers. In the beginning of the seventeenth century, we have a contract made by the congregation of Frankfort, a.M., with Isaiah Horowitz, one of the leading rabbis of his day. The family, as the name indicates, came from Bohemia, but Rabbi Isaiah was called to Frankfort from Ostrog, Volhynia. A few years later he was elected rabbi of Prague, and thence, about 1630, emigrated to Palestine, where he spent the remainder of his days. In Frankfort Rabbi Isaiah received a salary of six reichsthalers a week. A salary of $4.50 a week is surely not very liberal in our days, but we have to consider two things. We would have to know the price of a pound of meat, a pound of flour, and a quart of milk, before passing an opinion. In addition, we also must not forget that in those days the salary was not the only consideration. Quite aside from the fact that there may have been idealists, even amongst the European rabbis in the seventeenth century, political questions played a prominent part. Jews would never have flocked to Poland in such numbers had it not been the country, where in spite of all anarchy, there was at least a freedom of movement, and especially a freedom from guilds, and consequently more room for business activity. About a century later, the rabbi of the Ashkenazim congregation in Amsterdam, Zebi Ashkenazi, receives a salary of a thousand reichsthaler per annum. In 1714, having held his office for four years, he emigrated to Poland, and was finally elected rabbi of Lemberg. Here, however, personal motives were responsible for this change. The rabbi had become involved in difficulties with the Portuguese congregation, partly because he performed the unpleasant task of unmasking a fraud, who posed as a victim of spite, and partly because he was of a domineering temper, which even in the eighteenth century was not quite the thing to procure for a rabbi popularity. At any rate, when a man with a family of ten children was looking for a proper field for his activity, Poland offered two hundred years ago the same prospect which America would offer today.

It may in time be possible to study economic conditions on the hands of such salary. For the present our information on this subject is rather meager. As early as the sixteenth century, Rabbi Obadiah da Bertinoro, an Italian, denounces the German rabbis for their greed, and calls them blackguards, and highway robbers, because they charge ten ducats for the chief rabbi and one or two ducats for the witnesses when acting on a divorce case. Such perquisites will naturally have to be taken into consideration, when we discuss questions of compensation. One must not forget, either, that a rabbi, up to the end of the eighteenth century, acted as judge on all civil cases, and he obtained fees in accordance with the sum under dispute. The same was the case in marriages when the rabbi drew up the contract, and received a certain percentage of the dower. I therefore, could only give real information on cases within my personal recollection, or within the recollection of the old people whom I knew. Our old rabbi, Marcus Trieschet, elected in 1830, received a salary of 160 gulden ($75) per annum. In his later years, he was voted a raise of forty gulden on account of the high price of commodities (theuerungszulage). When afterwards he objected to the appointment of the school principal, David Loewy, as preacher, he was occasionally threatened that this allowance would be withdrawn. Of course there were the perquisites. The rabbi preached two official sermons, one on the Sabbath preceding Passover, and the second on the Sabbath preceding Yom Kippur. It was customary then to send them presents, mostly of victuals. Anyone who claimed a standing in the community, would send the rabbi some present in money on Purim, and about Rosh Hashanah. The number of marriages in a community of six hundred souls could not have averaged more than five, especially when we consider that some of these marriages had to be ignored by the rabbi, on account of the restrictive laws, but even these fees were a welcome addition to the meager salary. Another source of income, evidently derived from Roman Catholic practices, was the study of the Mishnah. During the first month after a death, and occasionally during the whole year, rich people would request the rabbi to study a chapter from the Mishnah every day, after which a prayer was offered for the soul of the departed. The same would be done on Jahrzeit. The history of this custom has, to my knowledge, not been studied. I take it that it originated from an imitation of the Catholic idea of mass. The well known story which gives us the first mention of the practice of reciting Kaddish for the dead, is found in the thirteenth century. It tells us that Rabbi Akiba met a ghost on a cemetery, gathering kindling. Upon inquiry the ghost said that he had to gather his own kindling for the fire in which he was burned, and upon further inquiry he said that if his son would publicly offer prayer in the synagogue, he would he released. Thus the Kaddish expressing the hope in the realization of the Kingdom of God, part of which is the resurrection of the dead, originally a prayer of comfort for the mourners, became a prayer for the dead. The growth of mysticism in the sixteenth century gave to the Mishnah, which is a plain code of laws, a different meaning. Its study in the opinion of the Kabbalists raised the soul to a higher level, and therefore, could be made to benefit the souls of the departed. It may be that unconsciously, or subconsciously this practice was inspired by charitable motives, as a delicate way to assist poor scholars, who thus were made to feel that they did something in return for the gift which they received. At any rate it had such effect and rabbis in small communities obtained in this way a small side income.

Another source of income which in my own days, and probably also in the two generations preceding me, had become extinct, was the fee received by the rabbi in his capacity as judge. Up to the end of the eighteenth century the rabbinical law regulated the relation of Jews in all civil affairs. The Schulhan Aruk prohibits, under severe penalty that a Jew carry his affairs before a secular tribunal. It must be admitted that this law was more honored in the breach than in the practice, but the rabbi usually acted as a court of the first instance. With the growing ideas of religious toleration, which regarded the Jew as part and parcel of the body politic, this practice was abandoned. In Austria the great liberator Joseph II. (1780-1790), abolished the rabbinical tribunals. But tradition and the fear of the expense and delay of court trial brought Jews still quite often to the rabbi for a decision in accordance with "the judgment of the Torah." Larger communities had a regular court, consisting of the rabbi as presiding officer (Rosh Bet Bin) and two assistants (Dayanim). Prague had even a court of appeal called the "Appellanten." Our little community had no regular assistant rabbi, and in a case which required a court, the rabbi had to select two learned lay members as assistants. My father still acted as assistant to Rabbi Trieschet in a dispute between two partners, but the rabbi was very careful not to involve himself in trouble, and before rendering sentence, said that while the law of the state prohibited the enforcement of the rabbinical law, he gave his decision as a religious advice. The income from such sources cannot have been very large. Outside of the salary and the regular gift sent at the season of Purim and the Fall holidays, the perquisites must have been very small. I am quite sure it would be a generous estimate, were we to assume that the annual income of a rabbi of Kanitz. with its six hundred souls, amounted to $350 per annum. Boskowitz, the second largest congregation in Moravia, with about four hundred legally recognized families, gave to Rabbi Abraham Placzek, when he was elected in 1840, an annual salary of four hundred florins, to which were added some allowances for Passover, and for the Fall holidays. In addition he receives an Ethrog and a Lulav on Succoth, a seat in the woman's synagogue for his wife, and the right to be "called up" to the Torah on every Sabbath and holyday. The famous Rabbi Akiba Eger, when elected to his first position in Maerkich Friedland, West Prussia, in 1791, receives a monthly salary of twelve Thalers ($9) and three Thalers each for his sermons on the Sabbath preceding the Passover and Yom Kippur. For Passover he receives wine and flour—in those days everybody baked his own Matzos—as much as he needs. From every wedding he is guaranteed two per cent of the first 100 Thalers, and one per cent of every 100 Thalers more of the bride's dower. Of estates, which he as rabbi, has to probate, he receives two thirds of a per cent. He also gets his Ethrog and Lulav free. For the winter months he receives three "Stein" of tallow for candles. As judge at the election of congregational trustees, he also receives a fee of three Thalers, once every three years. Additional inducements are the right to be called up to the Torah on one Sabbath every month and on the holydays with the proviso that on Shabuoth, and on the Sabbath preceding the Ninth of Ab, he shall have the privilege of reading the Haphtarah. Twenty years later the rabbi declared that his income was not sufficient to meet even two-thirds of the requirement of his household. The congregation then votes him 12 thalers a week, and 250 thalers in the case of the marriage of every child.

Some occasional sources of income are so typical, that I feel they ought to be remembered. Rabbi Trieschet, as I said, was elected in 1830. The most important duty of the rabbi then was to teach Talmud. Usually the congregation stipulated in the contract how many boys it would support so that the rabbi should have a class. To the members of the local community the election of the rabbi was as important as a high school would be today. My father was in 1830 eleven years old, and his father was looking forward to the newly elected rabbi as saving him the necessity of sending his boy out of town. The rabbi taught his class every morning. There was no regular curriculum as there was no office hour for any other duties. It so happened that a woman had the misfortune of finding some difficulty in a goose that she had fattened. These conditions are so remote from the knowledge of our present age, that a little explanation will be necessary. The Jewish kitchen is considerably hampered by the dietary laws. One of the greatest difficulties is the prohibition of using butter for frying meat and therefore the goose fat is an important item in the larder, if this word may be used. It was therefore the ambition of every good housekeeper to fatten geese during the winter, and lay in a sufficient quantity of goose fat for the year. For this purpose the geese were kept in narrow cages, and fed twice a day. The greatest happiness for a housekeeper was to tell her neighbors on Sabbath about the wonderful goose which she had killed Thursday night. "Mirle," said Cheile, "such a goose you have never seen in your life. She weighed every bit of twelve and a half pound." Mirle curled her lips. "Twelve and a half pounds is good weight, but mine, she replied, "weighed fourteen, and a skin as white as snow, and she had fully four 'Seidel' fat." If it happened—and this happened often — that this miraculous goose showed an inflammation of the esophagus or was afflicted with the absence of the gall, or showed a bruised leg, the question had to be submitted to the rabbi for a decision, and Cheilie or Mirle waited with great anxiety for the opinion of the rabbi, which decided on the four weeks of hard, hard work in producing this marvelous goose. Such a case was presented to Rabbi Trieschet. He shook his head, curled his lips, rubbed his hands, murmured the usual chant of the Talmud student, took out one book after another and finally with a sigh of relief, said to the girl who had brought the goose, "Tell the missus that if it would not have been such a fine goose it would never have been kosher." After a while the girl returned, with the thanks of the missus, and presented the rabbi the liver, which indeed was a masterpiece of goose products. The rabbi overjoyed, said to his boys, "Come out to the kitchen, and I'll show you how a liver must be roasted, if no fat shall be lost." For the explanation of this lesson, I must add that according to the rabbinical law, liver is to be treated more strictly than any other part of the animal. While the blood is removed from meat by soaking, salting and washing, the liver must be roasted on open fire, as naturally it requires an art to prevent its being burned, or losing too much of its fat. The boys missed their Talmud lesson on that morning, but they had learned something, which was supposed to help them in their future life.

The men who spend all their time reading the Bible will be surprised when they get to heaven and find that the men who always paid their bills are occupying reserved seats in front.

JEWISH CRIMINAL LAW

By Milton Marks of San Francisco

(An address delivered at the Western Assembly of the Jewish Chautauqua at Los Angeles, Cal., on July 21, 1914.)

In this modern age of discovery and invention, an age remarkable not only for its mechanical advance but also for its sociological activity and investigation, I approach the subject of Jewish criminal law somewhat with a feeling of apprehension and with a full realization that it possesses for many persons little more than an esoteric interest. Not that the general subject of criminal law and criminology does not occupy a large part of the public attention. Not that the social consciousness is not fully aroused to the need for reform in matters criminal. But our demand has been for the modern, scientific treatment of problems. We wish our attitude to be determined by twentieth century results based upon twentieth century investigations. We look to the Munsterbergs and the Lombrosos for guidance and not to ancient conceptions of criminal jurisprudence. In many ways this is well, for the backwardness of the criminal law has been largely the result of an adherence, in many cases a desirable, but in others a blind adherence to the conceptions of the past, and whatever progress has been made, has come largely as the result of an acceptance of a more modern point of view with respect to crime and the criminal. I do believe, however, that a presentation of Jewish criminal law with special reference to capital punishment will be of some value from an historic or archaelogical point of view, while it is my hope that it may shed some light upon the analogies which exist between modern criminal law and ancient and the points of similitude and variance.

It is essential that full realization be had of the fact that Jewish criminal law finds its roots deep down in the Mosaic legislation. This is true not only of the criminology of the Pentateuch but also of the criminal jurisprudence of the later periods of Jewish history with which I am more particularly concerned. The Mishnah, as we shall see, shows a remarkable development over the conceptions of criminal law exemplified in the Decalogue and elsewhere in the Book of Exodus, but it is firmly based upon those sources. Later periods of Jewish history, that is to say, the period of the Sanhedrin, show an advance but not an utter breaking away—an effort to temper justice with mercy, but not utterly to abandon the ancient conceptions of the fundamentals in criminal law. A proper understanding of the Mosaic legislation is therefore a condition precedent to a presentation of the criminal law of the Sanhedrin.

The Decalogue is, of course, the starting point in the direct presentation of the Mosaic legislation, with its adjurations "Thou shalt not kill," "Thou shalt not steal" and the amplifications of these commandments. Upon the basis of the Decalogue, upon the foundation of these eternal statements of the living truth, the judgments recorded in the twenty-first chapter of Exodus proceed. These judgments constitute what one may term the criminal code of the Pentateuch, for in chapters 21, 22 and 23 of Exodus we have set out before us, definitely and precisely, the particular punishments to be meted out for the various offenses known to the then-existing criminal law. These offenses were of two general classifications, one, those of a capital nature, punishable by death, the other, those offenses punishable by fines of money compensation. In the case of murder, the murderer was either put to death outright or pursued by the avenger of blood. From the idea of the avenger of blood arose the institution of the six cities of refuge described in Numbers XXXV. In certain crimes against the person, such as mutilation and other bodily injuries, the "lex talionis" was inforced. This law of "like for like" we find set forth in Exodus XXI to the effect that the criminal law for crimes against the person is to be administered upon the basis of "life for life, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot." Such a conception, which to us of today seems barbarous and inhumane in the extreme, although even among our advanced criminologists we find those who advocate a return in part to the "lex talionis," finally gave place to a system of money fine and compensation and although we find the Sadducees in the later Jewish Commonwealth interpreting literally the Mosaic law, there was eventually substituted punishment by money compensation, of which mention must later be made. For crimes against property under the Mosaic law, the punishment was administered by the imposition of a money fine and the payment of a compensation to the plaintiff.

I desire to direct your attention to certain significant elements of the Jewish law of the Mosaic period. In the first place, so far as the Pentateuch affords us any authority as a source of information, the exact procedure for the trial of a defendant accused of a crime coming within the purview of the law, is uncertain. There is indeed, everywhere repeated, the requirement that for conviction on a criminal charge, the valid testimony of two eye-witnesses shall be necessary. But further than that I have been unable to discover in the Pentateuch, an exposition of the methods of procedure in criminal trials. A second element worthy of mention is the existence of the avenger of blood, generally a relative of the deceased whose analogy is to be discovered in the avenger of blood of the fatalistic Greek drama. We thrill at a presentation of the Orestes, pursuing, ever pursuing, the murderess of his father, with intent to avenge with death and finally by an all-swaying fate himself pursued by the Eumenides. We derive from such a presentation a dramatic thrill of blood-curdling horror, but we little realize that this idea is to be found not alone in a doubtful mythology, but also among the actualities of early Jewish criminology. The third characteristic of the criminal law of the Biblical period is the "lex talionis," alreadv alluded to. Finally, I direct your attention to the existence in the Mosaic jurisprudence of the custom of extending punishment not to the culprit himself alone but even to his relatives. You will recall that it is set forth in the Decalogue that the divine wrath shall extend for "the iniquity of the fathers" to "the children unto the third and fourth generation." This portion of the Decalogue was literally interpreted in the administration of the criminal law of the Pentateuchal period in such a manner that punishment for an offense was not confined to the immediate criminal alone but extended to his family. Thus we find Joshua literally obeying the Mosaic law in his punishment of Achan for his transgression by stoning not Achan, the real culprit alone, but his sons and daughters, who, so far as we can discern, were innocent of any wrong-doing. In like manner David puts to death all but one of the descendants of Saul.

It is upon a foundation of such a criminal code as this, which, I realize, I have presented all too inadequately, that the criminal jurisprudence of the later Jewish commonwealth is erected. We cannot too fully appreciate this fact. While I am mainly concerned with the period of the Sanhedrin, I would have you realize that the Mosaic law was fundamental to it in this respect, that nothing was punishable as a crime by the Sanhedrin which was not an act barred and banned as criminal by the Pentateuch. The Pentateuch, in other words, was a criminal code in that it enumerated punishable offenses. Beyond that, it was of little service in the criminology of the Sanhedrin.

No law is static. Even the changeless laws of the Medes and Persians are the result of a vast development. The cold, lifeless statement of the substantive and adjective law is the embodiment of an evolution, a change, a progression. The law never halts. It is the subject of constant judicial interpretation and modification. This is true no less of Jewish criminal law than of other systems. In what way did the law progress? What characteristics were to be found in the system which obtained at the time of the Sanhedrin which are not to be discovered in the Mosaic system? What elements were added, what features disappeared? These are questions with which we must now closely concern ourselves.

The development in Jewish criminal law was largely the result of the employment on the part of those empowered to interpret and administer the law of certain "legal devices." We may best understand the connotation of this term by reference to an analogous element to be found in two other legal systems. In the Civil Law of the Romans, the hard and fast rules of the Code were modified by the use of the legal "fictio" or fiction. That is to say, the forms of law were adhered to but an interpretation was so placed upon the terms as to do substantial justice. We find this element existing in the English Common Law in the use of the "legal fiction" by the courts to adjust the rigid rules of the law to changing conditions. This is a device known to all students of the law. It is not to be regarded as an evasion of the law. It is far from that. It is an adjustment of the law, based upon the idea that although the rules of law, as such, may be left immutable in terminology, the changing conditions of society demand an interpretation, a modification, a change by those who adjudicate, in order that the dead hand of the law shall not stultify and fail to do that which it is designed to accomplish, to do justice between man and man. This process was not unknown to the Jewish criminal law. We find the germ of it in the interpretation by Samuel of the prohibition against labor on the Sabbath to permit the waging of a defensive battle on the day of rest. To do this, Samuel employed a legal device to interpret Leviticus 18, "Ye shall therefore keep my statutes and my judgments which if a man do, he shall live in them," to countenance fighting on the Sabbath in defense of one's life. The same device is used in Judges to permit marriage of the Israelitish women to the Benjaminites, in contravention of a prohibition against such unions, by the arrangement that the Benjaminites shall seize their future wives, seemingly with opposition. In short, it is the use of the legal device by the legalists of the age, a device analogous to the "fictio" of the Roman law and the "fiction" of the Common Law, which made possible a development away from the iron-bound rigor of the Pentateuchal law.

As a resultant of those forces which made for progress and development, the criminal law of the later commonwealth differed from that of the Pentateuch in the following respects. In the first place the avenger of blood has no longer a place in the system. Again, there has been developed, as we shall later discern, a definite system of procedure for the trial of criminal cases. Finally, the custom of visiting the sins of the fathers upon the children has become, if not a forgotten institution, at least one characterized by innocuous desuetude.

The administration of the criminal law possesses in great measure, the element of a dramatic spectacle. To the layman, it is the startling testimony, the floribund oratory of opposing counsel, the breathless anxiety that awaits the solemn filing in of the jury, that is of moment and consequence. The theory of the law is of little importance, apparently. Quite naturally this attitude is erroneous. But it is not to be supposed that we can have an utter disregard of the more objective elements of criminal law. It is the modus operandi which often sheds light upon the subjective, and it is for that reason, that my object in presenting an exposition of the Jewish criminal law, at the period at which we have now arrived, namely, the era of the Sanhedrin, is to portray, not the more subtle points of the criminal law, not so much the subjective as the objective, not so much the theory as the practice.

It were invidious in a gathering such as this to attempt a presentation with any sort of elaboration of the central court of criminal, as well as other, jurisdiction, namely, the Sanhedrin. So far as it concerns my field of interest at the moment, be it sufficient to say that, with respect to the administration of the criminal law in the Jewish state, the Sanhedrin was composed of twenty-three judges for the consideration of the chief offenses, and of three of their number for the trial of the offenses of lesser degree. All trials were held before the larger body of its subdivision. It is not to be thought that these two courts were courts of appeal, one to the other. Each was a court of original and final jurisdiction. Before this assembly of the elders, or wise men of the age, shall we behold the accused person tried for breaches of the contemporary criminal law.

The nature of the offense must first engage our attention. Based upon a reasonable understanding of the law and not upon a sense of arbitrariness, the offenses known to the Sanhedrin may best be classified under two general subdivisions, one class embracing those crimes punishable by penalties less severe than death, the other those offenses punishable by the supreme penalty.

You will recall that I mentioned the gradual relinquishment of the conception of the "lex talionis" and the substitution therefor of a system of money compensation and fines for personal injuries. Under the regime of the Sanhedrin this system, which is somewhat analogous to the "wer-geld" of early Teutonic law, reached its fullest culmination. The plaintiff was compensated in money for his injury, allowance being made for the pain occasioned to him, for the pecuniary loss attendant upon stoppage of work, for cost of cure and even for shame and humiliation. It is interesting to note, although this is neither the time nor the place to expatiate, in how many respects these rabbis of the Later Commonwealth anticipated the most modern of our modern legalists in the administration of the law of personal injuries. But, as may readily be discerned these actions were more in the nature of torts than of crimes, and being more closely analogous to civil actions than to criminal, may be dismissed with his hasty, and, I realize, all too inadequate a mention.

A second penalty for the minor offenses was corporal punishment. There were some two hundred and seventy cases punishable by the lash, among them being certain breaches of commandments and Levitical laws, of dietary and land laws, of laws bearing upon pledge, marriage, slander and perjury. The method of administering punishment for these offenses was substantially as follows: The culprit was stripped to the waist, bound hand and foot and lashed in the presence of three judges, one of whom ordered the blows, The second judge counted the stripes, which in no case exceeded thirty-nine, although by Deuteronomy xxv forty blows were fixed as the maximum, and which often numbered less where it appeared by a physical examination, which always preceded the administering of the punishment, that the defendant was weak. The function of the third judge consisted in reading as an accompaniment to each blow, Deuteronomy xxvii: 58 and 59, "If thou wilt not observe to do all the words of this law. . . Then the Lord will make thy plagues wonderful," in order that the full import of the punishment might be burned in upon the conscience of the culprit. But, ladies and gentlemen, the whole temper of the criminal law with respect to corporal punishment is clearly epitomized in the adjuration that the official chosen to administer the blows shall be stronger in mind than in body, in order that he shall not strike the defendant too severely or in a dangerous spot.

A third minor penalty was excommunication. This punishment was enforced in conviction upon any one of twenty-four charges, chief of which were the selling of "terefah," tempting one to sin, profanation, keeping in one's possession dangerous objects or animals, and contempt of court. The procedure for trial in these cases was not as rigorous as was that in charges involving other penalties, as circumstantial and heresay evidence was admissible as valid testimony. The extent of the punishment varied both in length of time for which the defendant was excommunicated and the scope of the excommunication, the defendant in certain cases being forbidden merely any special intercourse with the complaining witness.

I come now to the matter of capital punishment. To the majority of people the question, What shall be the proper punishment for capital offenses? is an all-engaging one and a far less degree of attention is paid to the minor crimes. Personally I cannot help but feel that what is of far more importance is the manner in which crime is dealt with in its inception, what punishment is meted out to the transgressor who commits the offenses ordinarily denominated minor, but which are in reality of vast and far-reaching consequence. But this is not the proper forum for a dissertation upon that subject and I pass on to the matter of capital punishment.

Picture if you can twenty-three of the elders of the community in solemn assembly, whose prototype, so far as dignity is concerned, is the Roman Senate, seated in a semi-circle, presided over by a "nasi" or president, a chief justice and a deputy high priest and surrounded by forty-nine other persons, known as disciples, who took some part in the deliberations. Before this august body was the accused tried for offenses involving the death penalty. Its deliberations were marked by solemnity and sincerity and by a spirit which I cannot help but feel pervades the whole jurisprudence of the Jew—a desire to accord to the defendant every possible presumption in his favor, in order that a conviction may issue only upon the basis of incontrovertible proof of guilt. I lay stress upon this phase of Jewish criminology, as I consider it significant of the whole tenor of its attitude toward

If The Czar Would Fulfill His Promise

Six million of people living in Russia would raise their voices in gratitude and benediction if Nicholas II. would really fulfil his promise—the promise already held forth by his grandfather, Alexander II., half a century ago—to emancipate the Jews.

The liberation of the Jews would mark the passing of the country from a condition of semi-barbarism to a state of enlightened civilization.

The people who have from the earleist times been identified with the building up of Russia's commerce and industry, as well as its art and culture, would as never before apply themselves to advancing the various interests of the empire.

It is not generally known that Jews have been living within territories now included in the Russian Empire from the very remote past. Armenian and Georgian historians record that after the destruction of the First Temple in Jerusalem (587 B. C.) Nebuchadnezzar deported numbers of Jewish captives to Armenia and the Caucasus. These exiles were later joined by co-religionists from Media and Judea. Monuments consisting of marble slabs bearing Greek inscriptions, and preserved in the Hermitage of St. Petersburg and at the museum at Feodosia, show that Jews lived in the Crimea and along the entire eastern coast of the Black Sea at the beginning of the common era, and they possessed well organized communities. From Crimea the Jews moved eastward and northward and became the founders of communities along the shores of the Caspian Sea and of the lower Volga, carrying with them a civilization more advanced than that of the native tribes among which they settled. Under their influence Bulan and "Chaghan" of the Chazars and the ruling classes of Chazaria adopted Judaism in 731 or 740. The Jewish settlement in Kieff dates back to the eleventh century, and there are records too numerous to mention of Jews who settled in Lithuania Poland, and many other parts of the empire in the tenth and eleventh centuries.

Identified with the development of the country from the very first, sincerely loving the soil as well as the soul of Russia, the Jews have wrought and labored toward increasing the prosperity and enlightenment of the land.

They have built up innumerable cities, and have helped to develop the most important industrial centers. They have furnished Russia with millions of willing laborers and thousands of skilled mechanics, and with scientists, engineers, teachers, physicians, dentists, pharmacists and men and women of all professions who have labored with zeal and with devotion to humanity. And from the very days of Nicholas I., when the harsh measures of conscription were introduced, to our own time, the Jews have furnished more than the required quota of military recruits, and the Jewish soldiers have always served faithfully and fought bravely—even though on their return home, as it is depicted in Pilichowsky's celebrated painting, they found their homes demolished by the "black hundreds."

More than that. The Jews have also furnished their quota, and far beyond their quota, of sculptors, painters, composers, musicians, playwrights, poets, and novelists. Eliminate the Jewish names from the history of Russian art and how the chronicle would shrink. The noble and beautiful literature produced by Jews in the Russian language would in itself make a most worthy subject of study.

In return: pogroms, the destruction of the lives and property by infuriated mobs instigated by governmental officials, blood accusation and Beilis cases. In return for their services rendered, the Jews have for centuries been harassed by countless legal and administrative restrictions and their hapless condition has changed to greater uncertainty with every whim of each new ruler. An inextricable mass of anti-Jewish legislation which has accumulated from generation to generation finally led to the law of 1769 definitely limiting the right of the Jew's domicile to certain provinces. In this way the Pale of Settlement has been established.

Being allowed to settle in only 25 of the 89 provinces and territories of the empire, being restricted in trade, commerce, education, ownership of land, in the freedom of movement from one place to another, as well as in almost every walk of life; being vouchsafed only the duties but not the rights of citizens the Jews have nevertheless struggled and toiled throughout the dark and dire years for their own welfare as well as for the benefit of the country.

The severest hardships have not prevented them from maintaining moral standards and living up to ideals which were always above those of their persecutors. Perhaps this, too, was one of the sins of the Jewish people. But it was only the governing classes which could not forgive this sin. The enlightened masses of people in Russia always sympathized with the ideals of the Jews and together with them strove for higher forms of life.

Against the statements of obscure anti-Semites about alleged Jewish exploitation of the peasant and the moujik, we have, aside from the authoritative statistics of Jews engaged in manual labor, in farming, and in the trades, the evidence of Tolstoy, of Gorki, Korolenko, Tchirikoff, Chechov, Andreyev, Professor Solovver, Granovski, Professor Muyliekof, Professor Mordovchov, and a host of other eminent Russian authors and thinkers, who have expressed their high admiration of Russian Jewry.

Without hearing or waiting to hear any promise of liberation, "my beloved Jews," as Nicholas II. has just called them, young men in many tens of thousands, strong and brave, have gone forth to fight for the fatherland, while the great Jewish population left within the country is giving every evidence of its loyalty in this time of stress.

Their "beloved czar" has in a solemn hour made a promise which points toward a new era for a long-suffering people. What will the future bring?—B. G. Richards in the N. Y. "Globe."

The Retreat For Jewish Children at Darmstadt, Germany

We present here a few facts taken from a detailed report of the activities of the Retreat for Jewish Children, which was published in the July number of the "Bericht der Grossloge Fuer Deutschland." Our readers will no doubt find the extract from the lengthy report of great interest.

This institution was founded in 1912 for the benefit of the 550 Jewish immigrants who have settled in Darmstadt. These Jews live in very poor circumstances. They have no homes, no language and no aim in life. They often find it impossible to work in the trades which they have learned. Their children were growing up in the same manner and the members of Starkenburg Lodge No. 512 and their friends in that city determined to save them from their bitter lot. It was evident that if these immigrants were to create for themselves a position and a life interest in Germany it was necessary for them to endeavor to accustom themselves and their children to German conditions and to provide especially their offspring with the needed armor for their life-struggle. The Retreat was established in order to gain an influence upon the growing youth and upon the parents through the children. These children came to the public schools in a deplorable state. They could not speak nor understand a single German word and they sat there like dumb. Their clothing was torn and dirty and they were derided and mocked by the other pupils. Something had to be done to rouse these children from their stooping reserve to the consciousness of human dignity and manly duty. And this Retreat has accomplished all this within a comparatively short time.

Starkenburg Lodge devoted its best energies to the support of this institution and the city of Darmstadt took great interest in the progress of the undertaking. It has given free of charge a school room with heat and light as well as a milk kitchen. The Retreat takes care of 55 children, 25 boys and 30 girls. The boys are taught foil sawing, carving, pasting, drawing and painting, the girls to knit, embroider, sew and hook, and all are helped in their public school work.

During the last summer vacation the children were taken daily, except Saturday and Sunday, to a large garden on the edge of the city, where they worked and played in the open air from 9 o'clock in the morning until 4 in the afternoon under the general supervision of a kindergarten teacher. The larger children had to take care of the smaller ones and all formed one family. In this way the feeling of responsibility was awakened in them, a sense of orderliness was developed and their whole life was changed for the better.

The Jews and Their Persecutors

Of all the romances of literature, of all the greater romances of history, there is no romance like that of the Jew.

The Jew saw the rise of Greece from a cluster of warring city states into the great empire of Alexander, and saw that empire shattered. He saw the passing of the Ptolemies. He saw the empire of Rome grow, ripen and rot; saw the western half go down before the surge of the barbarian, the eastern half yield slowly to Saracen and Turk. As he had seen the beginning of Moorish power, so he saw its end.

Dynasties, nations, races—they have passed across the stage of history, but the Jew lingers.

It is a long history and a tragic one. The same qualities that made it possible for him to maintain his individuality through all the ages have made him ever the victim of abuse.

He would worship none other gods but one; hence all other religions have persecuted him as an infidel. He could live and even thrive where less hardy races starved; hence his economic superiority has ever brought upon him the jealousy and hatred of those with whom he so successfully competed, a hatred which his social non-conformity made more bitter. He eschewed fighting but accumulated riches; hence warlike princes made use of him, or stole his wealth and seized his possessions.

Outlawed, killed, tortured, exiled, robbed, circumscribed by jealous laws, pent up in reeking ghettos, subjected to every abuse, every degradation, persecuted in a thousand ways, the Jew has survived. But—and this should be noted—they who persecuted him most severely have not survived.

At all times the prosperity of the Jew has gone hand in hand with the prosperity of the state that sheltered him. In the days of the true greatness of Spain, when Castile and Aragon were winning back their land from the Moor and the country was gathering the riches and power that were to give it the leadership of Europe, the Jew had his proper share in the prosperity.

Alfonso X, Alfonso the Wise, made Jews his chamberlains and chancellors of the exechequer. Fifty years later Jews were the treasurers for Alfonso XI and Don Pedro, while Henry III of Castile employed them as his political and commercial agents. They made the maps and the astronomical tables by which the great navigators of Spain and Portugal steered their courses; they were themselves navigators and pilots and they financed many of those wonderful expeditions into new waters.

Then persecution came, and the same year that witnessed the downfall of the Mahometan empire of the west, the same year that saw the discovery of the New World, saw the Spanish Jews banished, driven by the tens and hundreds of thousands from the land where they had dwelt for long centuries.

That was the beginning of the end for Spain. On the fruits of the prosperity which the Jews had done so much to create, supplemented by the wealth snatched from the New World, she flourished long. But the blight had fallen, and the rapid decline of Spain from her proud pre-eminence is the byword of history.

So, too, with Poland. When Casimir the Great and his nobles had Jews for their bailiffs and financial advisers, or when Sigismund and Stephen Bathori offered them asylum Poland was a power to be counted with in Europe. And when the Jews suffered persecution and destitution, then Poland, too, sank into humiliation.

Ever the picture is the same—the Ottoman empire at the height of its power under Soliman the Magnificent and Selim, with Jews as ministers and chosen ambassadors; Holland, when she wrested East Indies from Portugal and held command of the seas; Florence under the Medicis, Ferrara under the d'Este rule, Rome under its most powerful popes—always when wealth and power abounded the Jews were protected, honored and prosperous.

The great rulers of Russia have been Peter, Catherine II., Alexander I. These are the rulers who welcomed the Jews, even favored them. Today in no country are the Jews so persecuted as in this Russia, and Russia lags far behind other European nations in all that makes for real civilization.

On the Jewish calendar are few red days, records of glory and gladness, and many black days, memories of sorrow and wrong. But it is ill for the nation by whose acts those black days are set down.

For the Jew makes prosperity not only for himself, but for those about him, and that people which persecutes the Jew and drives him away thereby serves but to drive prosperity away with him.

Spain, Poland, Turkey—their power has been and is not. It is for Russia—and for anti Semites the world over—to pause, scan the page of history and consider.—Boston Globe.

ONLY ONE FAIR COURSE.

Judge Hill's decision to sustain the State's demurrer to the motion of counsel for Leo M. Frank to set aside the verdict against him, on the ground that the prisoner was not present in court when the verdict was rendered, carries the settlement of that point to the Supreme Court of Georgia, which already has before it a motion for a new trial of the case. If the new trial is ordered by the Supreme Court before the decision of Judge Hill on the demurrer is argued before it, the interests of justice will probably be better served. A new trial is the only just solution of the pitiful problem in the Frank case.

Judge Hill's decision on Saturday reverses his position in the Lyons case, celebrated in Georgia criminal annals, in which, as a member of the Court of Appeals, he ruled that the defendant in a criminal trial has a right to be present in court at every stage of the proceedings. The judge still stands by this ruling, but he found it expedient to pass this matter up to the Supreme Court. To Frank facing the prospect of more weary months of incarceration before the next step can be taken, and to his friends and sympathizers this seems a cruel outcome of the latest appeal, but it may be all for the best. The many persons throughout the country who believe that a miscarriage of justice has been threatened in the Frank case will hope that the Supreme Court will hear the extraordinary motion for a new trial before the technical point of Frank's absence from the courtroom when the verdict was rendered is brought before it.

That Frank was unfairly tried and is guiltless of the murder of Mary Phagan many persons all over the country firmly believe. He is clearly entitled to a new trial. If the verdict should be set aside on a technicality and Frank could not be retried, the case would never be cleared. There would be a perpetual blot on the honor of the State. Now that the popular clamor has subsided, he can be tried fairly.—New York Times.

ILL ADVISED.

The Northern Presbyterian church, in annual convention at Chicago, has gone on record as favoring Bible reading in public schools. Churches are urged to petition state legislatures to this end.

There are some mighty big men in the Northern Presbyterian church. We doubt if a majority of them could have been sufficiently vigilant when the resolution indicated was adopted.

Vice President Marshall declared a few days ago that there was too much science and not enough religion in our schools. We do not agree with the vice president, and we do not agree with the Northern Presbyterians. Education, under the interpretation almost universally accepted, is a function of the State, so far as it applies to common, or state-maintained schools. One of the cardinal principles of the federal constitution is a rigid separation of church and state. Teaching the Bible in the public schools is a hopeless commingling of church and state, an invitation to the engendering of denominational bitterness and bigotry.

Who would decree what passages in the Bible should be read, and what guarantee exists that each individual teacher would not construe the Bible according to his or her particular faith? The involuntary expression of personal preference would be inevitable.

Confessedly, none of the churches are quite meeting the intricate and complicated needs of our day. Their task of adjusting themselves to changed and broadening conditions is an arduous one. But they are not going to make headway by ignoring a provision which has immemorially given force to the appeal of this country as a haven for those who have historically suffered from religious intolerance.—Atlanta Constitution.

B'NAI B'RITH HOME FOR JEWISH WAR REFUGEES.

The London Lodge of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, of which Mr. Augustus Kahn, H. M. I., is President, has established at 162 Willesden Lane, N. W., a hostel for a number of Jewish war refugees. Accommodation is provided for between thirty and forty persons, and those already in residence hail from various parts of the war area, including Paris, Liege, Louvain, Ghent and Antwerp. Among the party are a number of university students. The hostel was established at short notice in order to provide accommodation for some of the better class of those being housed by the Jews' Temporary Shelter, the magnificent work of which is recognized on all hands. The house was only taken on Wednesday week and the inmates were received on Sunday, the eve of New Year. Besides the work of members of the Lodge and their friends, several Christian residents in the neighborhood have given kindly help, and public-spirited assistance has been rendered by several local tradesmen. An English class has been established for the residents and arrangements are being made whereby the children may attend school in the neighborhood. As there are several ways in which help may be rendered in connection with the hostel, those desirous of giving assistance should communicate with Mr. Alfred Benjamin, 20 Christchurch avenue. N. W., Hon. Secretary of the Lodge.

least in part. "Forgetting the things that are behind," they "press forward" not "toward the mark of a high calling" but toward the dollar mark, because that seemed to them the symbol of freedom in the new land. Within a single generation, however, the powerful forces of conservatism, always latent in Israel, have begun to reassert themselves and the Jewish people are responding anew to the old forces of idealism. Most prominent among the dominant ideals of modern Israel is the realization of the long deferred hope of the coming of the kingdom of God that time when "righteousness shall cover the earth as the water covers the sea."

Thrice daily in the synagogue of Israel—on the banks of the Rhine, and the Neva, the Thames and the Hudson, this prayer is uttered: "We therefore hope in Thee, O Lord our God, that we may speedily behold the glory of Thy might, when Thou wilt remove the abominations from the earth, and the idols will be utterly cut off; when the world will be perfected under the kingdom of the Almighty, and all the children of flesh will call upon Thy name, when Thou wilt turn unto thee all the wicked of the earth. Let all the inhabitants of the world perceive and know that unto Thee every knee shall bow, every tongue must swear. Before Thee, O Lord our God, let them bow and fall; and unto Thy glorious name let them give honor. Let them all accept the yoke of Thy kingdom, and do Thou reign over them speedily, and for ever and ever. For the Kingdom is Thine, and to all eternity Thou wilt reign in glory; as it is written in Thy Law, 'The Lord shall reign for ever and ever.' And it is said, 'And the Lord shall be King over all the earth; in that day shall the Lord be One and His name One.'"

For the first time in history the hope of Israel, as expressed in this prayer, and the hope of Christendom are essentially one; and in that unity both Jew and Christian may find encouragement. They need it. Today, when Europe is an armed camp, the Jewish vision of a time when the nations shall not learn war any more, and the Christian dream of a day when the war-drum shall throb no longer, and the battle flags be furled, seem alike to have passed like a dream away. Yet, though the realization of our hope seems long deferred, we, both Jew and Christian, may remind ourselves that God fulfils Himself in many ways. In the words of our own Lowell "Civilization does get forward even on a powder-wagon," and in the words of Judah's statelier poet,

Surely the wrath of man shall praise
Thee
The remainder of wrath shalt Thou restrain

And in the midst of such reflections, we may rejoice that though the heathen rage and the kingdoms are moved Christendom and Judaism are coming to understand and respect each other through a mutual recognition that their [illegible] one.

THE JEWS IN RUSSIA.

There Is Some Hope of Better Conditions by Removal of Disabilities.

A recent imperial decree has enabled the Russian commander-in-chief to confer officers' commissions on several hundred Jews who gained exceptional distinction in the fighting that preceded the capture of Lemberg, and the important statement is added that the removal of the Jews' military disabilities has been well received in all quarters. This important action may well mark the turning point in the history of the liberation of the Jews in Russia. For years we have been harrowed with an agitation for sweeping the Russian army clear of our co-religionists—a step which would have been the crowning one in their political enslavement. The progress of the war has made clear the loss that such exclusion would have inflicted upon Russian arms, and the announcement now made shows not only that the soldierly qualities of Jews—already manifested upon the far Eastern battlefield—have been grasped by Russia, official and non-official, but that events can march with swiftness even in the great empire where the tide of human advancement seemed most to lag. Who could have supposed a few short months ago that Jews would now be commanding Russian troops, with the enthusiastic approval of the whole empire? It is a far cry to the Beilis trial, and the days of political miracles are assuredly not ended. The announcement of the enfranchisement of the Russian Jew has not yet been made. But it is hard to believe that the solidarity of the Jews with the rest of the empire that has been so grandly displayed, and the military recognition that the Jewish people have received, does not presage their liberation, whether the hour of release strike soon or late. It is impossible, with the Jews exercising high command in the Russian army, to continue the terrible discriminatory system under which the Russian Jewish population has staggered so long. It cannot be maintained—if logic has any part at all in the governance of men—that while the Jew may safely hold the czar's commission, he cannot be trusted to live outside the pale. Gradually, if not quickly, facts and experience must prevail by their own sheer weight, and the old bad oppressive system come to the ground. News of its downfall will come as tidings of great joy to Jews throughout the world, to whom the grinding Russian persecution has been a nightmare for more than a generation. It will, on the other hand, be the signal for a new reign of prosperity for Russia, and a strengthened Jewish attachment to its people. It may be that in certain quarters the relics of the old ill-will may be hard to remove, and certainly its economic effects may continue upon the Jewish population for many a log day. But, after all, it has been the official cachet upon the system of oppression which has kept ill-will alive; while even the profound and abysmal poverty of the Jewish masses must yield eventually, if slowly, to the spirit of a more kindly and just government. We hope that the day will not long be deferred when the freedom of the long-suffering Jew will be officially decreed and his oneness with the empire indelibly sealed.—Jewish Spectator.

A VATICAN ORGAN DEFENDS THE BLOOD LIBEL.

The monthly review, "Le Civilta Catholica," which is the "scientific" organ of the Papal See, published in its latest issue an article on the ritual murder myth in general, and the Beilis trial in particular. The review, despite the memorable correspondence between Lord Rothschild and Cardinal Merry del Val, declares its faith in the existence of "ritual murder," and advances as the principal proof the opinions of the notorious Father Pranaitis. It also states that the liberation of Beilis cost the Jews £1,700,000, part of which was spent in bribing the two hundred correspondents of newspapers at the trial.

JEWISH CHAUTAUQUA SOCIETY.

The Jewish Chautauqua Society has moved from its present address at the Benjamin Teller Memorial Building, to 604 Penn Mutual Building, 925 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia. THE WANDERING JEW.

By Dr. George Wilde.

The wandering Jew wanders over the earth. His tall figure is bent, the face full of wrinkles, the deep set eyes look with shy anxiousness and the towsled white beard flows down to his breast. He was driven away from his country, his Temple was destroyed and he must wander restlessly over the earth. He wants to rest but finds no rest, he wants to die, but he cannot die. Without peace, without joy, he must wander as a punishment for his sin, for his unbelief. Once a year he comes to the Holy Land. When the day is over on which Jerusalem was destroyed and the Temple burned, he seeks out the old places which were once full of splendor. The city now belongs to strangers. Mosques and churches rise up high. The wandering Jew wanders sighing through the narrow streets and at last stands before a high ruined wall. It is the only remnant of the Temple and it rises out of the hoary antiquity like the bony hand of the dead growing out of the grave. There the wandering Jew sinks down weeping. He leans his hoary head against the wall and in pitiable tones sounds from his mouth the mournful song which Jeremiah once intoned upon the ruins: "Aicho yoshvo bodod ho-ir"—"O, how lonely sits the city, once so rich in people, like a forsaken widow, she weeps bitterly in the night, tears are on the cheek. Nobody consoles her, her friends have abandoned her. Judah went into exile, finds no rest, finds persecution and suffering only"—So does the wandering Jew cry and lament the whole day, the whole 9th of Ab. When the day is ended and night has come again, then he rises sighing to begin again his wandering over the earth in hopeless woe. But behind him rises black and gloomy the dead hand of the dead Judaism: the wailers' wall.

In this way the Christian legend has depicted Judaism. For the Christian legend does not understand why the Jew is still living. It assumes that as a punishment for his sin he must wander over the earth as the wandering Jew, driven by his evil conscience, without peace and without joy.

I will continue to relate this legend but only according to that which I have really seen with my own eyes not quite two years ago.

In a night bright with the light of the stars I traveled from Cairo to the desert, I stood before a pyramid which rose from the desert sand against the mighty heaven like a huge triangle. There I saw the wandering Jew. Lamenting he stood at the pyramid and he spoke to me: "Once I with other sons of Israel was forced to build the pyramids, then Moses liberated us, the Egyptians sank into the Red sea. Our jubilee songs rang out to heaven, we believed that we were redeemed. But later, much later, everything again fell into ruins. The Holy City, the Temple, the nation. 'Only once a year I seek out a place for prayer, the wailers wall, to weep and to lament there on the 9th of Ab. with the children of my people, who appear in torn garments and sing bitter songs which sound like funeral dirges." Then I said unto him: "Come with me, you shall behold the wailers wall at another time then your mourning will vanish." Incredulously he gazed at me, but he followed me.

We sailed together across the ocean, we came into the Holy Land and on a Friday, when the day was declining, we wandered to the wailers wall. The wandering Jew looked around him with astonishment. It was the same wall, but this time it rose like a solemn token of remembrance of great times. Jews in festive garments stood there divided in groups according to their home countries. In the midst of every group there was a chanter of prayers. Peace and the solemnity of devotion rested on all faces. From the wailer's wall resounded a song of jubilee: "l'chu n'ranne-noh"—"rise, let us sing a song of jubilce to the Eternal, let us shout in triumph to the God of our salvation" They greet the coming Sabbath like the bridegroom greets the bride: "l'cho dodi likras Kalloh"—"Come, my friend, to meet the bride, let us welcome the Sabbath"—The chanters bent their heads low toward the wall and sounded the summons to the congregation: "Praise ye the Eternal, the highly exalted." The congregation responded: "Praised be the Eternal the highly exalted one." Then from the broken wailer's wall came toward the high rising mosques and churches Israel's proud confession of faith: "Hear, O Israel, the Eternal our God, the Eternal is One." Silence reigned after that, softly each one prayed for himself: "Thou supportest the falling, healest the sick and redeemest the fettered." The voices of the chanters rose again to bless the Sabbath, to praise God "who has chosen us from all nations," but also to pray to that God "who will be King over the whole earth." Returning home from the wall to the house full of light, to the set table, they still prayed and recited the psalm: "The Lord is my shepherd, I shall not want."

Those were not unfortunates, those were happy people. They were not embittered but good people. They were not broken down, but proud, not unbelievers but pious people. "Shabbat shalom"—"Sabbath peace"—was the greeting from one to the other, so they greeted me and the wandering Jew in passing by. I now again looked at the wandering Jew, whom I had almost forgotten. Hot tears ran down his cheeks. "So my people are not without peace," he exclaimed, "so my people are not accursed, but blessed; they are even strong and great in all the distress and unrest of life!" I said to the wandering Jew. The songs of lamentation which you hear and you yourself recite here on the ninth day of Ab they resound on black Friday in the Catholic churches. They lament with them the death of their son of God. But two days later joyful resurrection songs are intoned. We lament once a year, on the 9th of Ab the destruction of the Temple, but on every Sabbath, on every Friday, aye, on every day on which we pray, we celebrate the resurrection. The flames could not consume our God for He lives for ever and everywhere. The falling Temple could not bury our faith for it lives within our breast. The downfall of our nation could not destroy our people for we retained everywhere our fidelity to our progenitors.

Holy peace rested upon the countenance of the wandering Jew when he heard these words: "Shabbat shalom," he spoke softly and heartily, he pressed my hand once more and he then moved away slowly and solemnly towards the Mount of Olives, there where innumerable generations of the Jews rest he too wished to sleep in peace.

The wandering Jew I never saw again. But when I come across the German legend I will tell it: "The wandering Jew is dead, Judaism lives."

JEWISH HEROISM.

The admission of Jews to commissions as officers in the Russian army and navy is a belated act of justice to the Russian Jews. Yet the concession is sweetened for these persecuted people by the fact that a Jew won it by heroism on the field of battle. The student Osnas, who saved the colors of his regiment at the risk of his life and was badly wounded, forced the Russian Government to recognize the Jew as a man with the highest qualities of manhood. It should convince Russia that men who display conspicuous loyalty, devotion and courage on the battlefield fighting for the country which deserves so little from them have full qualifications for citizenship.

The heroism of Osnas in Russia is matched in France by that of the younger Dreyfus, son of that Dreyfns whose honor and loyalty were vindicated after he had borne the cross of horrible injustice for years.

In the armies of Continental Europe there are 330,000 Jews serving under the colors of their nations. Russia alone, the worst persecutor of the Jews, has 250,000. Germany, which is next in barbaric prejudices, has 6,000. Austria has 52,000.

The war gives the Jews another opportunity to demonstrate their loyalty to the country in which they live. But the demonstration ought not to be necessary. In all those countries where the Jews enjoy fellowship, equal rights and opportunity they have proved equal value with the best as citizens and public servants. Here in America where there are no race or class distinctions the Jews are conspicuous and valuable factors in all lines of activity. Men of no other blood surpass them in achievement in science, art, industry, finance and commerce. Their usefulness in public service has been proven in many instances. They are first in philanthropy and social service. No one doubts their loyalty and devotion not only to the country, but to its republican institutions and the principles of liberty and justice upon which they are founded The Jews have a passion for freedom and justice.

We indulge the hope that the cloud of prejudice against the Jews which befogs some of the European peoples will pass with the smoke of war.—St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

THE WAR AND THE JEWS

By LUDWIG GEIGER

The frightful world war, the coming of which was foreboded by all earnest politicians, and which was positively predicted to occur in the year 1914 by those who had inside information, has really been started. Many millions of warriors—the numbers stated are enormous—have taken up arms. Germany and Austria are united against the so-called triple entente: Russia. France and England.

We will not attempt to analyze here the cause of this war or the events which led up to it. We will only mention here briefly that while the direct cause of this war is to be looked for in the feverish preparations for war by all the powers and in the hatred and envy of the two western and the one eastern nations against Germany, the indirect cause is the assassination of the Austrian Crown Prince and his wife. Through this event, which, to be sure, was the deed of a fanatic, but prepared and supported by the machinations of Servia, Austria-Hungary was induced to send an ultimatum to Servia. As this did not bring a satisfactory answer to Austria, she declared war against Servia. Russia, without making an open declaration, placed herself at the side of Servia. Asked for an explanation of her mobilization, she refused or delayed her answer, continued to arm herself and dispatched troops to Germany, so that the latter saw herself compelled to declare war against Russia. The direct consequence of this was that France, as Russia's ally, at once took up arms and sent troops to Belgium and to the German border—without a declaration of war—so that Germany was here too forced to open war. As Germany now occupied Luxemburg, and, as she openly declared in parliament, through the Imperial Prime Minister, invaded Belgium, England saw in this loyally confessed breach of neutrality a cause for declaring war against Germany. Later England and France also declared war against Austria.

Montenegro joined the warring powers, the enemies of the two united states of central Europe. Denmark and Holland declared strict neutrality. Sweden armed herself in order to proceed in time against Russia, and so far it seems that Bulgaria, Roumania and Turkey will at all events not rise against Austria and may perhaps join her.

Italy the third state of the triple alliance, as it was generally expected, has not placed herself at the side of her allies, but she promised them friendly neutrality. This attitude of Italy appeared to many as very suspicious and this suspicion was later very much strengthened by the information that England is delivering coal to Italy and that the Italian ambassadors of Berlin and Vienna paid a visit to Rome. Although the staffs of the ambassies remained in Berlin and Vienna and notwithstanding the explanation given that the journey of the ambassadors was necessary for the purpose of bringing information to the Italian government regarding the false reports which came from France, Italy's attitude still remains a surprising one and many fear it as the sign of a new danger. It is said that Italy intends to make certain demands of Austria. During the last days these suspicions were silenced by an official explanation from Italy.

During the last days, since the second of August, the war events have taken their course. It is easily understood that in view of the vast distance and the great masses of men that have to be brought to the theater of war, the conflict proceeds slowly, too slowly for the excitement and anxious suspense of the masses. At any rate good results have been achieved. Luettich has been taken, in two battles the French have been beaten, many prisoners have been taken, cannons captured and a French flag is in our hands.

In the meantime the Germans in France, Belgium, Russia and perhaps also in England, have to suffer very much. The mobs are fanatical and rage against property and life. And here the troubles of the Jew begin. In Belgium, as well as in France, many German Jews have lived many years, and some of them were in important positions. As much as it was possible those who were subject to military service rushed to Germany. Those who are free from military duty, especially the women, share in the general distress, while Germany shows herself as the true bearer of culture in her treatment of the strangers who remained in her territory, the inhabitants of the western states, who consider themselves so extraordinary civilized, exhibit almost an inconceivable degree of inhumanity and rudeness. It is not known that the Jews who remained were tortured and tormented more than the Christians, but as there are presumably more of the first, the distress is great among them and it is impossible for aid to come to them from Germany.

But the Jews have not the full measure of suffering only; as it was often the case in the course of universal history, they also have joy and fame. Joy for to the loyal citizen, the true son of his country, there is no greater joy than to serve the fatherland. To this joy is added the fame of manifesting manly courage in deeds of valor.

And here something remarkable and wonderful is happening. People speak so often of a Jewish nation. But we do not believe in it. We know of a Jewish community only. Many Jews, especially in the last decade, have spoken of a Jewish nationality. Many of our Christian adversaries raised a double reproach against us. The first, that we are an alien body among the various nations, the second, that we Jews are an international community that pursues exclusively its own special interests and neglects its duties to the nation under whose protection it lives.

The last few weeks have brilliantly demonstrated how hollow these reproaches are. The same party which claimed to be the adherent of a Jewish nation has suppressed the so-called Jewish national consciousness in Germany, in favor of a true German national sentiment. The same was also the case in Austria and France. England has no general military conscription but has a paid army only. This act of the Zionists will never be forgotten, and they too must never forget it, that in these great days they have proved themselves great. But our adversaries, outside of our community, must be silent. Those who were designated as a body of aliens, knew, like all their countrymen, one duty only, the one toward the fatherland. Not those Jews only who belong to the standing army, the reserves and the militia, but all Jews have joyfully followed the call to arms, and many thousands of them volunteered their services. Without murmur, with a feeling of heroic joy, parents have given their children, hundreds have given all their sons, and wives their husbands. The enthusiasm, the heroic sentiment, which has gripped the nations in general has also taken hold of the Jews.

And where is that golden internationalism which haunted the heads of the crack-brained? The German Jew as well as the French Jew did not think for one moment in this war that perhaps he is first a Jew, but he felt that he belongs to the country where he lives. Just as he enjoyed the blessing of the culture, the spiritual benefits of his fatherland in times of peace so he wishes to stand in war side by side with his fellow-countrymen to fight and to suffer for his fatherland.

We Jews do not demand any special rights for ourselves, no reward for the magnificent offerings of goods and money for the readiness with which we sacrificed our blood. We are fighting for our fatherland, but we expect from it that which we have always demanded—we expect justice.

The bloody struggle has just begun. Countless sacrifices will be demanded. Many of those who remained behind can already see their existence threatened, they anticipate the worst in the course of time—but nowhere manifest themselves special desires and special interests. There is one wish only: the salvation, the happiness and the blessing of the fatherland.

And so we confide the result to the all-governing destiny. The future we know not, but this one thing we know: we German Jews will show ourselves worthy of the past, we will prove ourselves good and loyal sons of our fatherland.

RUMANIA AND FOREIGN JEWS.

The Rumanian Government has prohibited foreign Jews to enter the country, offering as an excuse the alleged competitive powers of the Jews against the Christian merchants. The Government will, however, make an exception in favor of Russian Jews returning home via Rumania.

INDEPENDENT ORDER OF B'NAI B'RITH

OFFICE OF EXCUTIVE COMMITTEE

Chicago, Ill., Sept. 29, 1914.

To the Lodges of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith:

We have received urgent appeals for financial assistance from the Grand Lodges of Austria, Germany and the Orient.

The Grand Lodge of Austria sent us a second urgent appeal by wireless which was forwarded for them by the government of Austria to its Ambassador in Washington, and delivered to us by the Austrian Consul General in Chicago. Several thousand members of the Order are in the ranks; hundreds of them have been killed while fighting for their country. The number of victims is growing daily, and so are the number of widows and orphans to whom we are in duty bound to render aid.

The Order therefore appeals to the lodges and their members to open wide their purses and respond with an open hand and a willing heart as far as their means will permit. This is the season of good will and charity within the household of Israel. "Rachmono libo boey." God demands the heart. And we appeal to the Jewish heart now and particularly at this time of the year when it is filled with pity for suffering mankind.

The lodges are requested to raise funds from among their members. Committees specially appointed for this purpose should be large enough to enable them to make a personal and speedy canvas in order to reach every member, so that all may be placed on the roll of honor with a contribution whether small or large. Lodges as such should also appropriate liberally from their treasuries to the end that by individual and concerted effort the Order may be placed in position to extend a helping hand to those who innocently have become the victims of the ravages of war. We hope that each lodge will be able to raise a sufficiently large sum so that its contribution will represent a donation equivalent to not less than $10.00 per member.

Remittances should be made to the office of the Executive Committee of the Order, 1228 Tribune Bldg., Chicago, which in due time will publish in the B'nai B'rith News a complete list of all donors and the disposition of the funds contributed to relieve the war sufferers.

Fraternally yours in B. B. L. & H.,

ADOLF KRAUS, President.

Attest: A. B. SEELENFREUND, Secretary.

THE GREAT AFFLICTION OF THE JEWS

The gigantic struggle, which in a thousand years from now will perhaps assume the form of a legend of the destruction of the world, is proceeding over down-trodden countries and peoples. Full of the deepest confidence and the best will we expect the ultimate victory of right and culture over the might of barbarism, malice and cold-blooded treachery. The true bravery which is inspired by the holiest feelings is winning the upper hand and is striking down the enemies one after the other. But in spite of the assured outcome of the struggle the war fury is now showing its Medusa-head encircled with serpents which makes a fearful impression upon all nerves even far away from the scene of the battles.

Great parts of Moravia, Hungary, and the residence city Vienna, have received numerous hosts of refugees. Small and quiet cities of Hungary are filled with them, at the southern railroad depot of Vienna they camp in the trains on a sidetrack and our Jewish communities must use all their means to furnish food and other support to these refugees. If it were a catastrophe of the elements of nature from which these unfortunates had escaped, then sympathy and help could have been found for them all over Europe. But now their misfortune is called fate, now is not the time for complaint, for the whole earth is out of joint and whoever sinks into its clefts perishes without causing special surprise. Of course, the officials of the government are doing everything they possibly can do for the refugees and exert all their powers in providing the most necessary things. But the necessities have become extraordinarily numerous. The mass of these people who escaped from the Cossacks and the cannons belongs to the Jewish proletariat, it comes from the poorest districts of Galicia and even if it had been able to prepare for the flight there was nothing worthy of mention to be taken along. Even most of those who at home were eking out a living without great hardship are now depending upon public pity and the aid of the state. They were only able to take along the smallest part of their property, business in general has become stagnant long ago and so they look into the future with great anxiety. It is to be hoped that the bravery of their armies will soon make it possible for them to return to their homes and free them from their greatest trouble. At all events they will find there terrible destruction and it will take a long time until order will be restored to society.

And so great parts of the Jewish population, especially the Jews of Galicia, have been visited by hard trials. We emphasize again that these sacrifices are brought without lamentation and complaint, and that the demands of the fatherland are complied with with silent composure also by the much slandered caftan-wearing Jew, although himself and his helpless family have much to suffer by it. Give them the things which they are mostly in need of and you will see how quietly they will wait until their fatherland is freed and they themselves are relieved from their own distress.

Moreover, the Austrian Jews are not the only ones who during the war were forced into the front ranks of the suffering population. Also in East Prussia, where the Cossacks have raged so barbarously they form a considerable part of the inhabitants and hundreds of them have lost their general possessions. There, where the French have invaded Germany, in Alsace-Lorain, the Jews have settled in large numbers long ago and have helped to create the flourishing commerce and industry. In the villages and cities which were destroyed by shot and shell, a great portion of their possessions also lies buried. A great part of the Russian territory where the victorious Austrians and Germans have entered, is inhabited by Jews and in the battles for the possession of isolated places, crashing bomb shells and flaring flames have opened the way for nameless misery. Naturally many Jews were in the front ranks of the regiments stationed in the neighboring countries when the attacks took place and, faithful to their oaths to protect the flag of their respective countries, they have sacrificed their blood and their lives for the fatherland. So the many parts compose a great picture in which the Jewish population occupies the central point of all the calamities. It bears the great suffering with resignation in the hope that czarism will find its end in this world war and that in the future full justice will be meted out to the Jew in all lands. But every one should look with sympathy and humanity upon the fate which has overtaken the numerous Jews of all the border lands and should not refuse his most active aid in the great distress. Otherwise the terrible trial confronting the Jew will cost too many cruel sacrifices.

WITH JUSTICE TO ALL AND MALICE TOWARDS NONE.

Another month has gone by and the embattled legions are still at Armageddon. On land and at sea the machinery of bloody warfare is set in motion. Masked siege-guns of huge proportions are sending out death-dealing shells and the cold steel prostrates battalions in fierce hand to hand combat. Cruisers of enormous tonnage are shattered like toys by a mine under water or the uncanny submarine. Villagers and the populace of open towns are fleeing for their lives. In the wake of the invader there follows devastation as if wrought by a mighty upheaval of nature like unto the sudden outburst of a live crater or the quaking of the earth's foundations or the sweep of a cyclone across the level prairie or the breaking of a dam by which generations have fended off the onrush of the floods. Indeed the barriers have been demolished, not so much those of earthwork and cement, but the checks which prevail in times of peace, the checks of good-will and forbearance, of the fine humanities and religion, all the preventives which mark civilization have been thrown off like so much dead weight or embarrassing obstacle.

War is cruel, it is hell. Yes, the courage of the stout-hearted, the daring of commanders as well as of the rank and file which flinches not in the face of danger to life and limb, the martial virtues if we may so designate them shine and thrill and evoke admiration. But over against them stand out tales of atrocities, of wholesale butchery which spares not man or maid or babe, of monumental structures given over to the flames, of priceless libraries going up in smoke. It is all revolting, harrowing, benumbing.

Europe seems to have gone stark mad, or else the war would not be on us. Difficulties there were, the friction of radical antipathy and of commercial strife, of unforgotten humiliation. The fuel had been accumulating for decades and the war had to come sooner or later. Was the system wrong? Of course it was. The costly armaments were crushing the tax-payer beneath their staggering weight. The genius of invention exercised itself in the creation of death-dealing machines, of siege-guns wrecking from a distance of miles stately cathedrals, of fumes liberated from shells whereby regiments are asphyxiated. The military caste dominated the land and shaped policies. The chancelleries were adjuncts to the [illegible]

[illegible] it behooves us to be just. The calamity had to come. It would have been superhuman to ward it off. We at a distance and in the enjoyment of peace and of democratic institutions must not forget that each nation has the government which suits it best. To expect of Russia or of Germany the machinery of American liberty betrays narrowness of view. Certainly we cherish our method of government as the best that human ingenuity has devised. We are happy under it, and would that all mankind were sharers in that happiness. But nations are creatures of history. Hallowed traditions are not cast away lightly. Moreover, nations are moulded by their geographical habitat. The experiments carried on in New Zealand, far away from mankind and safe from aggression, cannot be transplanted to other countries, least of all to the continent of Europe. Small as the area of Europe is, the configurations of its seas and mountains make for segregation. Just as the British Isles by their detachment from the continent and their dependence on the five oceans make for the policy of a large navy and a small army, so it must be conceded that the central European states with no outlet to the ocean and hedged in by powerful countries bent upon retrieving old losses or upon expansion would be committing suicide were they not to maintain an efficient miltiary machinery. This is no brief for the Teuton. It is idle to gauge civilizations and to decree that one is higher and the other lower, that mankind would be better off if Germany or Russia went to the wall. We would have them all live and let live. We would wish that the greatest and the smallest nation should be permitted to lead is own life in peace and amity with neighbors. It is self-interest, justifiable forsooth, that drove England into entangling alliances and sent her sons into the battle-fields of the French plains and fastnesses. It is self-interest, equally justifiable, that dictated to Kaiser and Czar the war-like preparations which naturally issued in war. Alas indeed for the thousands whose breath of life is snuffed out, for the bereaved widow and orphan whose loved one lies buried with his comrades beneath the earth crimson with their life-blood! But it is fair to assume that these soldiers all die with the feeling that they have done their duty by their fatherland. It is no more and no less than all of us would cheerfully do were it the lot of this nation to be at war with another.

Nor is it wise to arraign Christianity. If the clash of arms silences laws, is it any wonder that the voice of religion is not heeded? Christian piety nurtured by the visions of Israel's prophets abhors war. In times of peace we witness about us malefactors committing all sorts of crimes and breaking all the commandments. Yet would any one in fairness blame the Church? What would the world come to if the Church or Synagogue were not with us? Their potency to restrain the normal passions cannot be questioned. They will yet by gentle suasion some day succeed in checking nations as they do now restrain individuals. That humble priest who in front of the burning sanctuary of Rheims bared his body to the shots of a vengeful populace that the German prisoners maimed and agonized might be spared did show what self-control religion inculcates. For at heart he hated the invader as any of the French soldiers doing battle in the beleaguered city. Religion triumphed over his patriotism.

Let us all be just. We deplore the carnage, we detest war. We believe the war might have been avoided. But the war is on. The belligerent nations are all doing their duty each in defense of what is holiest to it. Only if we are fair to all can we be of service to them. Once more, let us observe strictest neutrality.

THE PLIGHT OF JEWRY.

It is not too early to forecast the portion of misery which this war will bring to our brethren. While the clash of arms is going on, the duty of every Jew is plain enough. Those of our brethren who are citizens (or subjects) of the nations at war with one another have indeed responded nobly and patriotically to the call to arms. It is estimated that above a quarter of a million of Jewish soldiers are with the colors. The emancipated Jews of England and Germany and Austria and France are battling as valiantly as did their fathers when still under the ban of exceptional laws, and the unfree Jews of Czardom are fighting side by side with "Real Russians" and have been credited at this stage with many deeds of heroism. As surgeons and as nurses Jews and Jewesses are ministering to the wounded. Jews give freely of their wealth to the support of the Red Cross. Jewish bankers are ungrudgingly subscribing to the war chests of the embattled nations. For all these acts the Jew requires no special praise; he is merely doing his duty through this period of storm and stress.

What the aftermath of the war will bring to the Jew is saddening as the perspective dimly reveals itself at this distance. The eastern theater of the war is thickly populated with Jews. The brunt will be borne by them. What of havoc the invaders have wrought will fall upon their shoulders. Rumors of much suffering are reaching us at this writing. But greater calamity is still coming. And the worst of it is that whether in Posen or Cracow or Warsaw the Jews are ruthlessly persecuted by the Poles. The Polish boycott in Russian Poland is still fresh in our minds. The misery of Galician Jewry is too well known. It is bound to be aggravated. Jewish communities will be reduced to penury. Those that have fled to points still safe are in want of the necessities of life. It may be taken for granted that in the midst of universal misery the Jews will suffer a hundredfold. "Where there is any untoward happening, there is calamity for the Jew." This has been his experience through history. Moreover, the Jew is made the scapegoat. A victorious Russia will readily forget Jewish sacrifices and Jewish valor. A vanquished Russia — the contemplation of what will befall our brethren is shuddering in the extreme.

The bulk of Jewry resides in Russia, and their fate it is that fills us all with apprehension. To expect an amelioration of their political condition at this time is preposterous. The ministers of state of the allied nations have their hands full with their own immediate affairs. It is futile to expect of them to evince an interest in the subjects of a foreign country though they be fighting a common foe. It is at all times hazardous to meddle with the internal affairs of another country. What may be done when the war is over is another matter. It will require a united stand by the Jews of the world to arouse interest in that portion of European mankind which though long resident in Europe is still treated as alien to it. Against that opportunity, if an opportunity it will be, we must prepare ourselves with all the instrumentalities at our command. The philanthropic part will be easy to handle. Sacrifices will be demanded of us, but true to our past we shall not suffer our own poor to be a burden to any but ourselves. As to the political task, we neutral Jews can best serve the interests of Jewry by abstaining for the time being from any expression of sympathy or ill-will on the one side or the other. Just as it is incumbent upon us as American citizens to remain neutral, so it behooves us likewise to exercise prudent self-restraint as Jews, neutral Jews. If this country hopes to be of service in composing the strife that has rent Europe in twain by the observance of strictest neutrality which will favor none nor offend any, so can we Jews of America only then be serviceable to the cause of Jewry by our attitude of fairness and justice to all.

The self-appointed spokesman of Jewry is abroad. He is a dangerous animal at all times, but more so now. That an English Jew should court the friendship of the world for the British cause is intelligible and even laudable. A similar plea, however, might be made by the German and Austrian Jews on behalf of their fatherlands. It would be the extreme of folly for us even for a moment to be betrayed into a position which is as imprudent as it is dangerous. No, if it is the duty of the belligerent Jew to fight for his flag, so it is the duty of the neutral Jew to be netural, no more and no less. This is inexorable logic dictated by the tremendous events of which we are involuntary witnesses.

The center of Jewry has been shifting for some time to this hemisphere. When the war has ceased, the eyes of mankind will be turned to this great land of the free and the eyes of Jewry to American Israel. Whether as a result of the war the wave of immigration will be turned to these shores (which we hope will remain hospitable) or no cannot be foretold. But even as things are at present the mere fact that so large a Jewish population as this country harbors has remained unscathed, with all our material and spiritual forces intact, will make us the standard bearers of Judaism in the world. And we are prepared to do our part unflinchingly, ungrudgingly, with our brawn and our brain, with material assistance and spiritual encouragement. Many a community will have to be helped on its feet again, many an institution will have to be revived, many a synagogue and school rebuilt, re-endowed. With God's help, it shall be done.

A LOVING TRIBUTE.

Solomon Weil, of Goldsboro, N. C., died on September 26, at Fabyans, N. H. Mr. Weil was a native of Wuerttemberg, Germany, and lived in Goldsboro for nearly 50 years. He is survived by a widow, a son and two daughters. Mr. Weil was one of the noblest men that ever lived, intelligent, hospitable, philanthropic, patriotic. For years he was an enthusiastic member of the Hebrew Orphan Board of Atlanta, Ga., and at his death the acting president. As a citizen he stood at the forefront, honored, esteemed, respected. At the late meeting of the council of the Union of American Congregations, held at Cincinnati, he and his wife gave, each, $1,000 to the Hebrew Union College. He and his good brother, Harry, who died six weeks ago, endowed the Goldsboro Hospital and donated 25 acres of land for a public park. He was ex-president of District Grand Lodge No. 5, I. O. B. B., and a delegate to many of the general conventions. He was a lover of books, of rare coins and other articles of virtue. As a loyal Jew and sincere friend he never had a superior. His family life was ideal, the latch string ever out for the stranger and the friend. The memory of such a man is ever an inspiration, his example a spur to younger generations. To me his death is irreparable. "Auf Wiedersehen."

In one of the editorials in our last issue we stated that the American Hebrew is the official organ of the American Jewish committee. We have since then been credibly informed that the American Jewish Committee has no official organ.

JACOB GREENEBAUM.
Past Grand Nasi Abh of District No. 4.

Die Reihen lueften sich. Yes, indeed, the ranks are getting thinner and the seniors among the past Grand Presidents of District No. 4 are vacating their front chairs to let the juniors move up so that they in turn may become seniors themselves.

The Dean of them has fallen and Jacob Greenebaum, who never missed a roll call of representatives in fifty-two years, has gone home to his fathers. He died on the State's birthday, September 9th, 1914, after attaining the ripe old age of eighty-three. Brother Greenebaum was the First Grand Nasi Abh—as the presidents were then called—of the District, and served for two terms, namely, in 1863 and 1864. Since then he has been in uninterrupted service of the Grand Lodge either as a member of the old Committee on Jurisprudence, the District Court, the B. B. Hall Association, the Board of Trustees of the Free Religious School, or of many important committees and boards. In 1905 he was a delegate to the Constitution Grand Lodge at New Orleans and presided over part of its deliberations as one of its vice-presidents. At the Golden Jubilee of the Grand Lodge in 1913, he was chairman of the evening at Temple Israel and gave us a very interesting resume of the first convention and the advent of Baruch Rothschild as the representative of the executive committee, coming hither via the Isthmus of Panama and bringing with him the Grand Lodge charter. His connection with the Free Religious School since its inception in 1891, proved him to be a man of genuine piety, deeply emotional, and rooted to his religion, nay, unswerving in his love for his people and for Judaism. He belonged to the radical reformed wing, not because he had ever read Abraham Geiger's Urschrift or lost himself in Samuel Hirsch's philosophy; not at all; he simply delighted to see his Judaism, which he considered a precious jewel, shine in a beautiful setting. That was all he cared for. He could step out of the Temple and into the lowliest Minyan and join in prayer without a scruple or quiver, happy and satisfied as long as he was among his own.

Brother Greenebaum was a pioneer of the state of California, having originally settled in Sacramento, the capital city. In the '60's he removed to San Francisco and engaged in the wholesale clothing business, which he carried on successfully until the early '70's when he formed the brokerage firm of Greenebaum-Helbing & Strauss, the latter of the Oscar Strauss family. The firm passed through the famous Comstock excitements, when fortunes were won and lost in one session of the exchange. Brother Greenebaum was the trading partner of the firm. His appearance on the floor of the exchange before the gong struck was ominous to his fellow-brokers, and his facial expressions were watched and studied with feverish scrutiny, for he was known to execute "inside orders."

Though a patriarch in years, he never looked much over sixty-five. His elastic step, straight pose and jovial disposition made him always welcome among the younger men.

His family is among the best known in the land. Louis Sloss and Louis Gerstle were both his brothers-in-law. They were the original incorporators of the Alaska Commercial Company, an historic corporation and one that made all its promoters multi-millionaires. He was cousin to the late Henry Greenebaum of Chicago, and the uncle of a judge of the Supreme Court of this state. The late Isadore Newman of New Orleans was a townsman, and the writer was privileged to listen to an exchange of boyhood reminiscences between the two about the old town of Kaiserslautern in the Rhein-Pfalz during the convention week of 1905. But then all the glitter of wealth counted for nothing in the eyes of Jacob Greenebaum when it came to choosing his companions and associates. It was his brethren he was seeking. That, after all, was the mainspring of his life. May the sod of California, the state he clung to so affectionately, rest lightly on him, and may his soul enjoy eternal bliss.

Frank Innocent, Conley Guilty Man

No doubt now in my mind of innocence of Frank, says Lawyer.

W. M. Smith, lawyer for Jim Conley, whose confession convicted Leo M. Frank of the murder of Mary Phagan, made this declaration Saturday:

"I am convinced from long study of the records in the case and from new evidence that I am not at liberty to divulge at present that Jim Conley is the real murderer of Mary Phagan. I believed sincerely in the guilt of Frank, but my further investigations have convinced me that I was mistaken, and I am sure that investigation by the proper authorities will prove conclusively that the black is the man who is the slayer.

"If my opinion is to be considered or have any weight, you can say for me that I am disappointed at the premature publication of my beliefs. While they have intelligent basis, I had hoped to amplify them, through assistance of the city police, without publication. As far as my knowledge goes, Frank was the first to express confidence that 'our police will solve the mystery,' and I believe that this utterance can yet be shown to have been prophetic. With loyal and enthusiastic support of Chief Beavers, Chief Lanford and the men of the police department ,my faith is that such evidence can be submitted to the Solicitor General, for his direction, so as to place the responsibility for this murder where it belongs.

"There were several reasons for my undertaking this work, and one of them was my promise to William J. Burns and Dan S. Lehon that if the Burns agency would help Mrs. Nelms to locate the girls or punish their murderer that I would give more time than I had to work on the Frank matter, and whatever results I was able to get I would contribute it to the case.

"No Doubt of Innocence."

"Both my wife and I have known the Nelms girls for years, my wife being a playmate with Eloise from childhood.

"As far as my opinion is to be valued by the public, I have no doubt that Frank is not guilty, and that his innocence can be established.

"Smith had a long conference with Solicitor Dorsey Saturday and presented the reasons for his change of belief. The solicitor would say nothing about the new aspect of the case.

Conley's lawyer, however, said that Mr. Dorsey had talked over the case with him and had made this remark:

"If you can convince me, go ahead. I am ready to listen to any arguments or new facts that may be advanced."

Frank received his first news of Smith's statement Saturday morning in the Tower before he had arisen.

"It is unnecessary for me to say that I am gratified by the news," he said. "I don't know exactly how much bearing it may have on my case, for I have no information as to the cause of Mr. Smith's change of opinion. He may have very important evidence in his possession or he may merely have been impressed by the flimsy case which the state had against me, and the much stronger one that developed against Conley.

Thinks Smith Knows Truth.

"He has been, of course, very close to Conley as a lawyer, and probably is the only man in a position to know what part of the negro's story was the truth and what part a fabrication.

"I had heard persistent rumors of this change of front on the part of Smith for a week or ten days. My first intimation of it was when a friend of mine came to me with the news that a person who had been very hostile to me had changed his opinion as a result of a conversation with Mr. Smith.

"I could not believe it at first, for I knew that Conley's lawyer had assisted in obtaining my conviction and I supposed him to be still of the same mind. Others told me of it since, but I had paid little attention to the report, since stories of this nature have cropped out almost every week for the last year.

"I have never seen Mr. Smith to know him, although I understand that he was at my trial much of the time. So far as I know, he has said nothing of his change of opinion to my lawyers. The first definite word came to me this morning in the information brought by a Georgian reporter."

Smith Withholds Reasons.

Attorney Smith said Saturday that he had continued his investigation of the case even after it had gone to the Supreme court, and after Conley had been convicted as an accessory. He asserted that he had come into possession of information that made him believe the wrong man had been convicted of the murder.

"Is it anything of a definite or positive nature?" he was asked.

"It was sufficient to convince me, and I believe it will appeal to others in the same light when I am ready to make it public," he replied.—The Atlanta Georgian.

NAT STRAUSS EIGHTIETH BIRTHDAY

Mr. Nat Strauss of New Orleans, secretary of District Grand Lodge No. 7, has passed another milestone in his life's journey, completing his eightieth year on Sept. 10. Although it was his wish to observe the day quietly in the privacy of his family circle, he was given a great surprise in the evening, and his residence was thronged with friends and well wishers, delegations from the B'nai B'rith, the Touro Infirmary, the Synagogue and other organizations in which Mr. Strauss is active. Within a few minutes the whole house and surroundings were turned into a garden in a blaze of lights. The Home band composed of children of the Jewish Orphans' Home discoursed sweet music. Mr. Ralph J. Schwarz, acting as spokesman for the assembled friends, reviewed the active and beneficent life of Mr. Strauss.

Brother Strauss has devoted a long and active life in the interests of the Order and the B'nai B'rith News voices the sentiment of the members of the Order when it adds words of felicitation coupled with the prayer that Brother Strauss may be vouchsafed to observe many, many more birthday anniversaries.

SAM SCHLOSS EIGHTY YEARS YOUNG.

Mr. Sam Schloss, a veteran of Memphis, Tenn., became 80 years young a few days ago and he was the recipient of congratulations and best wishes from a wide circle of friends. Mr. Schloss was a charter member of Euphrates Lodge of the Order, which subsequently amalgamated with another lodge and became known as Memphis Lodge No. 35. He has been actively interested in charity work and has at all times been a loyal and ardent Ben B'rith.

The B'nai B'rith News joins in the wish of his many friends that Mr. Schloss be spared for many years to come in the full enjoyment of health and vigor.

A CORRECTION.

The September issue of the News, in reporting the celebration of the seventieth birthday anniversary of Mr. Jacob Furth of St. Louis, inadvertently omitted to mention that Rabbi Jos. S. Kornfeld of Columbus, Ohio, President of District Grand Lodge No. 2, was among the speakers.

DEATH OF MR. JOS. H. HIRSCH.

After an illness of several months Mr. Jos. H. Hirsch one of the best known and esteemed citizens of Atlanta, Ga., died at Atlantic City, where he had gone with his family on account of failing health, at the age of 69. Mr. Hirsch was a resident of Atlanta since 1868, was active in all affairs affecting Judaism; he was one of the founders of the B'nai B'rith Orphan Home of Atlanta and at the time of his death was its president; and for a quarter of a century president of the congregation. He was prominent in civic affairs, and was the founder of the Grady Hospital, served as alderman and as councilman and was at one time candidate for mayor.

The funeral was attended by representatives of all the religious, civic and charitable organizations of the city. In response to a call of the mayor of the city, the city council held a special session and adopted resolutions deploring the death of Mr. Hirsch and ordering the flag of the city hall flown at half mast and urging the mayor and members of the council to attend the funeral.

The leading papers of Atlanta devoted editorials paying high tribute to the worth of Jos. H. Hirsch as a man and as a citizen.

WILLIAM SAALBURG, PAST GRAND PRESIDENT.

And now it was Wm. Saalburg who was laid to rest. His funeral took place on the afternoon of the second day Rosh-Hashanah. While Greenebaum with his eighty-four years on his shoulders was essentially, a man of the present day, Saalburg a man of eighty, had his existence entirely in the past. He talked of the bygone and thought of periods that have long faded from memory. He was President of the district in 1878, the year the first B'nai B'rith Building in the world was erected, laid its cornerstone, dedicated it and presided over the first Grand Lodge session held within its walls. Those recollections were a source of pride to him in his declining years and a solace as he realized, that he was nearing the threshold of Eternity. His love for the Order had the true ring to it and he never allowed it to be displaced by the show and tinsel of other fraternities to which he belonged. His wish, repeatedly expressed, was, that the only service at his funeral consist of that of the B'nai B'rith and his wish was respected.

Brother Saalburg attended several General Conventions during the '70s, when the representation came direct from the lodges and often would he revert to interesting little scenes in that body wherein the actors were leaders of the Order when some of the present Executive Members were still carying their little knapsacks to school. He was an active participant in the communal Charities of San Francisco and served as President of Congregation Sherith Israel, at the period when it was the leading Orthodox Congregation west of the Rocky Mountains.

Some time in the '60s, he acquired ownership of the weekly "Hebrew Observer," established by the Pioneer Rabbi of California, the scholarly Doc. Eckman and conducted that paper for a generation alone until Reverend M. S. Levy in 1880, became his associate and with him purchased "The Jewish Times" from Emanuel Katz, consolidated it with the "Hebrew Observer" and continued it under the double name, until the conflagration of 1906.

For a number of years he edited "Saalburg's Kalender" a German publication full of the keenest wit.

In early days San Francisco was noted the world over for its "Bohemia." That realm was divided into national sections, Saalburg was a leader in German "Bohemia," where he could give full sway to his passion for music and humor. He revelled in both, no matter how thick the clouds seemed to others. He created for the "Observer" the Jonke and Janker dialogue that ran for years and dispelled the blues for thousands of his readers. Schultz and Muller who have been holding the footlights in the Berliner Kladredatch for perhaps 75 years were their prototypes.

In his Kalender he impersonated a then well-known and highly amusing figure in the wholesale streets of San Francisco, who eked out an existence by pretending to trade in old clothes when as a fact, they were given to him. Little Harris was made to keep up a correspondence with his sister, somewhere in Poland, she being of course his intellectual equal. The letters, written in Posener Mauschel dialect were inimitable in their quaintness and wonderfully naive. Some wag put Harris wise one day, who, in consequence called at Saalburg's sanctum and demanded reparation. That was grist for Saalburg's mill. The next Kalender contained an explanation very satisfactory to Harris. Those who read the explanation acknowledged that they had received the full value of their years' subscription.

Religiously, he was a pronounced and uncompromising Orthodox, everybody wished him well. Thus it is that another front chair in the Grand Lodge has become vacant. Four in twelve months.

THREE THOUSAND JEWS BURNED OUT.

The Associated Press reports that a serious conflagration occurred in the Jewish section of Constantinople known as Haskeui, that 800 houses, principally occupied by the Jews, were destroyed by the fire on September 23. Three thousand Jews are now homeless and in great distress. The authorities are reported to be distributing provisions among the stricken.

NATIONALISM AND IMPERIALISM

By Dr. Max L. Margolis

Written for the B'nai B'rith News.

The titanic struggle now going on in Europe had for its immediate cause the assassination of the heir presumptive to the Austrian throne and his consort in the capital of Bosnia. The Austrians had proof that the plot had been hatched in Servia under the eyes, as it were, of the government. It is unnecessary to rehearse here how Austria addressed to the little kingdom in the south a stern ultimatum, how Servia regarded one of the demands in particular as an infringement upon its sovereign rights, how Russian sympathies were aroused, and so on. There are a great many people who think that gauged by the measure of the stupendous sacrifice of human lives and the enormous destruction of property, even the death of an Archduke was a trivial matter, that the quarrel might have been composed if the will had been there, that militarism was at fault, that war was wanted and that the dispute with Servia was but a pretext. In truth, however, the immediate cause was itself the outcome of the deeper and graver cause which alone is responsible for the European catastrophe, to-wit: the incompatibility of the two principles which are at the root of the policy of modern states, nationalism and imperialism.

The great national states of Europe began to emerge in the middle ages on the ruins of imperial Rome. Imperialism is a species of internationalism, but of the wrong kind. Moreover, it spells death to the nation itself that engages in it. Rome and Athens and before them Babylonia and Egypt succumbed from the same cause. In antiquity conquest was the absorbing passion of powerful states. Given two rival states each hungry for land and power and the clash was inevitable. The strip of narrow land bordering on the great sea which we call Palestine was coveted alike by Assyria and Egypt. Imperialism demanded its incorporation in that vast system now centering on the banks of Euphrates now in the Nile valley. It mattered little to the potentates of Nineveh and Babylon or the Pharaohs that the little Palestinian people had a precious individuality which it strove to maintain. The claims of the weaker nationalities to a place in the sun were ignored. Whole populations were transplanted from one end of the empire to another. For imperialism must needs crush nationalism. And the result was that these empires, whether Assyrian or Roman, constituted agglomerates of unrelated nationalities, each incapable of understanding the other, a heterogeneous mass. By destroying homogeneity the empire dealt the death blow to itself. It became an easy prey to one stronger, fresher than itself. And so it went on. The character of the empire changed but little whether Achaemenians or the generals of Alexander or the patricians of Rome wielded the scepter. An empire must fall by its own weight; it is unwieldy.

Rome probably boasted of a larger empire than any of its predecessors. It split into Orient and Occident long before the advent of the northern barbarians. The empire toppled over like a house of cards. Yet the principle of nationalism was slow to manifest itself. Pagan Rome bequeathed its idea of world-dominion to the Church. In its new garb, the idea was fascinating. All mankind was to acknowledge the supremacy of the Bishop of Rome. The Frankish kings made a compact with the Church and so the Holy Roman Empire was born. The vernaculars of Europe were then in the making. The language of civilization was the Latin, the language of prayer, and that was thought to be a sufficient link. This is not the place to narrate the story of the formation of the various European states. England and France emerged first out of the chaos, Germany and Italy realized their dream as late as the nineteenth century. Suffice it to say that the Reformation gave the impetus to nation building. The universal Church was split into ever so many state Churches. Over against the Roman principle of internationalism stood the Lutheran principle of individualism. The newer creed was that the individual man was the maker of his own salvation. He required not the offices of an organized world-Church to open the gates of heaven for him. Translated into the political sphere it meant independent nationalities claiming absolute sovereignty, responsible to none but themselves.

It would be all well if these nations would rest satisfied with their achievements and refrain from encroaching upon the domain of weaker nationalities. Study the history of any of these nations and you will find them at one time or another engaged in expansion. The map of Europe was made and remade. When the Holy Roman Empire in its unwieldy vastness became a prey to decentralizing tendencies, when it was thus weakened by internecine warfare, the western neighbor invaded it and Louis XIV wrested whole stretches of Teutonic territory incorporating them in his own realm. And so Prussia preyed upon the weakness of Austria, and both together with Russia divided among themselves the possessions of the Polish nation which was ruled out of existence. Naturally the domain of the heathen in the Near and the Far East, in all the corners of the universe for that matter, was drawn into the sphere of influence of this or the other great power. The result was inevitable. Imperialism was forced on the one hand to impose its domination over unwilling races crushing them out of existence or subduing them to the dominant layer of population. Or the empire by the process of absorption harbored many diverse nationalities which refused to live in peace with one another. An empire to maintain itself must indeed proceed ruthlessly. The Turk who allowed the Christian nationalities within his border a certain amount of autonomy has been shorn of almost all of his possessions in Europe. Austria, if we may believe the Russian bulletins, is in her last throes. For it is the one heterogeneous mass in Western Europe, the result of constant aggression on its part. Russia and Germany are likewise imperialistic. The more of foreign elements they absorbed, the more it was felt that to safeguard the state it was supremely necessary to make it homogeneous. With Danes and Alsatians and Poles added to its citizenship, Germany had to be on the alert against itself as it were. Hence the scheme of colonizing Posen with Germans quite in the fashion of the old system of transplanting populations in the days of Sargon. Russify Poland and Finland, was the cry of the Pan-Slavist. And as for the poor Jew who has a soul of his own, he was ground between the upper and nether millstone. In Posen he was German and in Cracow Austrian and in Warsaw Russian! To keep him down, pogroms were invented. Yet he is the most loyal son of a stepmotherly country.

From the point of view of efficiency, the policy of forcible reduction to homogeneity works well. But it is artificial at the best and must break down. It will some day dawn upon the minds of men that nationalism and imperialism are incompatible. And if it be asked, what is the mark of nationality, the answer will name language as the most potent element that makes for separation. All nations, the small and the great, must be given a chance to exist. Perchance that out of this Armageddon the new humanity will emerge, divided into tongues and families, united by a common purpose to live in peace with one another and to further the works of peace. A federated mankind, what a noble dream, the dream of Israel's seers, the prayer that is on Israel's lips! Imperialism must give way to the internationalism which does not destroy nationalities, but affords them equally ample scope each within its legitimate boundaries. It may be that some are not yet ready and for a time must be under the tutelage of more civilized communities; but it should be the business of true statesmanship to prepare them for their future career of national independence. Then and then only war will cease from the earth and an abiding peace will be established, when each nation will be an end in itself and yet all work in common harmony for the betterment of mankind, for the suppression of vice and disease, for a healthy development of personality, individual and national.

350,000 RUSSIAN JEWS IN THE FIELD.

The Mayor of Petrograd, Count Tolstoi, stated at the Conference of Russian Mayors that there were at present 350,000 Jews in the Russian army.

The letters published in the Press from Jewish wounded soldiers show that they are in excellent spirits.

ARAB THREATS AGAINST SYRIAN JEWS.

The Arabs in Syria, taking advantage of the fact that the Central Government is absorbed by the cares of the national defense, are threatening pogroms against the Jews in Syria, which, as one of the Arab newspapers declares, will surpass in horror any that have hitherto been perpetrated. It is believed, however, that these threats will not materialize, as the Government is more than ever determined to preserve order throughout the Empire.

EDWARD LASKER AS MAN AND POLITICIAN.

The "Neue Freie Presse" recently published a character sketch of the late Edward Lasker from the pen of the well known publicist Alberta von Puttkammer. Madame Puttkammer is the widow of the late statesman who was a member of the German Parliament and later became secretary of the German Empire. During the years of 1867 to 1881 Mr. and Mrs. Puttkammer often had as guests at their table the great national party leaders Benningsen, Miquel and Lasker and Madame von Puttkammer often participated in the political discussions which were there carried on by these four celebrated leaders.

Madame von Puttkammer writes:

"Edward Lasker was especially dear to me. The 'little Jew,' as Bismarck called him, was in his external appearance and in his demeanor the most insignificant person. He spoke in sharp fixed dactyles. This was somewhat derogatory to his parlimentary speeches, which otherwise were perfect models of thoughtfulness and style.

Lasker was indeed prominent in constructive oratory, but he was much greater in replication. He pointed counter arguments like glittering arrows and shot effectively sharp and straight to his targets.

Among the three leaders of the national liberal party Lasker was the most theoretical politician, while the others recognized their true strength in the practical successess of state craft.

Lasker was unmarried and awkward in ladies' society. It was noticeable that his whole life was devoted to the most earnest intellectual labor, to studies and to activity of higher science of government. Proudly he held the sensibilties of his life under lock and key; but from some talks which I had with him I am convinced that he was an idealist and of deep feeling. This is also evident in the 'Experiences of the Soul of a man,' published by Auerbach, which Lasker soon withdrew from circulation. He had the purest character, entirely untouched by the wantonly practiced incorporation swindles and his speeches against the politics of the Prussian Minister of Commerce, von Itzenplitz, were of such powerful influence that an investigating commission was appointed which caused the breakdown of the swindle.

He died a lonely man with the great unstilled longing for the realization of his ideals in his soul. It is remarkable that I am always overwhelmed with pity and tragic effect when I think of the little man with the bright, clear-sighted eyes, which could sometimes look dreamy and with his quick fresh and clever speech. He was really the only one of the four whose entire striving whose ideal wishing and working were negatived in the end. True, the life of the other three was also full of struggles and not free from disappointments, but they also earned much positive profit of success, honors and victories."

MARRIAGE STATISTICS IN GERMANY.

In the marriage statistics recently published in the "Berliner Tageblatt" are the following interesting items regarding the confessions of the contracting parties:

There were 16,707 purely evangelic couples, 1,646 couples of whom the men were evangelic and the women Catholics. Among 1,887 couples the men were Catholics and the women evangelic; 150 evangelic women married Jewish men and 22 Catholic women were married to Jews. The total of purely Jewish marriages was 529. One Mohammedan and one Budhist married each an evangelical woman. Dissenters from the established church married 432 evangelic, 48 Catholic, 12 Jewish and 53 dissenting women.

HOW THE JEWS ARE AFFECTED BY THE PRESENT WAR.

The number of Jews directly affected by the war may be roughly estimated as follows: Russia, 6,200,000; Austria, 1,313,000; Hungary, 932,000; Germany, 615,000; Great Britain, 250,000; France, 100,000; Servia, 15,000; Belgium, 15,000; Canada, 75,000; Australasia, 20,000; Morocco, 110,000; Algeria, 65,000; Tunis, 65,000; S. Africa, 46,000; India, 20,000. Total, 9,841,000. As the total number of Jews in the world is about thirteen millions, it will be seen that something like three quarters of the Jewish race are, more or less, directly involved in the present hostilities—a tremendous penalty to pay for their dispersion among the nations.

ORIGIN OF HOSPITALS.

Not Creation of Christianity.

By Emily Adams.

Christians are very apt to claim all the good things of the world as results of their religion, but sometimes we are compelled to prove to them that there were good things before the days of Jesus of Nazareth. This matter of hospitals is certainly one in which they must stand aside and allow "them of old time" to bear the palm.

Hospitals are evidently the outgrowth of dispensaries, and we are told that as far back as the eleventh century B. C the Egyptians had medical officers who were paid by the state and who attended in some public place to prescribe for the sick who came there. These were qualified men, for at this early date there was a College of Physicians, and only those who were licensed by this college were allowed to practice. Some of these were specialists for the eyes, the teeth and the brain.

In Athens, in the fifth century B. C., we have the first mention of the word hospital, though dispensaries were common before that time into which patients were received and in which doctors paid by the state sought to relieve the sufferings of humanity.

The Romans had public physicians at an early date, though for a long time they prided themselves on not having copied the Greeks in this particular. In the early days every house was thrown open in times of sickness or accident.

"For the Romans were like brothers
In the brave days of old," and hospitals were not needed where such free hospitality was exercised.

We may suppose, from a remark in the Bible, that the Jews had one hospital, for incurables; for Uzziah retired to a "several house" when he was pronounced to be afflicted with leprosy.

But to those who know anything of the life of Buddha, and who have heard anything of the precepts of self-sacrifice and benevolence that he taught it will be no surprise to find that India is the home of the hospital, as the aim of this great teacher was the endeavor to solve the way of saving men from disease and death. About 325 B. C. King Asolia commanded his people to build hospitals for the poor, the sick and distressed at each of the four gates of Patua and throughout his dominions. Of these Fa Hian, a Chinese pilgrim, writing about 400 A. D., speaks as follows: "The nobles and landowners of this country have founded hospitals in the city to which the poor of all countries, the destitute, the cripples, the diseased, may repair for shelter. They receive every kind of help gratuitously. Physicians inspect their diseases and according to their cases order them food and drink, decoctions and medicines, everything, in fact, which may contribute to their case. When cured they depart at their own convenience." Another Chinese pilgrim, writing in 648 A. D., mentions a mutlitude of these establishments. This open-handed generosity to the "poor of all countries" is a contrast to the deeds of the Teacher of Galilee, who announced that He had not come "save to the lost sheep of the house of Israel" and seemed to grudge the cure of those of other nations, though (according to the story) it cost Him but a word to effect such cure.

The first Christian hospital was built by a Roman lady named Fabiola, in the fourth century A. D., so that it took some time for Christianity to begin to develop this good fruit, though Egyptians, Greeks and Hindus had long before shown the value of it.

Respecting insane asylums, the record is as little in favor of Christianity. The Egyptians and Greeks cared for the insane in the precincts of some of their temples; the Mohammedans in the seventh century built asylums for the insane at Fez, while the first Christian asylum we hear of was built at Valencia in Spain in 1409. These pagans and unbelievers treated their patients with kindness and sought to relieve them by diversions. It was left for Christianity to devise the mediaeval modes of cure—the prison, the chain, the rack, the stake, combined with every form of abuse that ingenuity could devise. This was in the palmy days of the church, when she had full sway. Now reason and science once more assert themselves, and the modern followers of Hippocrates and Galen, having no belief in demoniacal possession, have no need to resort to the violent and abusive methods devised by ignorant priests for driving the demon out of his supposed quarters.—Jewish Review.

NEWS FROM LONDON

BY OUR CORRESPONDENT DR. M. EPSTEIN

London, Sept. 17, 1914.

Unhappily the war is still with us. All our talk is of its progress; all our newspapers are filled to the very brim with news of battle shocks. A Rip Van Winkle coming into our midst just now would conclude that the world had shrunk. We hear little of anything or of anywhere beyond the fighting line. The election of the Pope was tucked away in a small corner of the news-sheet. How different it would have been in normal times. We should have had pompous leaders and heavy typed headlines. But these are reserved for the events at the front. And what rumors and half truths are put before us! Reports and messages and opinions—they are all commingled, truth and falsehood together. We even boast of a history of the war already. Such is twentieth century economic enterprise. Our veriest babes babble of soldiers and of fighting. Our street urchins pretend to be in trenches and play the game of warriors. All this is just the straw on the face of the mighty waters, but it is significant enough.

There are, however, deeper things. Go to any railway terminus in London and you will see there sights to move the heart and bring moisture to the eyes. We do not mean the wounded soldiers brought home to be nursed. We mean the civil population from Belgium and from Northern France fleeing from war's horrors. They have felt the scorching blast; they have been torn by the sharpened claw. Rich and poor alike have come to these islands for safety. The Belgians have suffered most. And when the siege of Paris was imminent, over a million and a half people left the French capital. Some left of their own accord, others were urged to leave by the authorities. The less mouths to feed the better. The same applies to Antwerp, from which all foreigners were shipped to England. That numbers of Jews are among them we need hardly say. Some are Russians, who have been students in Belgium, or diamond cutters or have been earning an honest livelihood in other ways. Some are German Poles; some are Hungarians. All are miserable. To see the extent of the suffering it is necessary only to go to the Poor Jews' Temporary Shelter, which has been made a distributing center for the refugees. Visit the center and you see one aspect of war.

There are hundreds of them. Some have been well to do until the war broke out. Some even have small means. One woman came with a French bank book showing that she has some 12,000 francs (say 2,400 dollars) to her credit. But how make the money fluid so that she might be able to live on it? Here was husband and wife and three months' old baby. He was a medical student in Paris; so was she. Both Russians, cultivated, educated, highly respectable people. They spoke French and Russian. She could be useful as a masseuse. What were you to do? Find them a home—that is the first thing. Find them employment if possible—that is the second. But the difficulty of the situation is obvious. It is a little easier to deal with single men. There stands a student of a technical college; he has almost completed his course. What are you to do with him? He refuses charity; he wants work. But what work can you offer him? At last he goes to a sweating den and works as a journeyman presser. Poor soul! But he still has his pride. Most difficult of all are the single girls. Two are orphans — fatherless and motherless. A brother in America had arranged for them to leave Russia and come to him. They were on their journey in a German ship. When war broke out the ship was captured and brought into Plymouth. The two orphans had been entrusted to a whole family of emigrants to be looked after. Perfect strangers, mind you. Yet the mother of the family looked after the two girls as though they were her own. Even under the roof of the Shelter she kept them by her side, spreading her wings over them as it were, lest harm reach them. It was a touching sight. But we Jews can understand it. A Jewish mother is a noble woman.

These are just glimpses of the scenes that may be witnessed at the Poor Jews' Temporary Shelter. There the poor refugees get clothes; they are fed there; and homes are provided for them wherever these are available. You in America must have heard of Mr. Hermann Landau. Mr. Landau is the President of the Shelter and just now he spends a long day, often of twelve hours and more, at the institution. The voluntary workers also put in many long hours of toil; they are just splendid. It is pleasing to be able to chronicle that individual members of the Lodge have done their duty by the Shelter, some by going there to work in person, other by taking refugees to their homes and lodging them for longer or shorter periods.

But the Lodge as a whole has also been up and doing. The problem of the refugees is tremendous, and all agencies that are able must lend a hand. The first thing is to house and feed these homeless ones, men, women and little children. The Shelter does very, very much. Other societies are tackling the problem too. The First Lodge of England has taken a house with a view to housing and feeding some fifty of the refugees of the better sort. The Shelter caters for the very poor. But middle class refugees run some danger of being overlooked. For these the Lodge will attempt to do something. It will mean personal service; it will also mean gifts in money and in kind. The war has affected most people economically, nevertheless we are certain that this work will not be allowed to languish. For the present the Lodge is appealing for means to enable it to run the house for two months. We are fortunate in having several energetic members who have taken the business in hand and are bringing to bear upon it their specialized knowledge and experience. There is no need to mention all the names, but everybody will agree that the name of Mr. Maurice Meyers deserves special mention in this connection.

So we Jews are attempting to deal with our own people and thus ease the pressure on the General and National Committee which has been formed to look after the refugees. The response has been splendid. people in the fashionable heights of Hampstead have taken some of the children to their homes, and their poor brethren in Whitechapel have been no less hospitable. A peculiar case has been brought to our notice. A party of refugees found their way into a workhouse on the East side. They would touch only such food as they might do with a good conscience—bread and water and such like. The Sabbath was approaching. A few kind souls in North London, well-to-do Jews they were, heard of the workhouse refugees and sent down someone with the necessary cash to furnish them with a right royal Sabbath meal. The messenger came too late. The local Jews, poor tailors and peddlers, had heard of the sorry plight of their brethren in the workhouse and had provided, as the North London man was informed, a couple of chickens, fried fish and the rest of the usual things associated with Sabbath fare. Is it a wonder that Jews have been called kind-hearted?

There are other aspects of the war, equally touching. A man we saw the other day used words akin to those of Naomi. "I was a rich man in Antwerp only a month ago. Today I am a beggar." He was a German resident in the Belgian city, the owner of a flourishing business. On the outbreak of war the Germans were given twenty-four hours' notice to quit. He left with the rest, taking with him what easily portable articles he could. Indeed, the stories of flying men and women seeking a haven of rest are often enough tragi-comedies. We were told of a German Jew of Paris who fled to Switzerland just in the nick of time. Exceedingly orthodox, he was galled to have to travel on a Sabbath. But necessity knows no law, and he feared that his life was in danger. He took little with him; but his Tephillin were of course in his trunk. He arrived at the Franco-Swiss frontier; he was searched. The official came upon the Tephillin. "What's that?" was his question. The man explained as best he could. He was a Jew and he used the things when saying his prayers. The official, exceedingly careful in time of war, wanted to make quite sure. It might be bombs; who knows? Remembering that a colleague was a Jew, he summoned him and asked for corroboration. Yes, it was quite correct. He did not use such things himself, but he knew what they were. Still, to make doubly sure the first official asked the refugee to demonstrate to him by putting them on that there was nothing harmful in them. So our friend, very orthodox though he was, had perforce to "lay" his Tephillin on a Saturday! It is a true story. Perhaps the incident was of no great consequence to the victim in face of graver things. His son was fighting with the French, his son-in-law with the Germans. Such cases are frequent enough and perhaps more among Jews than Gentiles. This is but one of the choice fruits of war.

One could mention others. Do our American readers realize, for instance, that we are cut off entirely from friends and relatives in Germany and Austria-Hungary, and they from us? We were talking to a French lady about this; she saw the stupidity of it. "But what would you?" she said. "C'est la Guerre!" Yes, indeed, that is an aspect of war that is absurdly cruel. The stupidity, the absurdity, the cruelty—we should steel ourselves to bear them all. But what is so maddening is that God Almighty is being dragged into it. From the Kaiser, who on the battlefield, addressing his troops, was confident that unser alter Gott would help them, to Archbishops and Bishops, Chief Rabbis and Rabbis, jingo ministers of religion and preachers who take their cue from the loudest chauvinists, all alike are erring from the straight road. English clergymen will pray for the aid of God to their arms and their German Colleagues to theirs. We are still waiting for the minister of religion who shall boldly pray for the cessation of wars, for the time "when nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more."

The Jews in England like all other English citizens, have responded to their country's call for soldiers. Already a number of wounded Jews are in hospitals. Their conduct on the field of battle has won praise from some of the comrades. One Highland regiment is known as the Black Watch. A corporal and two privates, invalided home, were being questioned about their experiences, and someone asked what the Jews did. "Did? They did their duty. We had three with us and bonnier lads and braver I don't wish to see. They fought just splendid!" Such was the answer. Another Scotchman related that they had ten Jews in their company, all good fighters, "and six won't be seen again." It would appear that the Russian Jews were also distinguishing themselves. No doubt you in America have been reading of Osnas the Hero, a Jewish medical student from Vilna who has received the military cross of St. George for saving the colors of his regiment under severe stress. Doubtless the German Jews are not behind their brethren on the opposite side. We have no details. But here and there little items of news come trickling through which are significant. Thus we were told that among those who were killed before Mühlhausen was Dr. Frank, the brilliant Socialist leader, who has been called Lassalle the second. Gifted as an orator and an organizer, he was one of the foremost figures in the Social Democracy of Germany. One of the tolls of war; there must be many others such. Fathers and sons gone and the womenfolk left behind to weep and watch. O that a curse from heaven fall upon the war-makers! O that the nations were stirred by the sights and sounds unholy to beat their swords into ploughshares and their spears into pruning hooks! And Jews should be among the first to take their stand on the side of peaceful methods for settling international disputes.

Some say war brings out certain good qualities in men and in nations. Possibly they are right. But at what price! It must be due to the mysterious influence of war that the Jews in Russia have seen a ray of light. According to a Petrograd correspondent of one of the London papers Jews are to be allowed to become officers in both the Russian Army and Navy. There are so many wild rumors in the air in war time, and this may be but one of them. Of course it may be true. But we shall not see the significance of this piece of news until the war is over. In some quarters there are great expectations of sweeping changes in Russia, changes for the better—for greater freedom and enlightment all around—as soon as the war is brought to a conclusion. A man like Paul Vinogradoff, Professor of Law at the University of Oxford, a man with a world-wide reputation, who has been summoned to be a minister in the Russian capital but finding things not liberal enough for him returned to his refuge in England to teach and lecture—a man of that stamp has placed on record his conviction that a new Russia is about to arise in the sight of mankind, a purged Russia, liberalized, democratized, modernized. We Jews certainly wish it. Anyhow, if Prof. Vinogradoff represents a prophecy, Sir Edward Grey, the British Foreign Minister, stands for a fact. What do we find? On September 9, 1914, Mr. Israel Zangwill made public an announcement of great moment. He asked the British Foreign Office to authorize him to say that England looked with sympathy on the cause of Jewish emancipation in Russia, and has received from Sir Edward Grey the assurance that he is very fully aware of the importance of the subject and would neglect no opportunity of encouraging the reform in question. Of course, the terms are vague. But then Diplomatists have to be careful of their words. Still, it is good to know that Sir Edward Grey says he can be counted upon for assistance. War times are abnormal; Ministers' pronouncements in war time may therefore be abnormal too. On the other hand, there may be truth in them. At least we have the record in black and white, published in what is regarded as our foremost daily journal.

The Religious New Year is almost with us; the old year will die away to the sound of cannon and the clash of arms. Will the civil year end with the ringing of peace-bells? Surely this is no unworthy thought for Jews at prayer during the ensuing holidays. We must go back a hundred years to realize something of the feelings that our ancestors then had, feelings akin to ours of today. How much has happened in that century! On the whole it has meant progress. May the peace that must come sooner or later bring still more progress in its train, progress for the world, special progress in the position of the Jew where that is necessary. Goethe said, "more light." Today it is more fraternal sentiments we need. In the name of the First Lodge of England we would send fraternal greetings for the year 5675 to all our brethren in the States and Canada, no less than to those living in Germany and Austria.

DAVID WOLFSOHN.

On September 15, 1914, in the Hague, Holland, Mr. David Wolfsohn died in the 58th year of his life. Mr. Wolfsohn was a leader of the Zionistic movement. Dr. Theodor Herzl, the founder of Zionism, recognized Wolfsohn's brilliant qualities and gave him his full confidence and warm friendship. After Herzl's death Wolfsohn was elected President of the Actions Committee in which capacity he served from 1905 to 1911. He was then elected chairman of the Board of Directors of the Jewish Colonial Bank of London. Mr. Wolfsohn was a self-made man and very successful in his business life. He devoted a great deal of time and money to the interests of Zionism. He established a reputation for honesty and sincerity and his memory deserves to be honored by his whole people.

POLISH LIBEL UPON JEWS.

It is reported from London that the Anti-Semitic organ of the Poles, "Dva Grasha," has published a new libel on the Jews whom it accuses of having smuggled 150 million rubles into Germany. The newspaper alleges that the Jews held a "fake" funeral and that in the coffin, instead of the corpse, was hid the said sum of money.

The governor has prohibited the sale of "Dva Grasha" on account of this scandalous libel. At the same time, however, the "Novoye Vremya" seized the opportunity to slander the Jews and reprinted the article in question. The liberal Russian organ "Rietch" attacked the "Novoye Vremya" for stirring up the populace against the Jews by vulgar and spiteful accusations.

COMMENT.

The Hebrews are a noble race, and the Jewish people carried the true religion from the dawn of history, and it preserved scholarship through the dark ages. The Israelitish government was the first representative system, the first that marked the limitations of kings and held them responsible to the people. They are a model people in their veneration for parents, in their devotion to the home and the family, in their care for their own suffering ones, in their daily practice of the great principle of giving to charity, in their breadth of view as to obligations to all charitable undertakings and to community interests. There are many fundamental lessons in practical, every-day living that Christians may learn from their Jewish brethren.—News, Birmingham, Ala.

Thoughts and Tidings---A Review of Passing Events

By H. Eliassof

To My Beloved Jews:

The history of the lives of the Kings and Emperors of the world does not always record thrilling tales of tragedy, deeds of heroic daring and inspiring incidents of judicious judgment. The chronicles of the lives of the crowned heads often teem with plain comedy, tragicomedy, roaring farce and irritating irony. The greatest tragedy in the lives of the so-called rulers by the grace of God has always been their impatience and disinclination to listen to the truth, and the most bitter irony of their reigns has always been the impudence of their perfidious promises to the credulous people, whenever they were in fear of losing the allegiance of their subjects or wanted the masses to give their lives for the glittering glory and the artificial aggrandizement of their sovereign lord or for the bolstering up of a tottering throne. This was not the case in ancient times only; it happens also today and the history of modern Russian czardom furnishes ample evidence in support of the above statements. Was the building of paper houses in the Crimea by Potemkin, the favorite of Catherine II., in order to impress the czarina with the great progress of that part of her country, anything else than a roaring farce? Were the advocacy of peace by Nicholas II., taken in the light of his subsequent actions, his emancipation edict which culminated in the red Sunday and his establishment of the Duma which led to the incarceration of deputies who signed the Wiborg manifesto, anything else than tragicomedies? And to cap the climax of absurdity it is now reported that when Czar Nicholas was mobilizing his army for war on Germany and Austria-Hungary he had a proclamation printed in Yiddish in which he addressed the Russian Jews, who for years have been and still are suffering from his most cruel persecutions as "My Beloved Jews!" In his impudent royal document he had the audacity to defy the truth and to remind the Jews, who suffer the torments of hell in his realm, of the numberless benefits which Russia has bestowed upon them! Surely, this is the shameless and heartless irony of an executioner who taunts his helpless victims while he crushes out their lives! The latest report coming from Copenhagen is that Czar Nicholas has promised the Russian Jews full rights of citizenship, if they only join the army and fight for the glory of their fatherland. It seems that the Jews of Russia have placed faith in these promises and are kindled with patriotic enthusiasm. In Petrograd and in Kiev thousands of Jews marched with sifray torah, scrolls of the law, to the royal palace, and to the governor's mansion, singing the Russian national hymn and kneeling down proclaimed their loyalty to their country and to the throne of the Czar. The mayor of Petrograd reports that there are more than 300,000 Jews in the Russian army. At Odessa and Ekaterinoslav the Jews have organized military hospitals and at Simferopol they have offered the premises of the Talmud Torah for the use of the Red Cross. In many towns they are raising funds for the aid of the Red Cross and for the support of the needy families of soldiers who went to the front. The Jewish soldiers are doing their full duty on the battle fields in the ranks of the Russian army. Yet the world greatly doubts whether the Russian Jews can rely upon the Czar's promises, if he ever made any. The opinions of prominent American Jews differ widely in this respect. Hon. Oscar Straus and Prof. Richard Gottheil, who have lately returned from the European zone of war, say that the Czar must and will grant freedom to the Jews. Louis Marshall, on the contrary, warns us not to place too much confidence in the promises of the Czar, and Prof. Gottlard Deutch states emphatically, 'Do not take much stock in the rumor, but think it a ruse to awaken sympathy and also for proper effect on the financial market." Some of the American Jewish papers call these reported promises of the Czar a "Russian mirage," a "sardonic humor" and a "cryptic announcement" and what we still hear from Russia certainly fails to give so much encouragement to hope for a speedy improvement in the terrible lot of our Russian coreligionists. They are still being driven out of the villages. [illegible] Bernstein, the noted journalist, [illegible] to be in possession of reliable in[illegible] that the Czar has massed the Jews along the German and Austrian frontiers as buffer against invading armies, to be killed off, the pale of settlement is still in existence and the schools are still practically closed against the Jewish students.

Two disconsolate and disheartening facts linger in the history of darkest Russia like two shafts of gloom. They occur and reoccur again and again and extinguish every ray of hope which rises from time to time in the hearts of the Russian intellectuals for the dawn of liberty for the Russian people. The first is the fact that the Czars never keep their promises and the second fact is that the rulers of the house of Romanoff, who at the start of their reign appear to be inclined to give the people a more liberal government and to grant them some freedom, soon fall a prey to the severest autocratic reaction. Their powerful supersition always drives them sooner or later into the arms of the liberty-hating Greek church, and under the influence of mystic monks and wonder-working charlatans, who for the sake of self-interest fan the flames of pride and self-aggrandizement in the heart of the Czar and so create a thousand barriers between him and his people. They always conjure new enemies of his throne who seek to destroy him, in order to keep him in constant fear of his life and to be able to offer him all kinds of supernatural and magic protection. The Jews are always the first ones to become the victims of the satanic spells and influences of these mystic monks and designing imposters. Many of the Czars have been induced by just such mountebanks to believe that the Jews are their worst enemies, and the Jews were made to suffer untold agonies of oppression and persecution.

Nicholas II. forms no exception to his forebears. Like his grandfather, Alexander III., he too ascended the throne leaning towards the light of liberty and raised many hopes for better days in the hearts of his people. But like Alexander, he too was soon forced by the reactionary forces of Russia to submit to the powers of darkness, to the influence of the Greek church, he too became a slave of superstition and a cruel executioner of the Jews. Not until the people break the pernicious power of the fanatical Greek church will the day of liberty break for Russia. The Czar must first be saved from himself, from his weakness and frailty, in order to be able to save his people. Then only will the Jews of Russia be in the position to rely upon the promises of the Czar to grant them their human rights, to which they are fully entitled as loyal sons of their native land.

The Voice of the Jew.

At first glance it seems quite natural that the Jews of the different countries now at war, should also raise their voices from the rostrum and in the public press in defense of the honor of their respective fatherland. The Jew being an integral part of the country where he was born and where he enjoys the full rights of citizenship, feels deeply the ignominy which the enemies of his country hurl upon his national reputation and upon the flag of his country by spreading accusations and aspersions of savagery and inhumanity. But the question is whether it is advisable for the Jew in this great crisis of animosity, in this holocaust of hate and carnage to raise his voice in attack upon other nations, even if they are the enemies of his country. He certainly must under no circumstances speak or write as a Jew, addressing his coreligionists who are fighting in the armies of their countries, or even those Jews who dwell in the neutral states. The Jew must never forget that in the eyes of the world all Jews are responsible for the words and deeds of one Jew. The war is bound to come to an end sometime, peace will surely be restored some day to the now warring nations and the fearful fights and the horrors of the battlefields will eventually be forgotten. But the words spoken or written by the Jew as a Jew will remain. There are Jews in every country and who knows whether these very words of the Jew will not bring suffering to some Jews somewhere, sometime! Nobody can blame Professor Bergman of France when he undertakes to defend the good name of his country. He speaks as a citizen of France only and as such he is fully within his rights. Nobody can take offense at the arguments made use of by Dernburg in favor of Germany. He, too, speaks solely as a German citizen, not as a Jew, and as such he is fully entitled to express his opinion. But the brilliant Zangwill made the unpardonable mistake of his life by addressing, as a Jew, an appeal to the American Jews for their sympathy with England and Russia in their war against Germany and Austria. By this rash act he overstepped the boundaries of propriety, of prudence and of justification. He had absolutely no right to take such a foolish and dangerous step and the American Jews have good reason to repudiate the uncalled-for act of an arrogant man.

ACTIVITIES OF MAIMONIDES LODGE NO. 366, of CAIRO, EGYPT.

We quote the following from the report of Maimonides Lodge, covering the period of 1913-1914:

The Lodge has established a library in its hall, which the members support by donations of money and of books.

Sometime ago twenty Jewish children who attended the Jesuit schools at Cairo were induced by the priests to give up their Jewish religion and were secretly baptized without even the knowledge of their parents. This incident created a painful impression in the Jewish community. Maimonides Lodge with the assistance of Eliahau Hannabi Lodge No. 681, of Alexandria started an agitation against this underhanded work of the teachers of these dangerous schools and inaugurated a movement for the elimination of this evil. In consequence of the work of the lodge the Jewish Consistory of Egypt has decided to establish a Jewish secondary school.

An event of great interest was the visit paid to the lodge in Cairo by Brother Henry Morgenthau, United States Ambassador to Turkey. The lodges were advised in advance of the coming of Brother Morgenthau to Egypt and they arranged a special meeting in his honor. A telegram of invitation to the meeting was sent to him on board the ship which carried him to Egypt. He accepted the invitation and invited the Presidents of the lodges to meet him at Hotel Semiramis in Cairo. The Lodge Hall was richly decorated for the occasion and 120 members assembled in evening dress to receive the honored guest. Brother Barukh read a telegram from Eliahau Hannabi Lodge, of Alexandria, welcoming his excellency to Egypt. Brother Dr. Benaroya, President of Maimonides Lodge then addressed the guest, saying among other things, the following:

"We are aware of the great interest which you take in all the Jewish institutions of the Turkish capital and we doubt not that the activities of the Jews of Cairo will also receive your kind attention. The Jews of Egypt are today divided into various camps and have fallen into a deplorable lethargy. They take little interest in Jewish affairs. For this reason Cairo unfortunately has no Jewish institution that deserves the name; it has no Jewish hospital, no orphanage, no home for the aged nor elementary school. However, there exists here a Polyclinic which was established by foreign Jews and is conducted according to European methods. It takes care of 60 to 70 patients. There are also several small benevolent societies which were likewise founded by foreign Jews. For these reasons the B'nai B'rith lodges are needed in Egypt. They have contributed much to the moral and intellectual elevation of the Jews of Cairo and they bear the torch which brings light to the new generation. During the twenty-seven years of its existence, Maimonides Lodge has not ceased to respond to all deserving demands. Today it supports 140 children in Jewish schools, it provides them with clothing and furnishes them the necessary books. It is always our highest aim to work for the interest of humanity and to elevate the moral and intellectual standing of Judaism."

Brother Morgenthau responded to the President's address in hearty words of encouragement for the Jews of Cairo and promised to do his share in the work of the movement which has been so well started by the B'nai B'rith in Cairo for the elevation of the standard of Judaism. With their own energy and the good will of the local Jews, he said, they can gain the appreciation and the love of the entire population, just as their co-religionists in America have succeeded in doing. Egypt is just as liberal as America, it makes no distinction between races and religions. He mentioned the fact that for half a century the Jews of the United States have been in a very modest situation, but by force of energy, honesty and patriotism they are now respected by all Americans, who always admire, without racial or religious distinction, those who honestly and perseveringly seek to better their conditions and to elevate their moral and intellectual standing.

The words of Brother Morgenthau raised in the hearts of the brethren a ray of consolation and hope for the coming of better days for our people who have given to humanity the frame-work of its civilization.

The Jewish community of Cairo consists of Ashkenasim and Sephardim. The Sephardim wish to absorb the Ashkenasim without guaranteeing them equitable treatment. The Ashkenasim, who are mostly Europeans, are unwilling to amalgamate without such a guarantee, but we are working hard for a union of the two elements, to bring about that understanding and that solidarity which are necessary for the local Jews to enable them to guard their secular force. and we are confident of success. The question of the religious proselytism by the Christian schools of Cairo has closed the ranks of our coreligionists. forgetting their disagreements for the time being they are all engaged in the fight against the work of conversion by the priests. Inspired by the lofty principles of the Order, Maimonides Lodge is not influenced by this division in the community; it makes no distinction between Ashkenasim and Sephardim Within our lodge we have a number of both factions.

The idea of establishing a lodge at Tantah is a very good one. The existence of a B'nai B'rith lodge in such a great Jewish center will be of great benefit to Judaism and the Order.

It has been already mentioned in this report that our lodge supports 140 pupils. We will only add here that among them are boys and girls, some of whom are at the communal school and some at the school of the Alliance Israelite Universelle. The annual expense of the support of these pupils is considerable. But as the communal school is a free school and as the Jewish community of Cairo intends to add more schools, certain of our brethren suggest that the lodge take up some other Jewish work which is of greater need in Cairo, such as the founding of a hospital, a kindergarten or the installation of a Volkskueche, which would prove of great benefit to the Jews of Cairo. As the lodge is unable to undertake all these things at one time, it has appointed a committee to study the three subjects and to find out which one is of the greatest necessity and should be attended to first. The lodge is waiting for the report of the committee and which ever institution the lodge decides to establish will perpetuate the name of Maimonides Lodge and of the Order of B'nai B'rith.

Our finances are in excellent condition. We were able to contribute to many charitable societies and the lodge is in a position to take the initiative in the movement for the creation of a new institution which is most needed, in Cairo. The capital of the lodge amounts to 116,454 Egyptian pounds.

MEETING OF GENERAL COMMITTEE OF DISTRICT NO. 6.

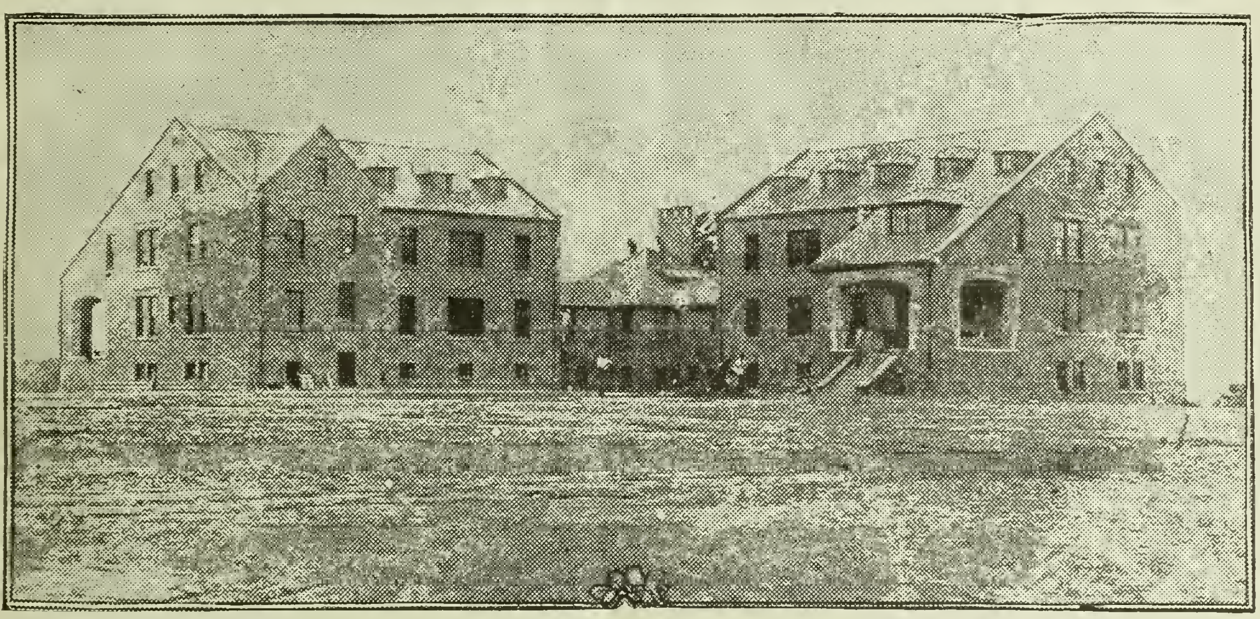
On Sept. 27, 1914, the General Committee of District Grand Lodge No. 6 met at the Hotel La Salle and its sessions lasted the entire day. All the officers of the Grand Lodge, together with the chairmen of various standing committees and a large number of Past Presidents of the Grand Lodge were in attendance. After the conclusion of the routine work the status of the lodges in the District was discussed and steps were decided upon to increase the usefulness of all the lodges throughout the District.

The special committee on Social Service Work submitted a preliminary report, which received much attention at the hands of the Committee, and it was resolved that the committee on Social Service Work bend its energies to secure a full survey of the subject matter for submission to the General Committee at its next meeting.

The question of gathering statistics pertaining to Jews and Jewish matters was brought up, and after a full discussion of the subject matter a committee was appointed to look into the advisability and practicability of embarking on this new endeavor on the part of the District.

The question of coming to the rescue and relief of the stricken members of the Order in Europe received the attention of the General Committee and plans were arranged whereby funds will be raised by the lodges from their members for the benefit and relief of the members of the Order suffering as a result of the war.

THE B'NAI B'RITH ORPHANAGE AND HOME FOR FRIENDLESS CHILDREN AT ERIE, PA.



B'nai B'rith's New Home for Orphans at Erie, Pennsylvania.

The Erie Daily Times published the following detailed description of the buildings and grounds of the new orphanage that was dedicated last month:

With the aid of his wonderful lamp and his equally wonderful ring Aladdin built in a single night his beautiful castle filled with jewels and precious stones. With the aid of modern machinery and brains the B'nai B'rith society has built in a comparatively short time three handsome buildings, the beginning of a small city that will eventually contain more than a score of buildings, sixteen of which will be cottages. And the precious jewels that will adorn these buildings will be little children, cast out by fate to make their way in this world as best they could — four hundred and eighty Jewish orphans will be taken care of at this orphanage when all the buildings are completed.

When the word "cottages" is used in reference to these homes the impression is most misleading for no buildings could be farther removed from the general idea of "cottages" than are these. The brick and tile buildings with their inside finishings of hardwood and marble and their capacities for thirty children each are equalled by few buildings in Erie.

With all of the buildings near the southern boundary of the ninety-five acre farm just west of Fairview the Orphanage, when the general scheme is completed will be a city complete in itself, with its own water supply, powerhouse for electric lights, sewerage system and sewerage disposal plant — in fact everything needed by a large city will be found here and the thousand and one undesirable features of every other city will be eliminated.

The three buildings completed now are two cottages and one kitchen, which make three-fifths of one group. Each group will contain four cottages and one kitchen and there will be eventually four groups. The plan of building the groups is a most unique one and always proves of exceptional interest to the visitor. In each of the cottages there is a pantry leading to a central kitchen and the four cottages form a square. The fact that they are connected, or rather separated by the pantries, however, leaves plenty of space for light and air for each one and it is as though each was standing alone.

Besides the twenty buildings that will be found in the four completed groups there will be an administration building, school building, power plant building, laundry building and hospital building. This modern city of brick, tile, cement, electricity and slate is being erected on an Erie county farm and already the work is well started.

The one difficulty that confronts all cities—a water supply—has already been overcome at this model city and before the home is opened in October the pumps will be forcing thousands of gallons of pure spring water through the mains each day. Just at the entrance of the orchard, only a couple hundred of yards from the buildings, where six or eight springs gush out of the ground, a huge reservoir is being built to contain 30,000 gallons

Beneath the one kitchen now completed another reservoir with a capacity of 11,000 gallons has been placed down under the ground. From here compressed air will force it to the fixtures in the different buildings. The engine that compresses the air above this water is so arranged that when the pressure decreases it is started automatically, so that there will always be a good force behind this water.

A dynamo is to be installed soon and the entire building has been wired for electricity. The sewerage system is of the most modern design as is also the sewage disposal plant. Cement walks around the beautiful plaza will connect the various buildings when the plan is completed.

To describe the cottage is to describe every one of the sixteen that will eventually be found on the grounds. Each is 39x55 feet and three stories high. The space on the floors is utilized as follows:

Basement—Playroom, shoe room, storage room, lavatory.

First floor—Large porch, reception hall, teachers' room, large dining room and living room.

Second floor — Two large dormitories, matron's room with bath, linen closets, large lavatory with showers, etc., finished in tile and marble.

Third floor—Two teachers' rooms with baths. The balance of the space on this floor is taken up by the dormitories on the second floor which extend up through to the roof for ventilating purposes.

The four kitchens placed in the centers of the four groups of cottages will also be alike. Beneath each kitchen is a large laundry with toilets, boiler room, large coal bins, water supply rooms. Each of the four pantries joining each kitchen with the four cottages is the same. One of the unique features about the pantries is that in each there are two sinks, one for washing meat dishes and the other for washing milk dishes. This is in accordance with the Kosher law and as probably 90 per cent of the children who come to the orphanage will come from orthodox homes this law will, of course, be observed.

The beautiful English style of architecture is used throughout the buildings, which are constructed of brick and tile, faced with tapestry brick. Each has a slate roof and all sheet metal work is copper. The buildings are all fireproof.

The ventilation of the dormitories has been scientifically planned and there is the proper number of cubic inches of air for each of the fifteen children, passing through the room at all times. As the dormitories extend through the third floor with dormer windows on the roof, the ventilation is perfect.

Of the two cottages now finished one will be used for boys and one for girls. In each group two cottages will be used for boys and an equal number for girls.

The inside finish is hardwood, except in the bath rooms and lavatories which are finished in white enamel, marble and tile floors. All of the plumbing is of the very best and hot and cold water will be at hand at all times. Gas and electric lights and steam heat will be used.

The cost of the orphanage will be enormous. The three buildings erected to date cost $45,000 and the finished plan will cost $600,000 in buildings alone. Added to this will be the cost of the numerous improvements about the farm, which will probably make the entire outlay of cash reach close to a million dollars.

The one impression gained by the visitor is the permanence of the entire structure and its completeness in every way. The greatest pains have been taken to make every part, no matter how small or unimportant, exactly perfect. There is not a portion of any of the buildings that will not stand the closest inspection, in fact, the closer the inspection is the better is the impression gained.

The plans for the building were drawn by Harry Allan Jacobs of New York City and Joseph Frank and Son, of Erie. The construction work has been done by the Liebel-Binney Construction company. Frank Butler had the contract for the plumbing and steam heating and Star Electric company did the electric wiring. Gust Krack and son were the sheet metal contractors and Lyman Felheim furnished the lumber and interior trim.

With such companies as the above, in charge of the work it is little wonder that it is all that could be desired. But the perfect work has also required much more money than that of an inferior quality would have taken and the Jewish people are to be congratulated on their wisdom in getting the best work obtainable regardless of cost.

The furniture throughout the two buildings is of quartered oak and makes a most beautiful appearance. All of it is made to suit the sizes of those who will use it, and the small chairs and tables look almost like toys. The fifteen white enameled beds are placed in two rows along the dormitories and beside each are two stools, one small enough to slide under the other in the day time. One of these is to sit on and the other to lay clothes on.

The furniture for one of the buildings was given by the Braddock lodge, of Braddock, Pa., and for the other by the McKeesport lodge, of McKeesport, Pa.

THE B'NAI B'RITH ORPHANAGE.

The formal dedication of the Orphanage founded and conducted by District Grand Lodge, No. 3, I. O. B. B., brings to a successful consummation a project that has long claimed the attention of the active spirits of the order in this district. The location of the home at Erie, in the northwestern part of Pennsylvania was received with some misgiving at the beginning of the enterprise, but in the light of experience we believe that the Order has acted wisely in making its choice. The concentration of institutions in the great cities has led to the concentration of responsibility. The location at Erie will impress lodges in the cities and towns throughout the district with the fact that the Orphanage is an institution in which all of them have an interest and for which all of them are in duty bound to assume a full measure of responsibility. The location of the new Home is a healthful and wholesome one, and there is every assurance that its affairs will be administered in accordance with the best traditions of Jewish charity and in consonance with the benevolent principles on which the B'nai B'rith Order has been founded and maintained.—Jewish Exponent.

THE ORPHANAGE AT ERIE, PA.

Last Sunday, District No. 3, of the Independent Order, B'nai B'rith ably assisted by Erie Lodge, formally dedicated an institution worthy of the District and the Order at large. The B'nai B'rith Orphanage and Home for Friendless Children is one of the mo important of positive achievements by the B'nai B'rith in this district since it was first called into existence. For many, many years the District supported a lame duck in Philadelphia that went under the name of the Manual Training School, but which did not carry an universal appeal.

But in the establishment of an orphanage, the Order has finally accomplished something worth while, and to the handful of men under the direction of such leaders as Isadore Sobel, A. J. Sunstein and others, who devoted their time unceasingly to the successful establishment of the institution, too much credit cannot be given.

Everyone who was present at the dedication spoke in the highest terms of the character of the buildings that have been erected. Every effort has been make to look after the wants of the children comfortably. Already there are 22 children living in the Home and in a short time it is expected that over 60 will be residing there.

The dedicatory exercises were conducted before large audiences comprising members of the Order from every part of the district. A special train was run from this city and over two hundred members of the local lodge availe themselves of the opportunity to b present and lend their encouragement to this most excellent undertaking.

We wish the Orphanage well and w bespeak for it the generous support of the members of the Order in this District.

It would be unfair to Erie to period this comment before expressing the general opinion of the entire district as to the energetic and efficient campaign that was conducted by the Erie leaders to make the Orphanage a reality. And it would take an abler pen than ours to adequately voice the genuine appreciation of the splendid hospitality accorded the hundreds of visitors at the dedication, by the Erie Jewish community. Not within recent years has a community of the size of Erie risen so adequately to the cocasion.—Jewish Criterion.

B'NAI B'RITH INSTITUTIONS.

We received an invitation to atten the dedication exercises of the fir building of the B'nai B'rith orphana and home for the friendless children o District No. 3, I. O. B. B., at Erie. Pa., which took place the end of last month. This is what the order is doing—real practical Jewish charity i every possible direction in spite of what atrabilious critics and soreheads may say to the contrary. The order needs every wholesome Jew who will put his best into it, not with the expectation o taking more back in a material way, but rather of receiving as a reward the Simcha shel mitzvah, the happiness at having performed a worthy act, the joy at seeing others thus made happy. If our Jewish men, old and young, were to regard the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith in this light, apart from insurance and monetary benefits, if they realized the Jewish good accomplished by institutions of succor to the unfortnate, not to mention the power of united Jewish efforts in attaining Jewish rights, not one Jew would remain aloof.—Montague N. A. Cohen in the Jewish Tribune.

VICTORIA, B. C.

Some months ago a B'nai B'rith lodge was instituted at Victoria, B. C., and reports indicate that the lodge is making marvelous progress for a new organization. At the meeting of the lodge held on Sept. 13, 1914, a class of new members was initiated by the degree team of the lodge, which did its work very creditably. After the work was completed and the lodge adjourned, a social evening was spent with the ladies of the members and their friends. Games, refreshments and dancing were indulged in by all, after which short talks were made by many of the brethren, among them District Deputy Brother I. Lancaster of Samuel Lodge. Vancouver, who delivered a splendid lecture upon the work of the Order, which was enthusiastically received. He also impressed the ladies present with the necessity of organizing an auxiliary to the lodge and help in the great work.

What Our Lodges Are Doing

OFFICIAL VISITS OF GRAND LODGE OFFICERS OF DISTRICT NO. 4.

On Tuesday, September 1st, Morris N. Schneider, grand president of District Grand Lodge No. 4 of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, in his official capacity visited Etham lodge of the order at Sacramento, and Hope lodge at Stockton.

Accompanying him, at his invitation, were Eliot M. Epsteen of San Francisco, chairman of the intellectual advancement committee, and the initiatory team of Oakland lodge, consisting of Sidney Kahn, Sidney Silverstein and Dr. Herbert Samuels.

At Sacramento the party was met by a committee consisting of M. Rotholz, D. Davis, L. Garfinkle, Dr. L. G. Reynolds, A. Wilson, I. Cohen, S. Stone and H. Meyer and escorted to the lodge room where a class of seventeen candidates were initiated. After the meeting a sumptuous banquet was given at the Travelers Hotel to the grand lodge officers, the degree team and visiting brethren, Etham lodge of Sacramento being the host.

Wednesday the official party left for Stockton, where they were met by a committee headed by A. J. Shragge, president of Hope lodge, and S. S. Safferhill, district deputy of Stockton. The party was escorted to the hotel and in the evening after a special dinner at the Hotel Stockton a large class of members became initiates into the order. After the meeting a banquet was given to the official party by Hope lodge, where, as in Sacramento, the grand president delivered an eloquent address upon the work of the order, and of the seven new lodges instituted since the beginning of the present term.

Elliot M. Epsteen, chairman of the intellectual advancement committee, delivered addresses at both cities, and prominent members of both lodges participated.

LOS ANGELES LODGE.

Los Angeles Lodge No. 487 of Los Angeles, Cal., appointed at the last meeting a committee of past presidents and present officers of the lodge to form a committee on ways and means to provide suitable entertainment for the delegates to the Constitution Grand Lodge convention, who will stop over for a few days at Los Angeles.

A meeting of such committee was held on Sept. 28. The committee consists of George N. Black, Julius Black, Emanuel Cohen, H. H. Frank, M. J. Finkenstein, D. A. Hamburger, M. H. Hellman, Victor Harris, Jos. L. Jonas, S. G. Levy, I. O. Levy, Sam Levy, S. G. Marshutz, I. S. Metzler, Marco Newmark, Isaac Norton, Sol Schiff, Mendel Silberberg, Maurice Salzman, besides the officers.

At a recent meeting of the lodge Judge Frank Forbes delivered an address upon the Jew, which was exceedingly instructive and gave evidence of much thought on the part of the speaker.

The lodge has also recently established a B'nai B'rith Bulletin, which is published under its auspices with Brother Maurice Salzman as editor, for the purpose of arousing the active interest and co-operation of the members of the lodge in the work of the Order.

SERVICES AT STATE PRISONS.

For the first time in the history of Missouri, religious services for Jewish prisoners were conducted Rosh ha-Shana, and Yom Kippur at the penitentiary in Jefferson City. Arrangements for these services were made by Mr. Oscar Leonard, superintendent of the Jewish Charities of St. Louis. Mr. Abraham Levy conducted the services. The prison authorities showed him every possible courtesy, and the prisoners were eager to attend and take part. In arranging the services, Mr. Leonard had the co-operation of Rabbi Samuel Sale, who is head of the Missouri Division of the Synagogue Extension of the Union of Hebrew Congregations; Rabbi George Zepin, head of the department, furnished the prayer books. These books will now be kept permanently in the prison library for use by Jewish prisoners. The Social Service Committee of District No. 2, I. O. B. B. and the Social Service Committee of Missouri Lodge co-operated. Mr. Jo[illegible] of Jefferson City was also [illegible]

ANNUAL DINNER OF HOREB LODGE.

A large number of the members of Horeb Lodge No. 25 of New Haven, Conn., met at a dinner that was held on the evening of Sept. 9th at the Hotel Shoreham, New Haven, Conn. Addresses were delivered by the officers of the lodge and by the visiting Grand Lodge officers, among them State Deputy Chas. Shapiro of Bridgeport and State Deputy Kronholtz of Stamford.

Mr. Jos. H. Ullman, Past President of the District, reviewed the work of the present administration of the lodge, complimenting the same upon its harmonious and energetic efforts to promote the best interests of the lodge. He also called attention to the prompt action on the part of the Order through its president, Mr. Adolf Kraus, in aiding those Jewish people who are now suffering from the ravages of the war in Europe.

President Samuel J. Witz, in his address, dwelt upon the part that the Jews are taking in the military operations in the present war and called attention to the position of the Jews, which is particularly deplorable as a result of a large number having been recruited from all walks of life and representing almost every Jewish household in the present war. He made a splendid appeal for sympathy and aid for the thousands of widows and orphans which are and will be left destitute and who will depend in a great measure upon the Jews of this country to afford them some relief.

HOPE LODGE, STOCKTON, CAL.

On Sept. 2, 1914, Hope Lodge No. 126 was honored by a visit from the President of District Grand Lodge No. 4, Mr. Morris N. Schneider of Oakland, accompanied by the degree team of his lodge. A class of new candidates was initiated. President Schneider addressed the lodge and was followed by Brother Epstein, chairman of the Intellectual Advancement Committee. Visiting brethren and officers of Etham Lodge of Sacramento also addressed the lodge. At the conclusion of the meeting all present were entertained with a splendid spread. Interesting talks were given, one in particular by the newly elected rabbi of the congregation, Mr. Edgar F. Magnin. Altogether the occasion was enjoyable and inspiring and its influence will be felt for a long while.

RESOLUTIONS.

On Aug. 28, 1914, Moise Hirsch, one of our pioneer workers, a leader, a foremost citizen, a great Jew, and a noble man, was kissed by the angel of death into the realms of eternal sleep. A golden link in our fraternal chain was broken when our brother answered the roll call of eternity. Nothing that we can say, nothing that we can do, will add to his glory or his worth. The influence of a noble man lives after him, and his death teaches sublime truth to those that survive him.

At the close of a career crowned with honorable achievements, it is fitting that we preserve those traits of character and splendid manhood which made this man worthy of immortal memory. Our feeling of irreparable loss in the death of this true and good man cannot be fittingly expressed by human speech. He was our brother and our leader, and we cherish his memory as one of the most sacred treasures which the heart can enshrine or memory embalm.

Be It Resolved by Corsicana Lodge No. 275, of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, in its regular meeting, that by the demise of the Past President of the Lodge, Moise Hirsch, we have suffered irreparable loss, that the prayers of this lodge are raised to Heaven invoking God's blessing and protection for the family left to mourn for their dear one who was taken from their side to that Home Eternal in Heaven. Be it Further Resolved

That this report embodying this resolution be spread upon a special page of the minutes of this Lodge and a copy thereof be transmitted by an appointed committee to the family of our late brother as a testimonial of our high esteem.

RABBI DAVID GOLDBERG,
M. LEHMAN,

ANNIVERSARY OF BRADDOCK LODGE.

Braddock Lodge, No. 516, I. O. B. B., Braddock, Pa., celebrated, on Sunday evening, September 13th, 1914, the thirteenth anniversary of its institution.

The program was mostly of a musical nature; the addresses were made by Richard S. Rauh, Esq., who spoke on the subject "Gods and Dogs," or how a Jew is being worshipped as a God and how at the same time Jews are being treated as dogs. The Hon. A. C. Stein spoke on "I. O. B. B." and how the order united Jews of all classes and of all nationalities.

Brother Louis Sulzbacher, secretary of District Grand Lodge No. 3 and secretary of Braddock Lodge, told of the lodge's activities during the past year, most improtant of which was the furnishing of one of the cottages of the B'nai B'rith Orphanage and Home for Friendless Children, at Erie, Pa., which was dedicated on August 30th. Brother Sulzbacher is the father of Braddock Lodge, and during his remarks he was interrupted and presented with a silver loving cup as an expression of the esteem in which he is held by the members of Braddock Lodge.

The entire program was thoroughly enjoyed by the 250 people present.

HAR SINAI LODGE, PHILADELPHIA.

A well attended quarterly meeting of Har Sinai Lodge No. 8 of Philadelphia was held on Sept. 10, 1914. Mr. Harry Platowsky, member of the general committee of the District Grand Lodge, delivered an eloquent and interesting address reciting at length the proceedings of the dedication of the beautiful B'nai B'rith Orphanage, which took place at Erie, Pa. He also reported the proceedings of the meeting of the general committee of the District Grand Lodge, and the renewed interest of the B'nai B'rith was prevalent everywhere.

Arrangements are being made for a benefit, to provide funds as a further contribution to the Orphanage.

A number of propositions for membership were received, and a luncheon was served at the close of the meeting.

SPRINGFIELD LODGE, SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

What was undoubtedly the most enjoyable outing ever held by the Jews of Springfield and vicinity took place this summer when the B'nai B'rith lodges of Springfield, Holyoke, Pittsfield and Worcester combined to hold a field day at Westfield. There were more than 1,200 people present and a most enjoyable day was spent by all. There were representatives present from Hartford, New Britain and Boston. The Worcester delegation came in a long string of automobiles, while Pittsfield came down in two big auto trucks.

Field sports composed a large part of the program and prizes were distributed to the winners in the different events.

The tug of war was won by Worcester with a team of giants.

There were three baseball games, the first being between two leading Jewish baseball teams of this section, the Keystones and Sapiens of Springfield, the Keystones finally carrving off the silver cup offered by District Deputy Lasker. The second was between Springfield and Holyoke Lodges which was won by Holyoke and in the play-off between Holyoke and Pittsfield. Holyoke won the silver cup offered by President Hirsch of Holyoke.

In the track events in which there was intense interest and a large field of contestants, 14 men being entered in the 100-yard dash alone, Springfield carried off the honors.

Among the other affairs of the summer was the Aerial Moonlight dance, a novelty that was put on by the Degree Club of Springfield Lodge with good success, a large number of dance novelties and entertainment booths being provided for the large number of guests who were present from the surrounding towns.

A number of Springfield members and their friends attended the second moonlight dance of Holyoke Lodge, held at the Ingleside Boat House in the latter part of August and an enjoyable time was passed.

A number of the members journeyed down to New Haven for the field day of the lodge of that city.

DINNER BY ORIENTAL-HILLEL LODGE.

On Sept. 24, 1914, Oriental-Hillel Lodge No. 72 of Chicago gave an informal dinner in honor of the President of the District, Brother Chas. L. Aarons of Milwaukee, at the Hotel La Salle. Brother Adolf Kraus, President of the Order, acted as chairman of the evening.

On this occasion a class of 25 candidates was initiated by the degree team of the Central B'nai B'rith Council consisting of Brothers Wm. Wilhartz, A. D. Weiner, A. F. Mecklenberger, and A. B. Seelenfreund.

Under the good and welfare of the lodge the guest of honor, Brother Aarons, addressed the meeting on "Practical Idealism as Exemplified by the Order." Hon. Samuel Alschuler also addressed the meeting on the subject: "The Duty Which We Owe to Our Co-religionists in the Crisis Caused by the War."

After the close of the meeting many of the members spent a social hour with the visiting brethren.

MEETING OF GENERAL COMMITTEE OF DISTRICT NO. 3.

The General Committee of District Grand Lodge No. 3 held its quarterly meeting in the new buildings of the B'nai B'rith Orphanage and Home for Friendless Children at Erie, Pa., on Aug 30, 1914, on the day when the buildings were dedicated. Brother Abe Weil, the President of the District, submitted a synopsis of occurrences since the convention of the District held last January. After routine matters were disposed of, the following special actions are mentioned:

An appropriation of $100.00 was made for the Educational Board of Allegheny County.

It was resolved to request the lodges to hold services on the holy days at all penal institutions within the District.

The General Committee also resolved to create an Educational Board for the District.

The last Sunday in May was designated as Memorial Day for the lodges in the District.

The last Sunday in August was set apart as Orphanage Day throughout the lodges.

The last Sunday in November will be known as B'nai B'rith Day and will be duly celebrated by the lodges.

In the afternoon, after the meeting adjourned, dedication of the finished part of the new home was held. Addresses were delivered by all the visiting Grand Lodge officers.

B'NAI B'RITH MEETINGS IN GERMAN AND AUSTRIAN SUMMER RESORTS.

For a number of years B'nai B'rith meetings have been held during the summer season in many of the summer resorts of Germany and Austria. These meetings are arranged by the different lodges for intellectual and social purposes for the benefit of members of the Order and their families who come to these resorts to spend the summer vacation. This year very successful meetings were held in Teplitz, Bohemia, Zoppot, Freudenstadt and other places. They were well attended and accomplished a great deal of good.

THE UNION OF THE LADIES' AUXILIARIES OF THE B'NAI B'RITH LODGES IN GERMANY.

The Union of the Ladies' Auxiliaries consists of twenty lodges. Fourteen auxiliaries have as yet not joined the Union. The Union will hold its first general convention in the coming month of October, when auxiliaries will render a full account of their activities since the day of their organization. As all the auxiliaries work for the same end, which is to bring the womanly and motherly influence into the lodge work, it is to be hoped that the fourteen non-affiliated auxiliaries will join the Union before the general convention takes place.

HOLYOKE, MASS.

Mr. J. G. Shapiro of Shelton, Conn., addressed a meeting of Holyoke Lodge No. 728 of Holyoke, Mass., on Sept. 15, 1914. Mr. Shapiro urged on all the necessity of increasing the membership of the lodge, as thereby the usefulness of the lodge and the Order will be strengthened and thus be better prepared to come to the aid of the members of the Order who are suffering on account of the war.

President Morris Hirsch of the local lodge, reviewed the work that has been accomplished the past year, and also gave an outline of the work that is to be accomplished during the coming months.

Henry Lasker of Springfield delivered a message from the grand lodge to the local lodge. Refreshments were served and an entertainment followed.

CLARKSDALE LODGE, CLARKSDALE, MISS.

At the beginning of the year Clarksdale Lodge, which was formerly known as Max Kaufman Lodge, was re-organized and assumed its new name of Clarksdale Lodge. The lodge has progressed very much and at the present time its membership consists of 57. Initiations have been held at almost every meeting. The attendance at the meetings is good, ranging from 30 to 40 at each meeting, out of a membership of less than 60. This large attendance is remarkable in view of the fact that more than half of the membership of the lodge lives in surrounding small communities.

District No. 2.

Cleveland Lodge No. 16, of Cleveland, Ohio, held its first meeting of the fall term on the evening of Sept. 27, 1914. At this meeting installation of officers was held and an entertainment was provided.

Under the auspices of the Social Service Committee of District Grand Lodge No. 2, I. O. B. B., its local representative, Mr. J. Myers, arranged for the observance of the Jewish holidays at the Ohio penitentiary located at Columbus. The services were conducted by Mr. I. Jashnowsky, who officiated as chaplain. The services were held in the forenoon and at the conclusion a special holiday dinner was served by the Jewish ladies of Columbus.

Yom Kippur was observed with two special services, one in the forenoon and the other in the afternoon.

Mr. Jacob Billikopf of Kansas City, Mo., accompanied by Mr. Oscar Leonard of St. Louis, visited the military prison at Leavenworth, having obtained special permission from the authorities at Washington. They went as members of the B'nai B'rith Social Service Committee of District Grand Lodge No. 2 and interviewed and addressed about 20 Jewish young men who are undergoing sentence for various offenses.

District No. 3.

Under the auspices of Fairmont Lodge No. 726 of Fairmont, W. Va., divine services were held during the holy days.

On Aug. 29, 1914, Erie Lodge No. 620 of Erie, Pa., held a special meeting in honor of the visit of the officers of the District, which was attended by more than 100 members, and at which a class of candidates was initiated by the degree team of Jericho Lodge of Pittsburg. The meeting was a pronounced success.

Fairmont Lodge No. 726 of Fairmont, W. Va., organized a Ladies' Auxiliary on June 3, 1914.

Braddock Lodge No. 516 of Braddock, Pa., presented a beautiful Menorah to the Orphanage and Home for Friendless Children at Erie, Pa.

Sharon Lodge No. 622 of Sharon, Pa., which was suspended on Dec. 31, 1913, through the neglect of its secretary, was reinstated on Aug. 2, 1914.

Arrangements are being made by the general committee of the District to organize a B'nai B'rith lodge at Elizabeth, N. J.

The entertainment given on Sept. 23, 1914, by Abraham Lippman Lodge No. 672 was a pronounced success. The attendance was unusually large, more than 300 members and friends of the lodge being present, including delegates from the lodges at McKeesport and Braddock. The affair was the first of a series of social events which the lodge intends to hold during the coming fall and winter.

District No. 4.

The degree team of Oakland Lodge No. 252 of Oakland, Cal., paid an official visit to the lodges at Sacramento and Stockton, Cal., on Aug. 31, 1914, and initiated a class of candidates in both cities. Those who assisted in the work from Oakland Lodge were Brothers Sidney Kahn, Phil Ringolsky, Sidney Silverstine, Dr. Herbert Samuels, Judge George Samuels and Grand President Morris Schneider.

Victoria Lodge No. 758 of Victoria, B. C.. held a well attended meeting on Aug. 25, 1914, on which occasion the members enjoyed and appreciated the instructive addresses delivered by Brother Isidor Lancaster, past president of Vancouver Lodge.

Tacoma Lodge No. 741, of Tacoma, Wash., held a meeting on Sept. 3, 1914, the event of which was an address by Brother Louis Levine of San Francisco, who spoke on the B'nai B'rith and its work in this and other countries. The B'nai B'rith picnic given under the auspices of the lodge at American Lake was a great success and was largely attended. Visitors were present from Seattle, Everett, Bellingham, Spokane and Portland.

Oakland Lodge No. 252 of Oakland, Cal., will occupy four rooms besides a billiard room and will hold its regular monthly meetings and social gatherings in the new temple of the First Hebrew Congregation, which was dedicated on Sept. 13, 1914.

Grand President Mr. Morris N. Schneider, of District No. 4, has published his first semi-annual message in After the meeting the members inspected the building. which he refers to the healthy condition of the lodges within his jurisdiction.

Everett Lodge No. 761 of Everett, Wash., was instituted on Sunday, Sept. 13, 1914.

Theo. Herzl Lodge No. 314, of Portland, Ore., held its regular meeting on Sept. 22, 1914, in the new B'nai B'rith building, which is almost completed.

A public rally was held in the main auditorium of the new B'nai B'rith building at Portland, Ore., on the afternoon of Sept. 27th, for the purpose of discussing plans for the future of the building as a communal center.

A regular meeting of Abraham Geiger Lodge No. 423 of Spokane, Wash., was held jointly with its ladies' auxiliary on the evening of Sept. 17, 1914, and was well attended. After the meeting cards and dancing were indulged in, after which refreshments were served by the ladies.

Tacoma Lodge No. 741 of Tacoma, Wash., has embarked on a new method of propaganda. In order to create more than a passing interest a novel campaign has been started. For each new member secured before Thanksgiving the proposer is to receive a prize. Just at present it is reported that the secretary of the lodge is running pretty short of application blanks.

District No. 6.

A meeting of Lake Cities Lodge No. 696 of Ft. William, Ont., was held on Sept. 6, 1914, and was the first gathering after the summer holidays. Quite a large number of members was present and a very successful meeting ended the afternoon's assembly.

The Central B'nai B'rith Council of Chicago representing the local lodges has arranged for a dinner at the Hotel La Salle on the evening of Oct. 14th. Mrs. Henry Solomon of Chicago and Rabbi Morris M. Feuerlicht of Indianapolis have been specially invited to address the gathering on "Social Service Work." The address will be followed by general discussion.

Winnipeg Lodge No. 650, of Winnipeg, Canada, held a well attended meeting on Sept. 17th, on which occasion a class of ten candidates was initiated by the degree team of the lodge.

Mr. Max Morris, for nearly half a century, a member of Nebraska Lodge No. 354, of Omaha, Neb., was presented with a beautiful token by the lodge in honor of his golden wedding anniversary.

The first meeting of the season of Ramah Lodge No. 33, of Chicago, was held on Sept. 10, 1914. For the purpose of installing the officers it was a joint meeting with Oriental-Hillel Lodge No. 72 of the same city. The attendance was unusually large in spite of the inclement weather that prevailed. A large number of new applications for membership were presented and several candidates were initiated at the meeting by the degree team of the lodge.

The special order of business was action upon the proposition to consolidate with Northwestern Lodge and the subject matter received the unanimous approval of the lodge.

Under the head of good and welfare remarks by many of the visiting brethren and officers of the lodge were made.

Isaac Lodge No. 87 of Milwaukee, Wis., will hold an important meeting on the evening of Oct. 8th, on which occasion a class of 30 candidates is expected to be initiated by the degree team of the lodge.

District No. 8.

Fraternitas Lodge, No. 356, of Dresden, has decided to place its Vacation Home at Oberrochwitz, at the disposal of the war ministry, and to donate 1,000 marks each to the Red Cross Society and to the city administration for the aid of the families of the inhabitants of the city, whose breadwinners are serving in the army.

Zion Lodge, No. 360, of Hannover, has turned over its Children's Recreation Home, at Norderney, with about 100 beds, to the government to be used for convalescent and lightly wounded soldiers.

Duesseldorf Lodge, No. 510, of Duesseldorf, recently opened a people's kitchen in its lodge hall, which is under the management of the wives and daughters of the members of the Lodge.

The Berlin B'nai B'rith Lodges have organized extensive relief work for the benefit of the sufferers in consequence of the war. They foster and support all relief undertakings in the fatherland; they sent thirty nurses, who were trained at the expense of the Grand Lodge, to the army on the battlefields; they fitted out the Lodge hall as a hospital and are feeding needy men, women and children in the educational institute of the Toynbee hall. The Lodges have donated 100,000 marks for the relief of Lodge members and their families who were placed by the war in a distressed condition.

WINNIPEG LODGE.

After a long spell of inactivity during vacation, the Lodge has resumed its business in all earnestness. The meeting held on Sept. 17th was a particularly successful one, both as to the number of members present, and as to the amount and nature of the business transacted. One innovation introduced by the President, Brother M. J. Finkelstein, was largely responsible for the attendance, and that was this: The President announced that the roll of all the members of the standing committees would be called at each meeting, and absences dealt with in the same manner as absences of officers.

Amongst other discussions that were brought up was that of the stand that the Jewish community in the city should take with reference to the present war. The discussion arose out of the fact that the mayor of the city called a meeting of naturalized citizens to express their sentiments with reference to the war. The question was, whether it was advisable for the Jews to single themselves out and ask or consent to be represented as a body at that meeting. From the lengthy debate that ensued, the view prevailed that, since the Jews do not possess a geographical territory, they are not as a body involved in the contest, and cannot consistently be called upon to express their sentiment. Therefore, there is no necessity for the Jews to be represented at the said meeting no more than there is for the Canadian citizen generally, with whom the naturalized Jews consider themselves completely merged.

Following this debate, a committee of four was appointed by the chairman, whose duty it was to bring the views of the lodge before the proper authority handling this meeting, which was subsequently done, and the chairman of the committee organizing that meeting, agreed to our views, and promised he would see that if Jews would speak at that meeting, they would do so in the name of the country of their origin.

JEWISH SOCIAL SERVICE.

The presence in Portland of leading officers of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith is a reminder that the Jews are in the front rank in the United States in social and philanthropic work, taking particular pains and pardonable pride in caring for their own people. They usually find a happy medium between mere system and sentimentality.

How to help the poor immigrant in his early struggles without making a pauper of him is the main problem of the Jewish social worker. For this purpose special loan organizations and self respect funds are operated in connection with social work.

Another important problem is to keep boys and girls from losing the ideals which have made the Jewish people what they are today. It is sought to Americanize them without, what may be termed dejudaizing them.

The Jewish social worker seeks to implant in the young generation, either native born or immigrant, a mixture of American and Jewish ideals, which will make for better manhood and better womanhood.—The Oregon Journal.

JEWISH CRIMINAL LAW.

crime and the criminal, and we cannot fail to discern everywhere in theory and in practice the existence of safeguards and securities in favor of the accused.

For conviction upon a charge involving the death penalty, the testimony of two eye-witnesses to the effect that they had seen the crime committed, was invariably necessary. Nor was there left any possibility of conviction where there was ground for doubt as to the validity of their testimony. Before the examination of each witness his conscience was roused by an address made to him, beaing the warning that circumstantial or hearsay evidence was inadmissible and that his own character would be investigated and his reputation for integrity probed. There was further impressed upon the witness the serious import of a "judgment for souls" and he was admonished that should his testimony help to convict an innocent person, the blood of the executed defendant would be upon him, Genesis iv: 10, "the voice of thy brother's blood crieth," being quoted to this effect. Where the testimony of the two witnesses was contradictory with respect to a material point, it was necessary that an acquittal should follow. This element is strikingly illustrated in the trial of Sussanah, where an acquittal is secured by Daniel through proof of a material contradiction in the testimony of the two alleged eye-witnesses.

Following the taking of testimony and the exhaustive cross-examination of the witnesses, the judges entered into a deliberation, clearly analogous to the jury-deliberation of contemporary jurisprudence with the distinction that it argued points of law as well as of fact. If it was apparent that the Sanhedrin was unanimously for acquittal, the defendant was forthwith released. If a division was obvious, final judgment was postponed until the following day the judges making certain changes in their diet and discussing the case throughout the night. On the following day the Sanhedrin assembled at the judgment place where the judges were polled. A majority of one in favor of acquittal was sufficient to clear the defendant, but conviction required a majority of two and where this was not secured the jury was increased by the addition of disciples, two at a time up to the full number. If it appeared that only a bare majority were for conviction, the Mishnah states that "they disputed with each other until one of the condemning party acknowledged the statement of the clearing party." Every precaution thus being taken to preclude the possibility of the execution of an innocent man, the death penalty followed only after absolute proof of the commission of the offense and where guilt was shown in the fullest sense, "beyond any reasonable doubt."

No lengthy delay intervened between the conviction and the execution, such as exists as a characteristic of our penology. At the appointed time the condemned was led forth to the place of execution. Preceding him were heralds announcing his name and parentage and the offense for which he had been condemned and summoning anyone who possessed information which would serve to acquit, to present himself immediately. Where any such person appeared, or where the defendant himself stated to the satisfaction of certain designated and trustworthy persons that he possessed information to clear himself, the whole party turned back to the judgment hall where the new evidence was taken, a deliberation held and a re-vote taken to determine the defendant's guilt or innocence. The history of Sussanah is again of interest in illustrating this procedure, which constitutes in reality, the appeal in capital offenses. Sussanah, condemned to death, is saved at almost the last moment by Daniel, who represents himself as possessing information sufficient for clearance, halts the execution of judgment and makes possible the clearance of the defendant by proof of a material inconsistency in the evidence. Where no person appeared for clearance the party proceeded to the place of execution where the defendant was stupified by a potion of wine and olibanum which rendered him, as far as possible, insensible to pain.

The actual execution speedily followed, the defendant being put to death by one of four methods, depending upon the nature of his offense. The methods employed were specificially, stoning, burning, beheading, and strangulation, the Rabbis considering stoning the severest and strangulation the mildest. These methods seem to me to be self-explanatory with the possible exception of the execution by burning. It is not to be supposed that the means pursued was the ordinary burning at the stake, such as we find in the burning of witches in Colonial New England. The condemned, in Jewish law, was strangled with towels pulled in opposite directions until naught but the last spark of life remained, at which moment a lighted wick was cast into the mouth of the dying man. But it is not fitting, nor do I deem it necessary to describe in its fullest detail the infliction of the death penalty. But this point I do desire to lay particular stress upon, namely, that a consideration for the defendant was shown even after conviction, even after execution. Although hanging was sometimes added after death, provided the condemned was not a woman, the hanging was in the fullest sense only momentary. Further than that, no indignities were allowed to the body. The usual mourning ceremonies were dispensed with and the body placed in one of two special cemeteries, depending upon the nature of the execution, to be later disinterred and laid to rest in the general burial ground.

Upon the basis of an understanding of the operation of Jewish criminal law of the period of the Sanhedrin, certain well defined conclusion must be drawn as to the general spirit of that law.

What was the spirit of the Jewish criminal law? It was stern and severe. There was little of sentimentality in it. It is true that the whole attitude of the Rabbinic law was summed up in the belief of the extension of the principle "thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself" even to the criminal, and the Mishnah provides that "the spirit of love must be manifest by according him a decent death." The administering of punishment, however, was certain, swift sure and unwavering. There was not then, as now, a widespread exhaltation of the criminal as the "innocent victim of society." Where the case against the accused was clearly made out, beyond any reasonable doubt, and as we must observe the safeguards given the defendant were stronger than those of the present day in many respects, inexorable punishment was certain to follow. One criticism made today of our criminal law is that punishment is not certain. In this respect we have something to learn from the Rabbinic law of the fourth and fifth centuries.

While puling sentimentality was utterly lacking it is not to be supposed that the criminal jurisprudence of the Jew was cruel or barbarous. Compared with the criminal law of the fourth and fifth century and even later in England it showed a far higher plane of morality and a more humanitarian spirit. Every advantage that could possibly be afforded the defendant consistent with a proper enforcement of the law was envoked in his favor. Every precaution was taken against a hasty or ill-founded conviction. The reference to the provision for clearance up to the last moment, to the necessity for eye-witnesses, to the exclusion of hearsay or circumstantial evidence—all substantiate this assertion. Truly may it be said that in the Rabbinic law we have the very highest conception of the legal maxim that one is considered innocent until proved guilty. And while we may shudder at the contemplation of the bare statement of the methods of execution, this feeling is mitigated by the fact that hemmed in as was the prosecution if there can be said to have been any prosecution in the modern sense, by the safeguards afforded the defendant, it was exceedingly difficult to secure a conviction.

In comparison with the criminal jurisprudence of early Anglo-Saxon society, the criminology of the Jew may be characterized as one founded upon rationalism, where that of early England was based upon ignorance and superstition. The criminal procedure of the Jew was always accusatory, but never inquisitorial. Between these two methods a vast difference exists, in the first, a definite charge being preferred against the defendant and conviction following only upon proof of the particular charge, in the second, the defendant being harrassed and agonized until guilt of some actual, or, as often happened, imaginary, offense was "proved." The Jewish criminal has never known the rack, the thumb-screw, the agonizing fires of an inquisitorial procedure at the hands of his co-religionists. He was convicted only upon a common-sense trial, based upon a common-sense procedure. Compare this with the trial by ordeal, or wager of battle of the Anglo-Saxon of a far later period in the history of civilization. What did the trial by battle prove? Merely the comparative brute strength of the parties. What did the Rabbinic law prove? The guilt or innocence of the defendant.

When we consider the use of capital punishment by the Jew, we cannot base our conclusion merely upon the bare provision of the code. We must take into consideration the actual employment of the extreme penalty. One fact is clearly settled and is of the utmost importance. The death penalty was rarely invoked. By the Mishnah a court was deemed murderous if it condemned to death more than one person in the course of seven years, and Eleazar ben Azariah increases the period to seventy years. Not only was there a rarity in the employment of the penalty, but there was at all times an open and avowed opposition to its use in any case. Let this fact be impressed upon the minds of all who consider the propaganda against capital punishment to bear the stamp of the most modern of civilizations, that capital punishment has always been a subject of serious controversy among the Jews, and that the opposition to capital punishment is literally almost as old as capital punishment itself. Thus we find Tryphon and Akiba, acknowledged opponents of the death penalty asserting "Had we belonged to the Sanhedrin, no man would ever have been executed." Reply to this is made by Rabban Simon to the effect that "the men who talk in this way multiply the shedders of blood in Israel." Is there not something of a trace of extreme modernity in these opposing counsels.

I do not hesitate to assert at this time, what is not mere asseveration, but a contention substantiated by the material facts, that the Jewish criminal law of the period of the Sanhedrin evinces a more civilized state of society, a more humane attitude toward the criminal, than did the criminology of Colonial America, of nineteenth-century England or even, in many respects, the criminology of many so-called civilized societies of the present day. The criminal science of contemporary Russia is a living testimony to the truth of this assertion. And I make the statement advisedly, that when we realize that hanging for scores of petty offenses occurred less than a century ago in England, that the death penalty is often imposed in the United States upon evidence which is circumstantial and lacks finality, we cannot but acquiesce in the thought that Jewish criminal law of fifteen or more centuries ago presents a more humane aspect than does the criminology of many boasted civilizations.

The state of civilization of a people is determined by a consideration of many factors. Its art, its literature, its economic and political systems are naturally the elements at which we look in order to determine whether a nation is above or below a more or less fixed standard or norm of civilization. But one element which is not always taken as an indication of a nation's civilization is its system of criminal law. No one with discernment, however, can fail to realize that after all a nation's attitude toward crime and criminals is largely indicative of its spirit, its humaneness, its civilization. The characterization of Russia as a backward nation has come largely as a result of its Siberian exile and peremptory punishment. The same is true of China, of certain tribes of Africa and of present-day Mexico. This rule of characterization should apply equally well to the Jew.

Is it not strange, is it not startling, is it not in the highest degree incredible that a people whose whole theology has been dominated by a conception of brotherly love and desire for peace, whose attitude towards even the most culpable of its criminals has been one distinguished by an abhorrence of bloodshed and execution, whose criminal law, which so often reflects the character of a nation, sought to give every possible advantage to the accused in order to minimize the chances of conviction and, where conviction was inevitably necessary, sought to alleviate the suffering of the condemned, is it not a serious commentary upon the intelligence of the accuser, that such a people should be the victims of charges of cruelty, of inhumanity, of ceremonial and ritual murder? Truly may we assert that Jewish criminology is indicative of Israel's mission, and that that mission is peace.

MEMPHIS LODGE NO. 35, MEMPHIS, TENN.

An important meeting of Memphis Lodge was held on Sept. 27, 1914.

In addition to the regular routine business of the lodge, many very important matters were brought up before the members and action taken on the same. One of the principal topics of much consequence acted upon was the appointment of a committee to assist the District Grand Lodge in devising ways and means to raise a fund in the district which comprises seven states, to relieve the distress incident to the European war, and which will be felt by thousands of members of the B'nai B'rith Order and of other Jewish co-religionists in Europe. Geo. Ellman and Rabbi Samfield were the principal speakers on this subject.

Another committee appointed was a membership committee to raise the present membership of the lodge.

The next meeting of the lodge, which will take place Sunday morning, October 11th, at 10:30 o'clock, is being planned as a rally meeting, at which Leo Goodman of Memphis, grand president of the district, and other prominent members are expected to speak. The several committees will also make reports, and an interesting program is promised.

A very touching scene was enacted at this meeting, when Rabbi Samfield made a most impressive and feeling address regarding the eightieth birthday anniversary of Sam Schloss, the oldest member of the lodge. In concluding his address, after recounting the good work Mr. Schloss had accomplished in this city, Rabbi Samfield introduced a resolution that a committee be appointed to draft and have engrossed suitable resolutions bearing upon the event, and that the resolutions be presented to Mr. Schloss. The motion was unanimously carried by a rising vote.

IN THE LAND OF THE TSAR.

In the widespread upheaval that is proceeding in Europe many bases are being shifted, many systems overthrown, many landmarks swept away. The eyes of those who peer into the future are naturally largely directed towards the condition of our people as it has been hitherto in Russia, as one of the most glaring of evils to which it is hoped this gigantic struggle against the forces of militarism will set an end. It is not surprising that rumors should be abroad that the oppression of the Jew in the land of the tsar, which has been such a nightmare to the race, is to disappear. Up till the present no official confirmation has been forthcoming. But it is difficult to suppose that when the sword returns to its scabbard all the fraternizations of the war and all the sacrifices of the many thousands of Jewish troops will be forgotten, and the old weary round of restrictions, tempered by blood libels, will be resumed. In Russia the army has, unhappily, been one of the well-springs of Jewish oppression. But the army can never be the same prejudice-ridden institution as before it found itself in a comradeship of arms with the British and French nations. It has gone into a new atmosphere; it has marched in spirit, if not in body, with the western nations. It has been drawn into the orbit of enlightened peoples. And it will surely return to barracks with the scales of intolerance lifted from its eyes.

Russo-Jewish and Jewish.

Let us not forget, however, that a settlement, if it be attained, of the Russo-Jewish problem will by no means involve a solution of the greater Jewish problem. Though it will, of course, affect it, freedom for the Jew in Russia will dispose of but one facet of the far wider Jewish question. In the grand uprising on behalf of the smaller peoples, it is not too much to hope that the cause of the Jew will not be overlooked. Indeed, we may expect that it will come steadily to the front, that it will command new attention, and that it will, in the present circumstances, attract to itself a new consideration and a new sympathy. Many old questions will come up for settlement when this war is over. Problems that have vexed generations of men may receive a dramatic settlement. Is it inconceivable that the Jewish problem may be among them? The world, called to face fresh and portentious burdens, will be ready and anxious to dispose, at the long list of the besetting Jewish difficulty. There is but one chilling doubt as we contemplate the future as it is being so terribly opened up for us. Have Jews themselves the insight and the courage to take the occasion by the hand?—The Jewish Chronicle (London).

ANSWER: "HERE"

"ANY ONE WHO IS PROSPEROUS MAY BY THE TURN OF FORTUNE'S WHEEL BECOME MOST WRETCHED BEFORE EVENING."

Tens of thousands of Jews of Russian, Austrian and German Poland and Belgium have discovered this lamentable truth.

There are about 200,000 Galician Jews, principally old men, women and children, homeless and helpless, crying for bread and shelter; there are Russian and Belgian refugees in England, Norway and Holland, dependent upon what others may give them.

The B'nai B'rith of Berlin, Vienna, Prague and other cities have turned their club houses into hospitals; have furnished nurses for the wounded and sick; and have donated fortunes to aid the unfortunates in this the greatest calamity of centuries.

The Lodges in London, Copenhagen, Constantinople, in fact, in all of the European cities, are doing their utmost to relieve misery.

Are we doing our duty?

The Executive Committee of the Order has issued an appeal to the lodges to raise funds so that we may be able, to some small extent at least, to aid the unfortunate of our faith—victims of this most horrible war. Most of the lodges are responding nobly, but a large percentage of the members has so far failed to send individual contributions.

It has been said: "WORSE THAN A BLOODY HAND IS A HARD HEART." A hard heart is not characteristic of the Jew. Are YOU, dear reader, one who failed to have his name enrolled among those, who to the call of duty, answered: "Here"?

Perhaps you felt that you could not send much and accordingly hesitated to send anything. Do not hesitate. Every contribution, however small, will be thankfully received.

GIVE ACCORDING TO YOUR MEANS, BUT GIVE IT NOW. Do not wait until tomorrow, but give while the impulse to help your suffering brothers is strong within you.

Send your contribution to the secretary of your District Grand Lodge or to this office. Contributions will be acknowledged in the next issue of the B'nai B'rith News.

WHAT IS A JEW?

TOLSTOY ON THE JEWISH PEOPLE

What is a Jew? Indeed, it seems a rather foolish question to ask, for who in the world does not know what a Jew is? Who, of all my readers though he has never seen a Jew, and knows nothing about the Jew's destiny in his wonderful history, who of them would be unable to answer this simple question in the usual manner of our modern Russian publicist: "The Jew is a leech that sucks out the blood and marrow of the country and its inhabitants. The Jew is one who sells his goods, not for the common interest of the customer, but for his own special benefit," etc., etc. We, nevertheless, think that the question is not at all so odd as it seems. It is, in fact, a difficult problem to solve if we would look at it in a different light. Let us see what kind of the Jew is. What kind of a beast is it which all rulers and all nations, commencing with Pharaoh, King of Egypt, and ending with the Rumanian Cabinet of Bratiana, beginning with the inquisition of the Torquemadas, and ending with the present Russian bureaucracy, have together and separately abused and molested, oppressed and persecuted, trampled and butchered, burned and hanged—and in spite of all this is yet alive! This odd creature lives to this very day! Moreover, it has its representatives in all the civilized lands of the world, and in all fields of activity; political, financial, judicial, administrative and military, and in fact, in all branches of art and science. What is the Jew who arises anew, after all the persecutions and slaughter that he has withstood, who arises out of his ruins with new vigor, with new energy, and becomes a fierce and dreadful "Cain-mark" to his persecutors and oppressors? What is a Jew, who, being so eager for money, has nevertheless not allowed himself to be led astray by all the earthly possessions which his oppressors and persecutors constantly offered him in order that he should change his faith and forsake his own Jewish religion? The Jew is that sacred being who has brought down from heaven the everlasting fire, and has illuminated with it the entire world. The Jew is he who carries around everywhere and makes it the possession of the whole world. The Jew has been for a long time the sole keeper and protector of the divine idea. He is the religious source, spring and fountain out of which all the rest of the peoples have drawn their beliefs and their religions. Had it not been for the Jew, all the other nations would have remained idol wor-

The Divine Idea

Anti-Defamation League Bulletin No. 3.

During the past few months, the League has devoted most of its energy and attention to the constructive work referred to in the Principles. This has been made possible by a diminution in the number of individual complaints filed, and by the perfecting of the organization. The matters investigated and acted upon were widely divergent in character.

Summer Resort Discrimination.

Throughout the past summer, complaints of discrimination on the part of summer resort owners against Jews were received almost daily. These complaints came from all parts of the country and from the most expensive as well as the poorest class of summer hotels. Attempts were made in each case to ascertain the causes and reasons for the hotel's policy. Many of the hotels, especially the more pretentious ones, stated that economically they could not afford to entertain Jews. For example, a Minnesota hotel keeper stated that it was quite immaterial to him whether he entertained Jews or non-Jews, but that his experience had been that when Jews started to patronize a place, non-Jews, for some reason or other, gradually stopped coming, and that within a short time he found he had an entirely Jewish patronage. This, he stated, was an equally desirable condition, except for the fact that Jewish people were much more likely to desert a summer resort en masse and go to another, whither the finger of fashion pointed, than was the case with non-Jews, and that he would then have an empty hotel on his hands and find it necessary to establish an entirely new clientele. Other hotel keepers did not consider it incumbent upon them to make any explanation whatsoever; while still others crudely stated that the Jews were not good enough for the class of people whom they entertained; that they preferred not to receive them at all. They implied that Jews are, as a people, unrefined, loud and vulgar, who believe that money is the sole criterion of gentlemanliness, and that with money they can break into any circles, however cultured and refined those circles may be. It cannot be denied that there are Jews who belong in this category; neither can it be denied, however, that these characteristics are found in at least as large a degree among non-Jews. We have found no summer resort, which openly discriminates against non-Jews on this account. On the other hand, many summer resorts, because of these alleged characteristics, more or less politely inform every Jew who presents himself, no matter how highly educated, refined or gentlemanly he may be, that he is persona non grata.

No self-respecting Jew has any desire to become a guest at such a place, and the League has at no time attempted to force admission for our people. The chief evil is not in the discrimination, but in the method by which that discrimination is made known. Letter-heads, circulars, telegrams in reply to inquiries, all bear the inscription in more or less offensive manner that no Jews are taken. When an "eight dollar a week" summer resort widely advertises its discrimination in this regard, the impression must be created that the Jew is indeed a most undesirable person. The League considered, therefore, that its activities should be directed in the main at the elimination of advertising of this nature on the part of the hotels. An amendment to the United States Postal Laws was therefore drafted, providing that no advertising matter, letter-heads, circulars, etc., should be sent through the mails by any hotel, summer resort, etc., which indicated a discriminatory policy on its part against any people on account of their religious affiliation. This amendment will be submitted to the United States Congress at the next session, and the League is actively engaged in securing its enactment. State laws, modeled upon the New York statute, making it a misdemeanor to circulate advertisements of such a discriminatory policy, will be introduced in several states at the next session of their various legislatures.

Motion Pictures.

The motion picture situation has materially improved. It is very seldom now that the League is called upon to take action in relation to objectionable pictures. In fact, during the past few months, there has only been one film, which was so bad that it could not have been improved by a "cut out" here and there. We have been compelled to send out bulletins in two or three other cases, condemning films in toto—some of them several reels in length—because of the fact that outside of Chicago and a few other cities, there were no local facilities for making "cut outs." Frequently a picture, otherwise unobjectionable, will contain a few feet of film that are very obnoxious. To cope with this difficulty, and also to make certain of the continuance of the present policy of motion picture producers, the League has caused a motion picture censorship ordinance to be introduced in a number of the larger cities. A careful investigation of conditions has shown that the so-called National Board of Censorship has proven quite inefficient, and is to all intents and purposes a mere cloak for the manufacturers to ward off any censorship whatsoever. In energetically endorsing and helping the enactment of these ordinances, the League feels that it is doing a work that will redound not only to its credit, but will benefit all classes of people. In fact, the large amount of work involved would never have been undertaken had the League not desired to show that its purposes and objects are not entirely selfish. It is hoped that before long the League will have been successful in having these ordinances passed in all sections of the country.

Life.

For many years, "Life" was recognized as the leading anti-Jewish publication of the United States. Hardly a week passed that some insulting caricature or joke did not appear in that publication. An examination of the bound volumes of the magazine for the years 1912-1913 shows a total of about one hundred Jewish cartoons or jokes, more or less objectionable. In April the Executive Committee took the matter up by correspondence with the Editor of "Life." In reply, he informed us that we were "in error in assuming that it was 'Life's' purpose to abuse the Jews," and directed our attention to the fact that other nationalities and people were also caricatured, and that comparatively less space was devoted to caricaturization of the Jew. In reply, we wrote that it was not the quantity, but the character and nature of the pictures and jokes, with which we were concerned, and stated that it was unnecessary for them to reply to our letter, as the columns of the paper would clearly reflect the spirit in which our communication was received. From the date of our letter until within the last two or three weeks, a period of about four months, not a single joke or cartoon that we could take exception to appeared in "Life." That the magazine should have abstained for such a comparatively long period showed that our action had had some effect. In the issue of September 10th, and also in the issues of September 17th and 24th, however, "Life" seems to have forgotten its protestations, and to have recommenced its anti-Jewish propaganda. Whether this is due to an oversight on the part of the editorial staff, or whether it is due to a deliberate intent to insult and affront the two million Jewish people in this country, has not yet been ascertained. If the latter is the true interpretation, the matter will receive our further attention.

Agitation Against Signor Nathan.

About the middle of May, we were confronted with a situation which seemed to be of a very serious nature. Signor Ernesto Nathan, ex-mayor of Rome, was appointed by the Italian government as Commissioner to the San Francisco Exposition. Because of certain alleged utterances of Nathan against the Pope and Catholicism, while Mayor of Rome, the Catholic press of this country attempted to secure the withdrawal of his appointment. Resolutions to boycott the Fair were passed by certain Catholic societies; and some sections of the Catholic press and a few Catholic clergymen became most vindictive in their utterances, not only against Mr. Nathan, but against all Jews. One paper in particular, the Western Catholic, published in Quincy, Illinois, devoted practically an entire issue to the most vile and indiscreet remarks about the Jewish people. The possibilities for harm and injury to our people seemed tremendous, as some of the Catholic papers, in their blind anger against Nathan, attempted to stir up their readers against all Jews. A letter, directing attention to the injustice of these attacks, and the undeserved injury they might result in, was sent to a number of the most influential Catholic church dignitaries of this country, and the replies indicated that the action taken by those guilty of attacking the Jews was not approved of by those in high authority. A letter from the Archbishop of Melitene, Apostolic Delegate at Washington, clearly shows their attitude. He states in part:

> "In reply, I wish to state, that the Catholic Church is opposed to provoking race hatred or attacking people because of their religious or political tenets. Hence it is needless for me to say that I do not approve of what the Rev. M. J. Foley has written, or what any one else writes against the Jewish people, in connection with Mr. Nathan's appointment as Italian Commisioner to the Panama Pacific Exposition."

As a result of this attitude on the part of the clergy, the section of the Catholic press above referred to discontinued its attacks on Jews and confined opposition to Mr. Nathan.

Vaudeville.

Judging from the comparatively small number of complaints received with relation to vaudeville acts, the situation in this respect seems to have become much better. Booking agencies, theatrical managers, and the actors themselves, have become convinced that public opinion will not permit the ridiculing or defamation of any people on account of their religious tenets. Negotiations with theatrical managers and with booking agencies have, in general, been entirely satisfactory. Most of them have been willing to co-operate with us, and have seen the justice in our point of view. A few have adopted the attitude that they are the best judges of whether an act is objectionable or otherwise. The Managing Board requests all members of the League to be on the lookout for objectionable vaudeville shows, and in making reports to specify the full name and nature of the act; the name of the theatrical circuit and the booking office, and in what city the act would next appear.

Newspapers.

Only a few newspapers have been guilty of the improper use of the words "Jew," "Jewish," "Hebrew," etc. This is due in large measure to the wide circulation of a carefully prepared memorandum on the proper use of the words. A prompt apology was forthcoming, and a promise to use greater care in the future was obtained in the few cases that we found it necessary to act upon. For example, an article in the Chicago Evening Post, written by one Polly Pry, describing the financing of the Villa forces in Mexico, referred to one of Villa's trusted agents as "A German Jew, with the oily sycophancy of an old clothes dealer, and the far-seeing vision of his race where money is concerned." A letter to the editor brought forth a prompt response in which he stated:

> "I quite agree with you that the author might have written the facts of the case in a way which would not even by implication reflect on a [illegible] when the acts of only an in[illegible] were involved. In the pub[illegible] of the Evening Post there is no purpose nearer my heart than the promotion of a spirit of broad tolerance and brotherhood. There is no place in the world where this spirit can be more effectively cultivated than in Chicago, with its cosmopolitan population and interdependent racial elements. I have read 'The Note on the Word Jew' which you enclosed, and have given instructions that proofs of it be struck for the guidance of all reporters, copyreaders, and editors."

In several cases, newspapers published articles which tended to give a false and erroneous impression of Jewish customs, ethics and morality. In each instance, the League undertook to answer these charges in detail, and, in some instances, were successful in having the replies reprinted in the same paper where the objectionable article originally appeared, thus offsetting, to some extent, the injury that had been done.

Merchant of Venice.

The campaign against the use of "The Merchant of Venice" in our public schools is beginning to show results. We have been in communication with several hundred school superintendents throughout the country, many of whom have seen the justice of our plea. They realize, as we do, that pupils of immature age are not philosophers, that their discriminative faculty is not developed, and that whatever Shakespeare may have meant by his portrayal of Shylock, the youthful reader sees only the avaricious, revengeful and bloodthirsty Jew, and only has his early acquired prejudice strengthened and deepened. Thus far, about fifty cities through our efforts have either discontinued the use of this play, or have indicated their intention to do so in the near future. Our success has been made possible by the fact that the College Entrance Requirement Board, which fixes uniform requirements in English, for entrance to the universities and colleges of this country, was persuaded to delete "The Merchant of Venice" from the list of plays required to be intensively studied, and to make the study of the play entirely optional.

Magazines.

Complaints against objectionable magazine articles have been confined, in most instances, to magazines of very limited circulation, such, for example, as special publications, trade papers and corporation bulletins of one kind or another. In practically all cases these complaints were easily adjusted. In only two cases objectionable matter appeared in magazines of general circulation. In the Short Stories Magazine for May, a story entitled "The Mystery of the Amsterdam Diamonds" had as its chief criminal character a Jew named Sol Rosenstein. The story was very offnesive in many respects. Complaints was filed with Doubleday, Page and Company, publishers, who replied as follows:

> "We regret exceedingly that the Cleek story in 'Short Stories' proved to be offensive. We, of course, had no idea in printing this story to give any one offense.
> "The story to which you object was one of a series contracted for some time ago; and, in accordance with our agreement, with the author and with the Edison Moving Picture Studios, we were compelled to print 'The Mystery of the Amsterdam Diamonds.' Realizing that it was in many respects objectionable, we endeavored to substitute another story which was all right, but we were unable to do so. The story was edited somewhat before publication, but it was impossible to cut out all the objectionable features. Of course, the story might have been told about an Irishman, or a German, or an American, but it just happened to describe a Jew, which we agree is unfortunate.
> "We shall be very glad to run a notice in our page devoted to 'Notes,' but unfortunately it cannot appear until the October number because all the issues previous to that have gone to press."

In accordance with their promise, the October issue of the magazine contained an apology and denial of any intent to defame the Jew.

The Edison motion picture film of the same name, which was released simultaneously with the publication of the story, was effectively stopped through this office and a promise to be very careful hereafter secured from the Edison motion picture company. The Manager writes, under date to June 27th, in part as follows:

> "We reiterate that greater care will be exercised in the future in the production of any films of this character, and we feel that you will have no further occasion to complain because the Edison Company has offended your League, or the Jewish people generally."

In the September issue of the "Century," an article entitled "The Hebrews of Eastern Europe," by Edward A. Ross, attempted to arouse antagonism against Jewish immigration to this country. The article teems with falsehoods and half-truths. Under a veil of innuendo and honeyed compliments, he condemns the whole Jewish people. Judging from the article, as a whole, the impression given is that Mr. Ross—who, by the way, is a Professor of the University of Wisconsin—is decidedly prejudiced in his attitude towards the Jew. We at once wrote to the Editor of Century, suggesting that the injustice done could be best rectified by the publication of a properly appreciative article in an early issue. In reply the Editor advises us that the magazine will shortly publish "a very appreciative article" by Paul Warburg.

To assist the League in the combatting of such untruthful articles as that above referred to, the League has commenced to gather information of a statistical and sociological nature, concerning the situation and condition of the Jews of this country. As the expense involved in making such a collection is necessarily great, little progress has thus far been made, but it is hoped that before long the League will be in a position to serve as a clearing house for accurate information concerning all branches of Jewish activities and interests.

Miscellaneous.

Quite a number of miscellaneous complaints have been received, complete record of which will be found in our forthcoming annual report.

Conclusion.

It sometimes happens that a situation which could be corrected by a diplomatic and dignified letter, is made impossible by reason of somebody, not associated with the League, taking it upon himself to answer for all the Jewish people. The Managing Board, which meets weekly, considers most carefully the phraseology and content of every important communication, and takes action only after calm deliberation. Furthermore, the hundreds of prominent men who are actively engaged in the work in their various districts, and the fifty thousand members of the League, lend great weight to its protests, which in turn have become recognized as eminently fair and just. The League wishes to reiterate, therefore, the request previously made that all complaints, not purely local in their scope, be referred to the Offices of the Executive Committee.

Respectfully submitted,
SIGMUND LIVINGSTON,
Chairman.
LEON L. LEWIS,
Secretary.

ENGLISH AND FRENCH PRESS FOR JEWISH RIGHTS.

An active agitation for Jewish rights in Russia is being carried on in the foremost English and French journals. According to a French paper, the Czar has already appointed a commission to devise more liberal laws for Jews and Finns. Signor Luigi Luzzatti, the famous Italian diplomat, published a strong article in which he points out to Russia its present opportunity and duty towards the Jews. The well-known French socialist, Hervé, likewise urges the same policy on Russia, pointing out at the same time the self-sacrificing loyalty evinced by the French Jews in the present crisis.

A Russian diplomat, however, has made it clear that it is futile to expect that Russia would allow the Jewish question to enter in any way into peace negotiations. He said that if Russia is victorious in its present struggle, the position of the Jews will naturally be improved, but it would never be permitted to make this an issue in articles of peace that may later be drawn up. The Jews will have to rely on Russian fairness and square dealing in the matter.

JEWS IN THE EUROPEAN WAR.

From a study of the mobilization figures in the towns of the various belligerent countries where Jewish population is known, it has been figured that six hundred thousand Jewish soldiers are enrolled in the various battling armies, Russia having 350,000, Austria 160,000, Germany 80,000, France and Belgium 4,000, and England 5,000.

WHAT IS A JEW?

shippers to this day. The Jew has been chosen by God to keep and preserve His law; and this sacred mission the Jew has fulfilled in spite of the tortures and inquisitions inflicted upon him by the Greek and Roman Catholic churches. The Jew is the pioneer of liberty. Even in those olden days, when the people were divided into but two distinct classes, slaves and masters—even so long ago had the law of Moses prohibited the practice of keeping a person in slavery and in bondage for more than six years. After that time the slave had to be set free without any money payment to his master. And, in case the servant rejects this privilege, Moses commands that the master bore his ear. The Talmud explains very logically the relation between the ear and slavery: "The ear that heard God's word on Mount Sinai: 'You are my servants and not slaves to my servants!'" and has not regarded these words, and has indifferently rejected his own liberation, his ear certainly deserves to be bored through with an awl. The Jew is the symbol of Absolute Equality.

The Talmud, that is so much condemned, and of which all those who do not understand it are so much afraid, shows clearly from the Holy Scripture, in many different ways that no one can say: "My father has been greater than your father." In another place the Talmud remarks that the Old Testament does not treat about one people in particular, but about all people in general. The Jew is the pioneer of civilization. Already, 1,000 years before the birth of Christ, when the known parts of the world were yet wild and ignorant, in Palestine it had already been customary and fully understood that everyone who was educated should teach the uneducated; and ignorance had been condemned in those olden days in the Jewish world more even than it is today in civilized Europe. Even an unlawfully born child, who, according to the precepts of the Mosaic Law, cannot be accepted into the Jewish community, even him the Talmud places higher than the High Priest, if he is an educated and learned man and the priest ignorant and uneducated. Moreover, in those wild and barbarous days, when neither the life nor the death of anyone counted for anything at all, Rabbi Akiba, the foremost and greatest Talmudist, did not refrain from expressing himself openly against capital punishment, a practice which is recognized today as a highly civilized way of punishment. The Jew is the emblem of Civil and Religious Toleration.

"Love the stranger and the sojourner," Moses commands, "because you have been strangers in the land of Egypt." And this was said in those remote and wild times when the principal ambition of the races and nations consisted in crushing and enslaving one another. At first glance, Moses' words seem to sound very strange. The Egyptians misused the loyalty of the Jew, the Egyptians enslaved the Jew and with whip in hand compelled him to do the hardest labor, the Egyptian ordered that every newborn Jewish boy be thrown into the river (a decree which did not except Moses himself), and notwithstanding all this, Moses commands the Israelites to love the strangers because they themselves had been strangers in Egypt, as though the Hebrews ought to be grateful to the Egyptians for their harsh treatment. But this very fact shows the exalted world-wide philosophy that aimed to root out of the Jew's heart every trace of revenge. As concerns religious toleration, Judaism is not only far from the missionary spirit of of other denominations, but on the contrary, the Talmud commands the rabbis to inform and explain to everyone who willingly comes to accept the Jewish religion, all the difficulties and impossibilities that are involved in the Jewish faith. Of such a lofty and ideal religious toleration, not even the moralists of our present day can boast. The Jew is the emblem of eternity. He whom neither slaughter nor torture of thousands of years could destroy, he whom neither fire nor sword nor inquisition were able to wipe off from the face of the earth, he who was the first to produce the oracles of God, he who has been for so long the guardian of prophecy, and who transmitted it to the rest of the world —such a nation cannot be destroyed. He is everlasting as is eternity itself. The Jew has been and always will be the constant follower and confessor of liberty, equality, civilization, and perfect religious toleration.—The Jewish World.

THE KEHILLAH

BY PROF. GOTTHARD DEUTSCH, Ph.D.

XI.

The narrowness of life, both physical and economic, had a deteriorating effect on the character of the Jews. People lived huddled together, and almost everybody was everybody else's competitor for the little business that was to be had, and their petty communal affairs were another cause of perpetual contention. As the few rabbit skins that were to be bought in a little village created business troubles, so the question who should be called to the Torah for the coveted fourth or sixth place, made enemies of individuals, as well as of their families. The position of the rabbi suffered also from such conditions. Everbody observed him in every action of his life, and everybody found some fault with him. He either was not "frumm" enough, or he spent too much time in chatting with his neighbors, instead of studying the Torah, or he was too oblivious of his dignity, or again too snobbish.

Our poor rabbi Trieschet suffered in the first years of his office from an additional misfortune. His first wife became insane and left him the care of three little girls. According to rabbinical law he was in an absolutely helpless condition, until the death of his wife relieved both him and her. The rabbinical law does not allow a divorce in the case of insanity, a rather humane provision for the protection of the woman, but at the same time a considerable hardship. There is one way out of this difficulty. The Jewish matrimonial law does not prohibit polygamy, at least theoretically. The prohibition which actually exists, is merely based on an ordinance of Rabbi Gershom of Mayence in the eleventh century, and generally accepted by all occidental Jews. In extraordinary cases, as in that of insanity, this prohibition may be set aside by a special act, which has to be signed by hundred rabbis from three different countries. Such a provision again was contrary to the law of the state. So poor Rabbi Trieschet had the care of his household, which involved him in considerable difficulties. Our town is situated on the Iglawa River, a rather insignificant stream, which, however, becomes very dangerous in the time of the spring flood. The Jewish quarter was situated in the most exposed part of the town, which perhaps, judging from a similar condition in Prague, was a general condition, due to the fact that the Jews were only too glad to obtain a foothold in what was otherwise a very undesirable location. I still dimly remember such a flood on February 1, 1862, and remember only from my father's report, that the rabbi took the opportunity of warning against the consequences of Sabbath breaking, preaching on the text of Jeremiah 9, 11: "Wherefor is the land perished? Because they have forsaken my law which I set before them, and have not obeyed my voice, neither walked therein." The Sabbath breaking, I must add, was then rather exceptional. It was almost entirely confined to the liquor shops, of which there were quite a few, originally distilleries in the days when this business was a privilege granted by the lord of manor. One could not expect that the customers should suppress their thirst until the Sabbath was over, and so they were served, when they came, although the owners of such a place would not do any other business on the Sabbath. A generation before my time it was different, as my father told me. Then the regular patrons of the liquor shop were waiting on the street, watching until the three stars appeared, which indicated the close of the Sabbath. But even then people compromised with their conscience in urgent cases.

A little incident, illustrating this condition, is too amusing to be withheld from posterity. My father's grandfather, Zalman Wolf (1754-1829) had the reputation of a coward. My father did not deny it, but he was exceedingly sensitive, if somebody else poked fun at a member of his family. One time our neighbor Lozer, a distant relative of my father, told the story, how Reb Zalman Wolf ran after a wagon, in which his daughter was starting on a journey, crying pitifully that the driver stop, because the wagon was rocking on the cobblestone pavement of the "Gass." My father grew angry. "Well," he said, "when he needed it, he had courage. When we were the tenents of the municipal brewery, a soldier came in on Sabbath and demanded a drink. The 'Dede' (grandfather from the Slavic) refused to serve him. The soldier became abusive, and finally threw a bayonet at him, which struck the wall, leaving a mark, which reamined there as long, as we had the brewery. But the soldier had to go without being served. Your father, Reb Moishe, however, though he considered himself a great Talmudist, and would not allow the cows to be milked on a holiday, unless a piece of Barches was placed in the bucket, sold whisky by the bottle, as long as a customer took the bottle from the shelf, and placed the money on the counter, so that your father could count it with his eyes, afterwards making the customer drop it through a slit." The procedure requires a little explanation. It may be still rather generally known that the rabbinical Sabbath law prohibits the handling of any object which serves a prohibited purpose. This is the reason that Reb Moishe would not touch any money. More difficult is the explanation of the circumvention of milking a cow. The rabbinical law puts all activities, which are considered work, in categories. Milking is the removal of something eatable from something that may not be eaten, and therefore, is in one category with threshing. In the same way the squeezing of a lemon would be prohibited. Some way out of the difficulty would be to squeeze the milk into something that may be eaten, thus merely adding something which is eatable to another object of the same category, just as buttering a piece of bread is permitted. In this way Reb Moishe had invented some device, which not only relieved the cow, but allowed the use of fresh milk on a holiday.

In the forty years that had elapsed from the days of Reb Moishe to the days of my childhood the Sabbath desecration had become an everyday affair for the liquor shops. People had outgrown the fear of touching money, and carried on their trade without any restriction. The rabbi's sermon, describing vividly how the flood was a natural consequence of Sabbath desecration, had some effect. Reb Shimme, whose place was nxet to my father's in the synagogue, said, "I am satisfied. Let the big fellows start," by which he meant his brother-in-law and competitor, Itzig Loeb. The big fellows, however, did not start, and about two years later, when the first railroad was built, connecting our town with Bruenn, and the laborers came to town on Sabbath afternoon, doing their shopping, Sabbath breaking became rather the rule, and only a few of the older people preserved the good old traditions. They had died out before I left Europe, and the rabbi of today might quote the law and the prophets with no more effect than if he did it in Chicago.

This little incident shows, how the rabbi was respected as long as he spoke, what might be termed, "ex cathedra." I remember another incident which my father told me. On the two Sabbaths, when official sermons were preached, which as stated before, were the Sabbath preceding Passover and Yom Kippur, it was necessary that the rabbi discussed a topic of Talmudic law, drawing from it some practical lesson. On one such occasion Rabbi Trieschet discussed a Talmudic passage, dealing with the burning of bricks, and drew the lesson from it, that in as much as a clay pipe was improved by being used for the first time, one should not use a new clay pipe on Yomtov without having smoked from it at least once the day before. My father followed this advice to the end of his days. Another similar incident I recall from the Friday evening gatherings of our family circles, which convened alternately in one or another family. One woman of the family had the misfortune of inadvertently using the quill brush (Schmierfeder) destined for the use of animal fat, in buttering the "Delklech" (small cakes). Finding it out only after the cakes were baked, she consulted the rabbi, who to her great relief, declared it was sufficient to take off the upper crust, and so the family had on that Sabbath quillotined "Delklech." Equally unquestioned was the rabbi's authority as a Talmudic scholar. Every Sabbath afternoon five or six Talmudists came to his house to listen to the "Schiur" (Talmudic lecture). Most of them represented the older generation. My father, born in 1819, was the next youngest, and after him was only one, Reb Elijeh Harsh, who was born about 1830. He was the last disciple of the Yeshibah in our town. My father, however, was the last one to keep up the tradition of the study of the Talmud, up to two years before his death in 1890, when the infirmities of age made it impossible for him to continue. The story of Elijeh Harsh, the last disciple of a Jeshibah, is also interesting. His father, Yossef Moishe Koihens, always so called, although his official family name was Frey, had the ambition that his son should be a Talmudic scholar. The Yeshibah had then already considerably declined. Yossef, however, who was born about 1795 preserved the ancient traditions. He was the only one whom I remember, as keeping the fast on the eve of every new moon, Yom Kippur Katan, while the others were satisfied with attending the special noonday services on this occasion. He also would not give up the "Piyutim" (special hymns and prayers for the holidays, and occasional Sabbath) which were omitted from the service, shortly after 1867, when a modern rabbi, Dr. M. H. Friedlaender was elected Trieschet's successor. His business, I am sorry to say, was mostly money lending, but he excused it by saying: "If I were to engage in any other business, I could not go to Schul every morning and evening." At any rate it was his earnest ambition that his son should be a rabbi, or at least a great Talmudic scholar. When Elijeh Harsch, however, had become a young man, he positively refused to return to the Jeshibah. His father then sent him on various errands to the villages in the neighborhood, where our people did business, and when Elijeh Marsch once came home in very wretched weather, wet to the skin, the father said to him: "Now look here, would it not be much better to sit in a comfortable room, and study?" Elijeh Harsch, however, didn't see it in this light. "It is true, father," he said, "that to walk ten to twenty miles in wretched weather like this is bad, but it is only half as bad as studying." I must add, in defence of Elijeh Harsch, that as far as observance of the old tradition goes, he was, or perhaps still is, for he was still living two years ago, the last pillar of orthodoxy in the old Kehillah.

We must return, however, to Rabbi Trieschet's domestic troubles. The care of the household considerably interfered with his official duties, and impaired his dignity. On the occasion of the special services on the eve of the new moon, which were held at half past twelve, people were waiting for the appearance of the rabbi. It was after all a business day, and time was precious. The sexton was sent for the rabbi, and he returned with the news that the rabbi would come immediately, he had been busy repairing the goose cage, and had forgotten all about the service. A similar thing happened on a more important occasion. On New Year's Day, as on Yom Kippur, services began at daybreak. Breakfast, however, on New Year's Day was not permitted, until the Shofar had been sounded. The rabbi naturally had to be one of the first at the services. When he left his home, the children were still asleep. He, therefore, made use of a less important portion of the service to go to his home to see whether the children were up and were given their breakfast. Meantime the congregation waited for the most important ceremony of the day, the blowing of the Shofar, in which the rabbi had to take part by announcing the notes. Naturally some people were hungry, and grew more impatient when they learned the cause of the delay. His devotion to his children also involved him occasionally in comical situations. As stated before, the Jewish quarter was exposed to floods. On one such occasion, when there was danger of inundation, the rabbi had to move to a safer place. The rabbi, loaded with bedding, clothes and a basket of provisions, guiding three little tots, did in spite of the seriousness of the occasion, present a rather comical spectacle. Still more comical were his habits, due to the awkwardness of any man, upon whom devolves the task of caring for little children. His hosts would tell the next day, how the rabbi got up in the middle of the night, going from one bed to another with a bottle of coffee, waking up Sorele, Rachele and Resele, with the question whether they want some coffee. Similar was his difficulty in caring for the domestic affairs. People in those days baked their own bread in the Jewish bakery, usually conducted by a woman. This bakery was an important institution—in large communities like Frankfort a.M. it was conducted as a municipal plant—especially on Sabbath. As the law does not allow to do any cooking on Sabbath, every household sent the Sabbath dishes on Friday afternoon to the bakery, where, after the fire had been removed, the dishes were placed in the oven, which was tightly closed, so that everything was cooked or baked by the heat. This is the "Shalet," the word derived from mediaeval French, still surviving, though in a different meaning, in "chaland," which Heine calls a food for gods. The disadvantage was that it had to be eaten at once, when it was taken out from the oven, and that people run the chance of having their dinners mixed up, as the genial Martha Wolfenstein so beautifully describes. In my boyhood days the Shalet oven still existed, but was in its last stages. When "Leah, die Baeckin," who reached the age of ninety-four, was compelled to retire from business, the business itself ceased. The baking of the family bread was done once, usually for the whole week, and the weight of the bread, compared with the flour used, was a matter of serious controversy. The poor rabbi, who had to figure on every small detail, asked his neighbor, Reb Joel, in the synagogue, how much bread he had received out of fifty pounds of flour. When he learned from Reb Yoel's answer that he had obtained two pounds more, the rabbi grew excited and swore at Leah, which naturally did not enhance the respect for his office. Similar was the effect when he stopped women, returning from the market, and inquired how many prunes were sold for one Kreuzer, or what Blume had paid for that wonderful duck.

When I knew him, Sorele, Resele and Rachele were married, his second wife, the Rebbezin Slowe, a plain but good woman, took care of the household, and the rabbi enjoyed the respect due to his age, to his piety, and learning. We children were told to kiss his hand, and to ask for his blessing on Sabbath. It is sad to reflect that, were it not for this accidental condition, that I happened to publish these reminiscences, his name would have been swallowed up by the abyss of time, just as the milliards of shells that form the soil of many sea coasts lost, in fact never had, any individual existence.

WAR AND WOMAN.

Toast Delivered at the Banquet Tendered to the Grand Lodge Officers of the True Sisters in the City of Memphis, Tenn., by Mrs. Hortense Furth Jacobs.

I have been asked to use for my toast today, the subject, "War and Woman," a fitting theme for this place and for this hour! Many of us here are watching with a deeper interest than that of a mere enthusiastic spectator, the titanic conflict waging in Europe today. No doubt there are those among us whose nearest and dearest are actively engaged in the struggle. The mere mention of the word, "War," conjures up a vast panorama of varied visions. We see the great siege gun, the mighty battleship, burning town and beleagured fortress, and above all, great masses of human brotherhood, face to face in deadly combat.

We read of the thousands who already have given up their lives on the battlefield, and we think with a shudder of the thousands, who inevitably will follow them into the Valley of the Shadow. The soldier who dies in defense of his flag dies a hero's death. He has but one life to give and that life he has sacrificed on the altar of his country's glory. His sufferings are over—he is at peace.

In the home that he has left—there is the tragedy. Find there the real bearer of the burden. Here dwells the woman, bereft of father, brother, husband, child, of all the comforts—sometimes even of the necessities of life. For her life goes on in a dreary succession of days from which the sunlight has been blotted forever! No hero's death; a martyr's life, her portion. Her glory it is that she takes up the burden, with that patience, endurance and courage, which are woman's chief claim to nobility. It is fitting I repeat, that we pause in the midst of this celebration of sisterly love and faith to give expression to our sympathy, to offer up a silent prayer for our sorrowing sisters across the waters. Separated by space, by creed, by nationality, by everything that drives men apart, we are yet drawn close to them by that one great indissoluble tie, the bond of a common womanhood.

At The Momentous Hour.

(Translated from "Report of German Grand Lodge")

The article under the title of "Support of the War Sufferers by the Berlin Lodges," and others published in this issue suffice to show, that the management of the "Monatsberichte" has recognized that the present conditions demand that this paper must now follow a course radically differing from that pursued heretofore. All other interests must give way to the events that now predominate our lives and that are impressing their indelible marks upon all our thoughts and sentiments. It is likely that the next following issues of our monthly bulletins shall be in position to report what has been accomplished by the individual Lodges for war purposes, and the participation by our brothers and their relatives in valorous deeds, etc. Even such articles as may be devoted exclusively to the special object and tendency of our Order will have to be brought into harmony with the events of the present times.

The period of trials, which we are now undergoing, is not only a time of sore afflictions but also a time of exaltation. The unanimity of thought and sentiment of all Germans, regardless of age, sex, political or religious affiliations or differences produces a National exaltation never before experienced. The identical unanimity prevails in our Order. All our Lodges are engaged in the most friendly contest to make themselves valuable to the Fatherland. The Grand Lodge may indeed be proud of the subordinate Lodges of these modern days.

It gives me the greatest satisfaction and pleasure to see how the members of the committee appointed by the four Berlin Lodges to provide assistance for the war sufferers devote themselves completely to their arduous duties and how they are at all times ready to help by advice and deed the numerous applicants for assistance.

The activity of the Women's Society of the Berlin Lodges has found full appreciation, not only within our own ranks, but also on the part of the general public. The Association of the Women's Societies connected with the U. O. B. B. Lodges has also issued a stirring appeal to all the branches thereof, urging all to join in the social work. As a Jew I was deeply gratified in visiting a Russian family, that, thanks to the tireless activity of our brother, Kirschstein, had found asylum and a temporary home in our Sisterhood home and these people were more than rejoiced at their reception in that friendly home and to know that they were thus lovingly received and protected notwithstanding that they are the subjects of a country now at war with us. As a German I was proud that all this could be accomplished with the full knowledge and consent of our own governmental authorities.

The appeal of the Grand Lodge to secure the means to provide shelter and sustenance for our brothers and their dependents from Eastern Prussia, the unfortunate victims of the earliest Rusian attacks, met with liberal response. We are glad to state, that only very few families of Lodge members appear to have suffered to such an extent as to be compelled to accept the assistance so cheerfully and liberally offered to them by the Lodge.

I am in no way ashamed of the tears which I shed involuntarily when I found the splendid meeting halls of the four Berlin Lodges converted into a military hospital. I was moved to shed these tears by the thought that these rooms, devoted to brotherhood and peace among men, might soon resound with the cries of pain and suffering of our wounded soldiers. Everything that can in any way be done to reduce the suffering and to contribute to the comfort of the poor victims of the war will be furnished to them in that temporary hospital.

I experienced the greatest emotion when I saw the trained nurses of the Grand Lodge (about 26 of them) assembled in the Lodge rooms before their departure and denoted in the eyes of all of these sisters the expression of joy at being detailed for actual duty on the feld of honor. These sisters wore a breastpin bearing the shield of David and on the sleeves of their uniforms they had the blood-red cross.

This combination furnished the outward confirmation of the Imperial declaration "that in future all Germans were brothers and no separation or distinction between parties or religious affiliations would be tolerated." My spiritual vision looks to the future for the realization of this prophetic promise, full of hopes, but not without some doubtful misgiving, and I trust I shall not be disappointed.

I can only report as to the doings in Berlin, but according to all reports rereceived from other centers by the Grand Lodge, the enthusiasm and the work is shared by all.

Only occasionally some slight dissonance has been caused by the fact that in isolated cases the wives and children of brothers, who had offered their assistance, could not immediately be enrolled. This has caused among those thus refused some feelings of disappointment that can readily be understood.

The Grand Lodge greatly appreciates this general expression of loyalty among the several Lodges and requests the members of all the Lodges not to allow these sentiments of loyalty to diminish.

If the propositions of some individual Lodge had to be declined such refusal should in no way be taken amiss.

Many different propositions have been made to the Grand Lodge, no doubt dictated by the best intentions, which the Grand Lodge cannot approve of as the economical conditions of the Fatherland fortunately do not warrant such extreme measures. (Among these, for instance, is the sacrificing of wedding rings and other personal jewelry on the altar of the Fatherland.) The adoption of such measures might readily create the impression that the economical situation of the country had reached a desperate stage.

The Grand Lodge deemed the propositions made by a number of Lodges to the effect of suspending all by-laws of the Lodges during the duration of the war, to place all the financial resources of the Lodges, regardless of the effect upon the several institutions supported thereby, at the command of the government for war purposes, as well as the suspension of all payments of dues to the Lodges and the contributions of these to the Grand Lodge, worthy of consideration. All of these several propositions have, after the most serious consideration, been unanimously declined by the Board of Directors of the Grand Lodge.

These propositions have served to frighten the members of the board of directors. The acceptance of propositions of that nature would entail, not only the much feared disintegration of the order, but the complete breaking up thereof. For this reason the Grand Lodge advises the individual lodges to maintain at all costs the regular conditions within the lodges and the proper relations thereof with the Grand Lodge.

Surely none of the lodges would suspend a brother for non-payment of dues during these times, whether such a brother be actually in the field or at home and prevented by business reverses from promptly meeting his obligations. Those of the brothers, however, who are able to pay their dues should do so promptly, and particularly in these exceptional times their contributions are required in order to maintain the lodges in condition of helpfulness for the needy.

The Grand Lodge must insist upon all lodges paying their regular contributions for their entire membership to the Grand Lodge. The demands made upon the exchequer of the Grand Lodge are far in excess of the ordinary and if the contributions of the individual lodges to the Grand Lodge were to cease the Grand Lodge would find itself in the greatest difficulties.

Whenever the Eastern Prussian Lodges or those located in the western war zone have suffered severely by the economical losses of their members or by the destruction of their homesteads, the temporary suspension of the financial obligations and of the by-laws of the order will follow of its own accord.

Hence the greater obligation upon all those lodges, who have not been directly affected by the horrors of the war, to promptly meet their regular payments to the Grand Lodge.

The Grand Lodge could not see any valid reason to accept another proposition made to the effect, that during the continuation of the war its meetings should be suspended.

In the present conditions, when war and military preparations are uppermost in all thoughts, the ordinary business routine or propositions for social gatherings and festivals must give way to the united endeavor to safeguard all our powers and strength for the sole purpose to meet and conquer the enemy. The so current phrases of "Unity and Brotherly Love of the Entire World" have become idle words and a mere mockery. With the very first outbreak of hostilities all such thoughts have been blown to the winds. But is that any reason why all the work done in thirty years of earnest and disinterested labor of love should have been in vain?

Therefore it becomes the duty of the Grand Lodge not to discontinue the life and the activities of the lodges during the duration of the war, but on the contrary to so organize the activities of the lodges that they may furnish the brothers and their families comfort, consolation, edification and even recreation.

Some lodges may be prevented through legal restrictions from holding meetings for an indefinite period. Where no legal restrictions interfere all lodges should try to hold regular meetings.

The several propositions of individual lodges mentioned in the foregoing emanate from the best intentions and patriotic sentiments. Much as these sentiments may be admirable, they might become dangerous were we to be guided by sentimentality alone. The perfect man needs the influence of the better sentiments but he also requires the full strength of his will power and the application of sound logic and common sense.

In consideration of the prevailing conditions we have to forego much that we had hoped to accomplish and we do so with great regrets. At the same time we hope that this only means a postponement of our plans. We still hope that the universal brotherhood of ALL men will be realized, that through it all peoples will be united and that with its coming the purpose of our cultural endeavor will be attained.

May God support our brothers in the field and their dependents in this hour of trial. To the families of the killed and wounded we are ready to extend our hands in brotherly love and assistance. But through the less visible work in our lodges must realize our obligations so as to enable us to carry them into execution in the practical daily life. Were such lodge work to cease entirely then all our earlier labors would have been in vain. It is true that as long as the clash of the warring armies and the sound of cannons will be heard one thought, one sentiment and one call will drown all others. This thought, this sentiment, this call spell:

"WITH GOD FOR THE EMPEROR AND GERMANY."

TIMENDORFER.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

The appeals for relief from the Jews of Austria-Hungary is growing stronger and more urgent every day. Over 100,000 Jews are fighting in the Austrian army and many Jewish families are left without means of support. Entire Galicia was over-run by the Russians. In the beginning of the conflict hordes of Cossacks fell upon the border towns and villages, which are mostly inhabited by Jews, the Cossacks were joined by the Ruthenian peasants of the vicinity, who are Russophiles, and they murdered, pillaged and plundered without let or hindrance. During a few weeks about 150,000 Jewish refugees came to the Western part of Austria.

A beavy burden now rests upon the shoulders of the Jewish communities of Austria. They render aid as much as they can, but the stress of the war is demanding sacrifices which they are unable to bring. Over 200,000 Jewish refugees are at present in the city of Vienna and the Jews of the capital find it almost impossible to help them all.

Thousands of Jewish families from the cities of Kolomea, Stanislau, Stryj and other eastern and southern cities of Galicia have escaped to Hungary. Two thousand Jewish refugees are encamped on a farm near the city of Szatmar, Hungary, where the city authorities placed them as there is no room for them in the city. They are in great distress. Most of them have no shelter and old men, women and children have to sleep at night in the fields without any protection against the cold.

Many of the cities of Moravia and Bohemia are also filled with thousands of Jewish refugees from Galicia. Six thousand of them are in the city of Nikolsburg alone. All the Jewish communities of Austria-Hungary are exerting themselves to their utmost ability to care for these refugees but their means are nearly exhausted and starvation is almost at their doors.

THE NURSES OF THE GERMAN GRAND LODGE IN WAR SERVICE.

(Translated from "Report of German Grand Lodge.")

The thirty trained nurses, offered by the Grand Lodge from among its membership to the ministry of war and gratefully accepted for service by the medical department, have received instructions to report on August 16 at the Military Hospital at Kiel. In spite of the irregular and interrupted means of traffic twenty-five of these sisters, after overcoming the numerous difficulties of travel from their various stations, arrived in Berlin on Friday and found lodgings in the Sisterhood home of the Grand Lodge or with the families of some of members of the local lodges. Two additional sisters reached here on Friday night, and one more, after a tedious trip of fifty hours, arrived on Saturday. Altogether twenty-eight sisters departed for Kiel. On Friday afternoon the women's societies of Berlin lodges gave a "Kaffee" reception in the lodge gardens in honor of the visiting nurses at which all the officials of the women's societies were present.

After the return from the synagogue services on Friday evening a farewell dinner in honor of the departing nurses was served in the lodge rooms, which was attended by the Grand Master, the members of the Board of Directors, of the committee on employment and the representatives of the Berlin lodges, a large number of whom were accompanied by their wives and daughters. Bro. Metzenberg furnished the sisters some final instructions regarding their departure. Then Bro. Maretzki delivered a touching parting address to the nurses about to devote themselves to a labor of love for the Fatherland. His remarks were about as follows:

"This is the first time in the entire history of the Jews that a Jewish organization is permitted and able to offer to the Fatherland in time of dire distress the services of a corps of trained and competent nurses. The Grand Lodge is proud of the Sister Lodge, which has grown from small beginnings through continuous devotion and great sacrifices on the part of its membership. It affords the Grand Lodge great satisfaction to be in position to offer such valuable services to the Fatherland. The departing sisters should always be conscious of the great responsibilities they are to undertake. They should at all times remember that the sacred calling of the sisterhood is honored by their work and that they will confer honor upon the Grand Lodge and upon the Jews by their devotion and sacrifices to duty. For this reason our sisters must so regulate and control their actions and manners as to gain the esteem and sympathies of all, particularly when their sphere of activity bring them into non-Jewish circles and surroundings. They must be reserved in manners and unassuming in their behavior. While they must not permit themselves to be ignored they must not be forward or aggressive. They must place themselves entirely under the orders of their superiors, regardless of personal comfort, and so do their work as the needs of the service, the welfare of the sick and the necessary regulations of discipline require. The sisters now sever the pleasant relations they have established in their own circles of activity, where by dint of faithful and conscientious labor they have acquired numerous friends and generous patrons. We are fully convinced that they will make new friends in their new sphere of activity by devoted attention to duty and they will find complete satisfaction of mind in the knowledge of having done their full duty. Never look for outward expressions of gratitude. Be satisfied with your own knowledge of having done your full duty and in the consciousness that you have been called upon to alleviate pain, to heal wounds and to cheer wounded soldiers far from their own homes. Each one of you should prove a good angel to the wounded in your care. You may be assured that we, the members of the Grand Lodge, speed you on your mission with our best wishes and that we shall at all times remain your friends and be ready to furnish you our best advice and assistance. Mr. Maretzki closed his address with the wish that the sisters might forever retain a grateful remembrance of their services to the Fatherland and that he hoped and prayed for the safe return from their arduous duties after the termination of this cruel war.

On behalf of the sisterhood Sister Rosy-Mannheim replied in a few short sentences, crediting the Grand Lodge for the opportunity of plying their humanitarian vocation and of serving the Fatherland.

CARE OF THE WAR SUFFERERS BY THE BERLIN LODGES

(Translated from German Grand Lodge Reports)

The Lodge vacations had hardly begun and the greater part of the Berlin members were still visiting the European summer resorts when the preparatory steps for the Lodge work of the coming fall and winter months were already under consideration.

Fate decreed otherwise. The last days of July brought momentous events which relegated the routine work and the ordinary troublesome questions of the Lodges to the rear. It became imperative to undertake the work of the Order on entirely new lines.

Duty called in first line for the safeguarding of our holiest possessions, the protection of the Fatherland and of our homes against the dastardly invasion and desecration at the hands of unscrupulous enemies. On all sides we are surrounded by enemies; this is the keynote of the exceptional situation.

Not only they, who were called to follow the flag in defense and for the protection of the Fatherland, are charged with sacred duties for the welfare of our common country; all those who remained behind, and in first line we, the members of our Order, are charged with duties so that we may be preserved from serious dangers to our numerous and diversified activities.

We must be a UNITED PEOPLE of BROTHERS, neither danger nor suffering must be permitted to effect a separation within our ranks. All barriers and internal dissensions must fall.

We, the members of our Order, must individually and jointly assume the care and protection for all of those who are exposed to sore suffering and want through this unexpected calamity.

May the prevailing unanimity of sentiment prove a promising augury for the future.

The permanent committee of the Berlin Lodges and the Board of Directors of the Grand Lodge met in the early days of August, the storm period of the mobilization, in order to consider the measures deemed necessary for the protection and care of those of our brothers whose persons and economic conditions might be endangered and threatened by dire sorrow in consequence of the titanic strife.

In consequence of the unanimity of sentiment prevailing in our circles and of the firm resolve to meet all the legitimate demands and duties in every direction and in consideration of the unusual demands imposed upon the Order by the stress of the times, the Board of Directors of the Grand Lodge thought it advisable to call into its consultation all the Past Masters and all the acting officials of the four Berlin Lodges. This larger committee decided to submit its conclusions to a joint meeting of the four Lodges for approval.

On the 12th of August, when the vacation period usually is at its height, but when we were this year already in the midst of the preparations for a bloody war and when war rumors and war news were constantly coming from the East and the West, the members of the four Berlin Lodges met for serious and weighty deliberation and action.

The meeting was opened by the Hon. Grand President, Bro. Timendorfer, in the customary manner and he proposed as the sole object for consideration of the meeting: "The measures required for the care of all who may have to suffer through the events of the war."

In submitting the matter to the meeting Bro. Timendorfer made the following remarks:

When our Emperor spoke the weighty words: "From now on no distinction of party nor difference of religious belief can be allowed to separate the Germans into classes, but we are all German Brothers," we Jews, too, felt happy in this new declaration of emancipation. At the same time the members of this Order could not repress the sad regret that this ungodly war was bound to again delay and postpone the achievement of the principal aim of our Order which is the establishment of a Universal Brotherhood among all men on the whole earth.

As our institutions can flourish only in times of peace the disturbance is particularly injurious to the interests of our Order. The greater Humanity we try to establish is now hidden under a cloud and if we have any consolation in this hour of sore trial it is the conciousness that Germany is the innocent victim of the fearful catastrophe and that the greatest enemy of the Jews now also proves the greatest enemy of Humanity.

We did not meet here to hurl accusations nor to debate the political situation, but for the sole purpose to give our best assistance to the endangered Fatherland and we are unanimous in the consciousness that every Jew, whether soldier or noncombatant, must do his share for the protection of the Fatherland.

The Central Association and the Society of the German Jews have already urged upon the German Jews to exceed the measure of their duty in their willingness to bring sacrifice on the altar of the Fatherland.

Within the circle of our Order we may recall one of our great men, Leopold Zunz, whose name is borne by one of our Lodges, who in the midst of peace demanded that the Jews be ever and ceaselessly active for the welfare of Judaism and of its adherents.

He said to them: "If you possess knowledge apply it for the benefit of us all; if you have social influence use it for good purposes only; if you are rich employ your wealth in support of poor but deserving people or aid in the erection and endowing of schools and synagogues; if you have nothing but good intentions join all movements for the improvement of social conditions."

But Zunz does not consider all these several activities as the highest and most important duties of the Jews for he continues:

"The very highest duty you, my friends, owe to the Fatherland, this land of your birth and of your residence. When the Fatherland calls upon you, you must heed that call, regardless of the wishes of friends, of son or daughter of neighbor or co-religionist. Whatever the coming years may bring you, whether peace or war, prosperity or woe, your own welfare is depending upon the fate of your King and your country. In the hour of need of the Fatherland all personal considerations must give way and there can be no excuses when duty for the community calls you."

Now that the war has been declared we solemnly promise to follow the advice and injunction of our great Jewish teacher. The welfare of the Fatherland takes precedence over the welfare of our families, of our parents, brothers and sisters. It takes the lead over all other duties that these momentous times impose upon us.

These sentiments animated the members of the individual Lodges as well as of the Grand Lodge immediately after the outbreak of this unfortunate war. The Grand Lodge at once placed its entire staff of trained nurses, some thirty to thirty-five, at the command of the Imperial government and the Medical Director of the war department replied "that he highly appreciated the loyal services thus offered and should be glad to avail himself thereof." The corps of nurses was to be fully equipped by the 15th of August and to be placed under the command of the Naval medical department at Kiel.

The several vacation homes of our individual Lodges have also been offered to the war department for use as hospitals.

The Society for securing employment through a circular letter has urged the necessity of securing remunerative employment for the wives and grown children of the men called to arms.

From the daily papers you will have learned that the Grand Lodge has remitted the sum of Mk. 5,000 to the Red Cross Society.

No doubt many will ask: "Why so small an amount?" The answer is easily furnished by the fact that the Grand Lodge does not possess any means of its own, but is only the custodian of the contributions of the subordinate Lodges.

It is true that the Grand Lodge has control of two separate funds totalling Mk. 16,000, among them the recently organized fund for help in case of catastrophes amounting to some Mk. 8,000. It will be remembered that this fund was collected at the instigation of our Grand President and was to be used only for the special relief needed in cases of unexpected catastrophes. In soliciting these contributions the donors were given to understand that these moneys were to be spent only in case of a general catastrophe affecting Jews alone. We are convinced that the German Jews could not be exposed to any catastrophe greater than the present war and hence it might not be out of place nor be unjust to the spirit of the donors of the fund to now employ it to meet the extraordinary demand. The Grand Lodge did not desire to entrench upon this special fund at this time for fear that through a longer duration of the war there may be larger demands of a general nature and for the further reason that it seemed but prudent to retain a reasonable sum in order to assist the individual Lodges in such cases where their own means will not suffice to help the families whose only breadwinner had to join the army. In all such events the subordinate Lodges will no doubt appeal to the Grand Lodge for assistance, which will be cheerfully granted to the extent of the means at command.

This now brings me to the desire of the Grand Lodge to recommend to the subordinate Lodges to be guided in all their decisions by their loyal sentiments and not to be over careful in voting means for general purposes, at the same time never to lose sight of the future when sacred obligations will confront all the Lodges in the care of the families and education of the children of such brothers as had to sacrifice their lives for the Fatherland. We do not give up thereby our main principle: "Our work is not for us alone but for the entire community."

The members of the Grand Lodge are fully convinced, that through these measures the true purposes for the benefit of the entire Fatherland shall be accomplished. We strengthen the Fatherland by providing for the families of those members who are doing military duty, and by so doing place them above want and beyond the need of applying to the public institutions. We surely are doing patriotic and loyal work by furnishing our brothers in the field the assurance that their parents, their wives and children at home are being looked after by loving brothers who will not desert them in their distress. Bro. Maretzki will acquaint you with the resolutions which have been adopted by the special aid committee in the general interest of all the Berlin Lodges, and which resolutions have the full endorsement of the board of the Grand Lodge. These resolutions are to be approved by the several Lodges. I have no doubt that every member will be proud to vote for the adoption of the resolutions and will find great satisfaction in the high aim of the four Berlin Lodges, who intend to exceed the measure of their obligations and duties. It is the wish of the general committee and I herewith join my personal request, that the motions to be made by Bro. Maretzki on behalf of the general committee, and in order to again confirm our loyal sentiments for the Fatherland, these resolutions be unanimously adopted by a rising vote and without any prior debate. The aid committee, consisting of a large number of brothers, will cheerfully consider all special requests in its deliberations.

The aid committee will also give due consideration to any doubts or fears our members might express. I, for one, should not like to see the regular meetings of the Lodges suspended for any longer period.

At the same time I beg to call your attention to the fact, that mere theoretic enthusiasm will not accomplish our purposes. The necessary means will have to be placed at the disposal of the aid committee.

I am fully convinced, that, unless compelled by dire distress, not a single member of the four Berlin Lodges will refuse to pay his Lodge dues and I now appeal to you: "OPEN YOUR HEARTS and YOUR POCKETBOOKS."

With this appeal to the generosity of my dear Berlin Brothers I beg to now close my remarks. At the same time I desire to express my own and the Grand Lodge's sincere thanks and appreciation to the Brothers of the general committee for the work they already have accomplished and to also express the hope that their work will prove a blessing to the Fatherland and for our Order. I also desire to express my sincerest wish, which all of you share with me, that our deeply beloved German Fatherland may come out of this war as the victor and that the largest number possible of our brothers and relatives, who are fighting the holy battle for the Fatherland, may return safely to their families. May this disastrous war soon come to an end so that for the interrupted peaceful work of our Order we may again resume to carry our banner of:

"Forward and upward for a greater and better humanity."

Bro. Maretzki was then given the floor and he addressed the meeting as follows:

Brethren: Many times have I spoken to you, my dear Brothers, from this floor about the ideals of this order and the influences it should exert upon our lives. Today our idealism centers in the welfare of the Fatherland that has been overwhelmed by a dire catastrophe over night. Powerful nations have involved our Fatherland in a disastrous war; they plan the anihilation of the German nation and of its cultural development. I have been called upon to address you frequently on sorrowful occasions when we had met to mourn the loss of some dearly beloved brother. On none of such occasions was I so deeply affected as I am at this moment, when I am called upon to address you in the deepest and sincerest emotion of my sentiments. Dark days are before us. All of us are swayed by the same patriotic ardor and aroused to indignation by the treachery inflicted upon the Fatherland by the unscrupulous enemies and our love of the Fatherland finds its highest expression in the unanimity of all its citizens. In this darkest hour we feel in our inmost heart, that we are called upon to defend our most precious possessions, the Fatherland, wife and children, honor and home. We know that all of us, each one according to his ability, are to sacrifice life and possessions for the honor and greatness of our dear Fatherland. We, the sons of the Covenant, devoted with our entire soul and our full strength to the Fatherland, are strengthened by the lofty sentiment that we all stand together and united to battle and to vanquish, to die if necessary, for Germany and the Emperor. Our brothers and our sons cheerfully, full of courage and trusting into the justness of our cause, obey the call of our peace loving Emperor and join the ranks to follow his lead in this holy war. We, who remain behind, have to assume the duties of assuaging the horrors and sufferings of the innocent victims. Remembering the ties that bind us to our brothers we must take care of the families of those brothers who have been called to perform military duty. These brothers have the right to look to us for such assistance and it is our unavoidable duty and privilege to grant such assistance to the full extent of our means. No sacrifice can be too great; we cheerfully assume the heavy burden placed upon our shoulders; we shall take care of the families of our fighting brothers. For this purpose we propose to appoint a special aid committee, supply it with ample means and grant it the most complete autonomy of action. All differences of the individual Lodges are to cease and all the brothers of the Berlin Lodges are to participate in furnishing aid and assistance.

In this manner we hope to assure our brothers now in the ranks that their families will be cared for in a brotherly spirit and not allowed to suffer want.

The committee for the joint interests of the Berlin Lodges has authorized me to submit the following propositions for your consideration and to urge you to give them your unanimous consent:

1. The Berlin Lodges are to appoint a special aid committee to assist and help to the utmost extent all the families of members of the Order needing assistance through the events of the war.
2. For the purposes before stated we place at the command of that committee the sum of Mk. 100,000.
3. The Lodges will, at their own expense, refurnish the building used by them as a meeting house with 120 beds to be offered to the government for use either as a military hospital or as a home for convalescent soldiers.

The duties of the aid committee are manifold and include the instituting of a training school for nurses to serve with the army or in the hospitals; care and feeding of the families whose only support is serving in the army; the general care of all needy persons (regardless of religious affiliations); a free employment bureau in connection with our present organization for that purpose; the care and protection of the family of any member of any Lodge requiring assistance; the active participation in any of the war aid undertakings of the Jewish congregation of Berlin; finally also, the ascertaining of the number of our members in active service in the armies and what proportion of the entire number of soldiers they furnish.

The aid committee also participates in the activities of the National general aid societies by means of cash contributions. Therefore we call upon the often proved liberality of our entire brotherhood and request each and every one of them to aid us in meeting the extraordinary demands now made upon us by cheerfully contributing to the fullest extent of his means and ability to the VOLUNTARY COLLECTION FUND OF OUR LODGES.

The Jewish soldiers Rosenstein, Okuneff and Lipovsky and the Jewish military surgeon Lurie have obtained the order of St. George for bravery on the Galician battlefield.

The Russo-Jewish soldier Paradiztal of Lodz Russia, has been awarded the Order of St George for bravery.

A Russian newspaper describes the wonderful heroism displayed by a Jewish musician who extricated many wounded from danger in the battle with the Germans.

In the battle of Nowosielitza, Lieut. Dr. David Hescheles of Lemberg was seriously wounded and subsequently died.

There is now a considerable number of Jews distinguished by the Czar with the order of St. George for bravery on the battlefield. In adition to one Paradiztal of Lodz there is Peruskow of Duvinsk, Elija Levin and a real hero named Katz, who received the order on three previous occasions, in the Boxer and Russo-Japanese campaigns.

The Jewish Chronicle of London, England, is publishing a growing list of Jews serving with the army, which is an indication of the military ardor of English Jewry in the existing crisis.

Sergeant Major J. H. Levy of the Scotts Guards was promoted to the rank of lieutenant in the Gordon Highlanders.

Among the very last to leave Antwerp prior to the entry of the Germans was Quartermaster-Sergeant Chas. Isaac Thompson of Manchester, England.

Jos. Trumpelman, a Jewish corporal in one of the Russian southern regiments, has gained the high distinction of being mentioned in the general order of the commander for his exemplary bravery and was rewarded with the order of St. George and the rank of sergeant.

The Jewish soldier Aberzgaus also obtained the order of St. George and another soldier Ziprinsky was recommended for a high reward for remaining at his post though he was wounded.

Israel Kroshkin of Moscow, age 16, was brought in a wounded state from the theater of war where he fought with distinction.

Mr. M. Mazur, a Jewish telegraphist serving in the Russian army, who had invented an improved field telegraph, lost his life in the performance of his duty.

The Jewish lawyer Frenkel of Kiev, a lieutenant of the Reserve, was killed in a battle in which he distinguished himself for bravery.

The Canadian Jews are well represented in the First Canadian contingent. Included in it are over 300 Jews from all parts of the Dominion.

A member of the Rothschild family in Vienna has been acting as a staff officer with the Austrian army at Krasnik, Russia.

Lieutenant Strauss, son of an American of Belgian origin, was promoted to a commissioned officer for his heroism in the war.

Among the names of officers and men mentioned in the recent dispatches of Field Marshall Sir John French "brought forward for special mention by army corps commanders and heads of departments for services rendered" are the following: Major H. S. Seligman and Sergeant M. J. Marks.

Purishkewitz, the anti-Jewish leader in the Duma, the most violent hater of Jews in Russia, visited the military hospital in Petrograd. Several Jewish wounded were pointed out to him and he embraced and kissed one after another expressing regret at his past actions.

The list of Jewish officers appointed and promoted in the British Army is remarkable for number, and for the fact that they show that practically all the sons of the well-to-do Jews of London have enlisted for the war.

A Jewish widow, Frau C. Feibusch of Rogasen, is represented by eight sons in the army and her only daughter is at the front with the Red Cross staff. The Widow Jakobus of Zempelburg is represented at the front by her eight sons and one son-in-law. And Frau Baum of Posen has ten married sons in the army.

From French dispatches which have come to hand, the names of the following Jewish generals figure in the news of the day in the French army: Lambert, See, Alsares, Abraham, Fribourg, Nuquet-Loroche and Bloch. A French Jew sits in the National Council of Defense, the chief military commission of the Republic.

Among the three English officers who recently attacked the Zeppelin shed at Dusseldorf, was Lieut. Marix—a Jewish officer of the Royal Flying Corps—who himself threw the bomb which effected the greatest damage.

REPORTS FROM RUSSIA.

The Russian papers state that General Rennenkamp sent a telegram from the battlefield to the Rabbi of Minsk, in which he congratulated him upon the heroic deeds of the Jewish soldiers of Minsk. General Rennenkamp asked for the highest Russian bravery medal, the decoration of the Order of St. George, for one of these soldiers.

A short time before the outbreak of the war the General had seen fit to forbid the officers of the military district of Wilna responding to the salutations of Jewish acquaintances on the street. The people in Wilna are now anxious to know whether after sending such a telegram to the Rabbi of Minsk, the General will recall his Wilna order. So far nothing has been heard about it. The "beloved Jews" are familiar with such cases.

According to reliable information bloody pogroms are now raging in Bessarabia. The fate of the persecuted Jews is especially tragic because through the fault of England they have lost their only moral support and satisfaction, namely, the appeal to public opinion in Europe as well as in America. It was England that hastened before the present war to spread the report that the Russian Government is earnestly and honestly willing to introduce a new liberal policy in the Jewish question. In this way England covered Russia with her own liberal shield. This fact belongs to the most ignominous part of the latest English history. The guilt of the blood of the Russian Jews which is now again being spilled by Russia falls upon the present government of England. The agitation against the Jews is continued by the reactionary press of Russia. The organ of the war ministry, the "Russian Invalid," never ceases to publish anti-Semitic, inticing articles, in which it is supported by the "Novoye Vremya." The report is spread in the army that the partial defeat of the Russians at Tannenberg was due to the treachery of some Jewish soldiers, who showed the way to the enemy by the waving of pocket handkerchiefs. The War Ministry and the General Staff are flooded with false information against the Jews. The "Novoye Vremya" tells the fabulous tale that at a Jewish funeral in Warsaw the coffin was examined by the authorities and was found to contain twenty-five million roubles in gold, which the Jews kept for the invading Germans.

Asquith, the ministerial President of England, has recently assured a deputation of English and American Jews that the Russian Government is now greatly extending the rights of the Jews. That this statement by Mr. Asquith is not in accord with the facts is proven by the following information which we received from a reliable source: A few days ago the "Ruskoye Vyedomosty," a paper published in Russia, had to pay a fine of 3,000 roubles for printing an article by Prince Trubetzkoy, in which the author recommended equal rights for the Jews. In order to hide the real tendency of the government the paper was forced to suppress the true reason for the fine and to state that the fine was imposed because of the publication of a harmless notice of a workingmen's meeting. While the oppressions and persecutions of the Jews are being continued just as they were before the war, the Russian Government compels its Jewish subjects in a revolting manner to furnish more soldiers to the army than it requires of the non-Jewish population. Even in normal times twenty per cent more Jews than non-Jews are drafted for military service. More than 300,000 Russian Jews are today under arms, who must pour out their blood in streams for their torturers and persecutors. The Russian executioners are not yet satisfied with that. An edict of the Czar, issued recently, orders that during the present year Jews should be taken for military service in a much greater proportion than before. There are a number of persons in Russia who are legally exempt from military duty even in times of war. Among these are some Jews. A notice of the ministry reads that this prerogative is only for non-Jews, but Jews must enlist even if they are legally exempt. While on one side laws are abrogated in order to give more Jews the chance to be shot to death for the Czar, the same government has on the other side repeatedly explained that it cannot abolish existing laws, when Jewish students petitioned for admission to the high schools in excess of the number regularly admitted, because under the war conditions they are not admitted in foreign universities. It is plainly evident that the powers of the triple entente are trying to awaken sympathy for their cause by obvious lies.

SUFFERINGS OF THE GALICIAN JEWS.

The "Pester Lloyd" recently published a heart-rending description of the sufferings of the Jews of East Galicia which was furnished to that paper by Dr. Steinhaus, a member of the Austrian Parliament. Dr. Steinhaus, who represents the East Galician district of Rawaruska, was there at the time of the Russian invasion, and he himself was a victim of the atrocities committed by the savage Cossacks. He witnessed the flight of the masses of the population and observed the terrible distress of hundreds of thousands of poor Jews, who lost their homes and all their other possessions.

Dr. Steinhaus gives the following account of the horrible sufferings of the Jews of East Galicia:

"Times of bitter misery have arrived for the pity-deserving population of East Galicia, which consists mainly of Jews. In the cities and villages the Jews mostly occupied themselves with commerce or with the cultivation of rented farms. Their possessions consisted of a wretched store or the little crop of the leased farm. These scanty fruits of their industry have now vanished completely. Pounded to dust, pillaged and in heaps of ashes are their possessions in the cities and villages. The flight of the many Jewish families commenced when the Cossack hordes passed over the border near Brody, for the Czar's Cossacks turned their special brutality upon the Jews. At the same time when the Czar issued his proclamation to his 'beloved Jews,' in which he addressed them in sweet and flattering terms, his Cossacks passed with flaming torches through the Jewish villages and set fire to everything. They went from city to city, from village to village, and whatever belonged to the Jews was turned into a heap of ashes. Entire Galicia has been devastated by fire. In their paroxysm of destruction the Russians even burned the grain on the fields held in lease by the Jews, which on account of the climate was not yet threshed. Fortunately, the Jews of East Galicia were able to save their lives. Had they not fled in time the world would have heard of the most fearful pogrom which was ever arranged with the assistance of Russian officials.

"Having been informed in time of the acts of Russian vandalism the Jewish population at least succeeded in saving their lives. But can the way in which these poor people are forced to exist still be called life? Panic-struck as they were, the Jews left everything behind and took along only what thev had upon their bodies. They were pursued by the enemy, and woe betide those who fell into its hands. It was a picture of the most shocking misery when these families, which are blessed with many children, left their possessions behind, the little house, the little store, which they acquired by great hardships, to wander away as refugees, to face an unknown fate and to find positive misery. So it happened in every place, when everybody had to run for his life.

"About half a million people must have become homeless beggars through this Russian invasion. The smallest number of these retained enough means sufficient to support them over the next day, to say nothing of buying a ticket for transportation. They fled in the free trains which stood ready. What will become of these unfortunates who lost everything on account of the war? A great many of the refugees went to Moravia, where Prince Dietrichstein magnanimously took care of them. He had barracks constructed for them, and aided them in every way. But it is impossible for Moravia alone to support a half a million refugees. The entire Austrian monarchy must help them. Next to the wounded soldiers, these poor people are the most helpless and most to be pitied victims of the war. They are even more helpless than the wounded, for no Red Cross Society or state institution extends help to them, and yet they are suffering for their country just as much as our soldiers on the battlefield. The wounds which they have received from the loss of their general possessions, by the torture of their bodies and the anguish of their souls, were inflicted by the war.

"The Hungarian Government deserves full recognition for the readiness with which it offered to take care of all the Jewish refugees who fled to Hungary. But in Hungary there is only a very small fraction of these refugees, as the greater part of those who fled before the Russian invasion turned westward."

The Executive Committee of the Order has forwarded the following sums out of the funds collected for the aid of the war sufferers for temporary relief.

50,000 Kronen to the Grand Lodge of Austria in aid of the Galician refugees.

40,000 Marks to the Grand Lodge of Germany in aid of the Jewish war sufferers.

2,000 Kronen to Danmark Lodge of Copenhagen in aid of Russian refugees.

5,000 Kronen to London Lodge of London in aid of refugees.

The Executive Committee has made banking arrangements whereby it is enabled to forward money either by mail or cable to all the countries at war except Turkey for the present. The Bank assumes full responsibility for the payment of such transmitted money and if the payee fails to receive the money the Bank will refund the amount at the same rate of exchange at which it is purchased. It is suggested that in view of the fact that many of the men are away from home that moneys be ordered sent to some female member of the family.

The Executive Committee will be glad to be of service to those who desire money forwarded to relatives in any of the countries as stated above. All money orders to be forwarded should be made payable either to Mr. Adolf Kraus, or the National Bank of the Republic, Chicago.

NOW OR NEVER.

The struggle of the titans after so many months is showing no signs of abatement and the hope of a speedy end is nowhere in sight. In the opinion of experts, it has only just begun. Millions are confronting millions; positions are gained and just as quickly lost; villages are occupied and evacuated; thousands of the soldiery hither and thither are killed in the prime of life or carried off maimed to the nearest hospital. Overwhelming as the tragedy enacted in camp and trench and beleaguered fortress undoubtedly is, the terrible sufferings of non-combatants are simply staggering. The sacrifices of men and means for the defense of one's own hearth and native land are resolutely demanded and cheerfully yielded; then come the invaders and in their wake stalks death and devastation. War of course is war, and this time it is war to a finish. We cannot hope for a surcease of bloodshed and ruin until the one side or the other has exhausted its fighting means and morale, and that is a long time off yet.

The cry of the harassed citizenry of the war-infected zones has reached us on this side of the ocean. The effects of the war are felt here, to be sure. Fortunes are lost, incomes reduced, and the purchasing power of hard earned wages is lessened. The pinch is causing a tightness of the purse-strings and those who from charitable institutions depend for their revenue are curtailing their expenses. If the well-to-do are resigning their membership in the clubs, they are also beginning to withdraw their support from hospitals and orphanages. It may be that the stringency will be only temporary. It would be a dire calamity if with the advent of the winter our charitable organizations would be obliged to operate with a diminished budget. It would be fatal if we remember that we have to face the duty of stretching out a helping hand to our brethren in Europe whose misery is enormous, engulfing the poor and the better situated classes alike.

That the Jews in America have a duty to perform in the present emergency in comparison with which all the noble assistance previously rendered to the victims of Muscovite pogroms or of the Balkan turmoil fades into insignificance, has been clear to all of us and has been given expression to on this page. What was foreshadowed at an early date has reached an acute stage. The moment has arrived when American Jewry must organize a stupendous movement for relief. The initial stages of such a movement have actually been set agoing by the B'nai B'rith. The American nation of which we Jews are a part has always been generous. American sympathies are readily aroused by a cry be it ever so distant. In times of calamity the whole world is akin. American Jews are doubly generous. They willingly share in the common national burden, but they also assume in obedience to a well-established tradition the task of caring for their own.

The immediate task, not an easy one by any manner of means, is to gather a substantial relief fund; the next will be to wisely distribute it. The proper distribution can well be entrusted to the European Grand Lodges and sister lodges. Where temporary relief is most needed it must get there swiftly. Twice gives he who gives speedily. But there is no foretelling what may be required to be done as the war draws on and much more yet when the war is over and done with.

But the weightiest task awaiting us is an alert watchfulness when the time comes for an adjustment of the boundaries of European states and their immediate or indirect dependencies. The fate of small nations at present hangs in the balance. We Jews favor the principle ingrained in us by religion and tradition that the weaker nations have a right to their independent existence properly safeguarded. But the fate of the Jewish people is our nearest concern. It is not too early to organize the machinery for securing political emancipation to our brethren wheresoever despotic governments have stubbornly refused to grant it. The abolition of the Russian Pale and the removal of civic disabilities in Russia and Roumania should be urged by those who will settle the peace terms. Turkey should open its door to the Jewish immigrant and aliens should receive the right to acquire property. Our Order has taken initial steps in these directions. To effect these many objects we must call into play the highest, wisest, and most disinterested statesmanship of which we may be capable. The times will be singularly opportune. It is either now or never. By concerted action we may succeed. We invite the co-operation of all organizations favoring human rights and justice.

A JEWISH ACADEMY.

That at the present juncture an older proposal suggested by the prince among Jewish historians and scholars, the late Professor Graetz, should be renewed, is natural enough. The suggestion has come from London and has been seconded by New York that the time is opportune for the creation of a Jewish Academy of scholars whose seat shall be in neutral America. The compliment to this country is certainly flattering. It betokens not merely the wisdom borne of the knowledge that ours is the land which among the neutrals of the world is the most powerful and most respected. For it means in addition that respect is had to our great resources. An institution like the one planned needs a substantial endowment. It is rightly assumed that we have among us men blessed with the world's goods and with a disposition to be generous, public-spirited. It furthermore works upon the observation that we have the scholars from whom such a body would be recruited.

Yes, we have the men, the givers and the workers. It would be invidious to ascertain at this moment when Jewish scholarship began in this country. The modest among us would point to the achievements of a galaxy of scholars who in the past century single-handed and unorganized carried on investigations and enriched Jewish science and Jewish literature by Momentous and monumental works of recognized stamp and value. It is needless to recall the small beginnings, difficult though they were of execution in the pioneer days. It may suffice to call attention to the fact that of two great Talmudic dictionaries one was completed in New York and the other from beginning to end written in Philadelphia. The soil was amply and richly prepared when with the advent of the large masses in the eighties a hinterland was created without the moral support of which Jewish literature could not flourish. We have now in this country, in the East and in the West in strictly Jewish institutions of learning and in the Universities, a body of Jewish scholars, young and old, who are doing notable work, some quietly and unobtrusively, on their own initiative and from the purest motives of advancing human knowledge, others who are more fortunately situated work in the limelight of the public stage, backed by powerful institutions and admiring Maecenases. Yes, we have the men, but have we also the means?

An Academy like the one planned is naturally in need of scholars. It must have a rich endowment to make the gathering of material and the publication possible. But above all it requires an equipment. Scholars cannot work without books. We have good libraries here, and the collection in the New York seminary is rich, singularly rich. Printed books we have, though by no means all. Only a few years ago the Jewish scholar who makes the Bible his specialty found himself handicapped. The New York institution only lately acquired a substantial nucleus in its biblical department. Cincinnati has now a well selected collection. Younger institutions are slowly and patiently building up their libraries. But have we at the present moment Europe's collections of manuscripts? Can we for instance hope in this country to set about producing a new edition of the Hebrew Bible when England and Italy own the richest collections of biblical manuscripts?

Moreover, it is not a question only of manuscripts and old editions. What we lack in this country is a Jewish tradition, a tradition that fosters scholarship and honors the scholar. It is still a mooted question whether the native born can be educated to become a Jewish scholar. At all events for the Jewish scholar to do his work effectively there must be the large mass of the people educated along Jewish lines. We are at the very beginnings of organized Jewish educations. We have great hopes for the future. But the conditions at present are not such as to make for the highest scholarship which means creative effort, original work.

Our scholars have for the most part been imported from Europe. They have come from homes in which Jewish traditions were a living factor. In a spirit of overweening conceit we may say that we are independent of Europe There is a feeling which is manifesting itself in the country at large that the time is opportune for America to profit by the European war. Hardheaded business men are clamoring for an American merchant marine. It is believed that now is the time for cornering the market in South America. It is forgotten that we cannot turn overnight into manufacturers of goods for which the raw material is not available here. The same admonition must be administered to the well-meaning scholars of this country who in these troublous times of European distress would corner the scientific market. For the same question must be asked: Have we the raw material for scientific production? And the answer must be: We have not. Not as yet, not just now.

That America will become in time the home of Jewish scholarship cannot be gainsaid. Indeed, it must become the home of Jewish scholarship so soon as it becomes the home of the largest aggregate of Jews. The increase in the Jewish population whether from within or without will necessarily bring about a condition which will be favorable to the rise of Jewish productivity along scholarly lines. But let us not be open to the accusation that we are striving to make capital out of Europe's misfortune. The masters are still there, are bound to be there, so long as Europe may boast of matchless libraries which we hope may escape the ravages of the war, so long as European Jews keep up their traditions, so long as the scholar abroad is venerated. We are after all the disciples of those masters, the mighty cedars of the Lebanon, the princes of the Torah. Their mantles have not yet fallen upon our shoulders. It will be time enough when we have built a strong foundation by organizing Jewish education in the masses. The highest scholarship can only thrive when rooted in the people. That day is sure to come; until it comes let us wait. Until then we can work singly and quietly, each in his own study, without the fanfares of publicity, without the glamor of an Academy.

MAZEL TOV.

On Wednesday, October 28th, Brother Hon. Simon Wolf, of Washington, celebrated his seventy-eighth birthday. The B'nai B'rith News sends its fraternal greetings to this venerable brother and tenders its heartiest "mazel tov" to this champion of the Jewish cause, this loyal worker for the recognition of the B'nai B'rith ideals, and the distinguished leader of American Israel. The longer a true, wise and noble leader of man lives the greater bcomes the value of his life as a shining example to the young generation. We therefore pray and hope that Brother Wolf may live ad meah v'esrim shanah, to one hundred and twenty years, the age of Moshe Rabbainov, our great teacher Moses.

THE GOLDEN WEDDING CELEBRATION OF A LOYAL BEN B'RITH.

Surrounded by their many loving children, their numerous other relatives and a host of friends and admirers, Brother Solomon Marx and his dear wife, of New Orleans, La., celebrated their golden wedding on the 26th of last month. The great profusion of flowers, the hundreds of congratulatory letters and telegrams which reached the honored couple from all parts of the country, coming as they did from the highest public officials, the presidents of many Jewish congregations, the leaders of societies and the most prominent business houses, speak for themselves. They fully testify to a life of service which was devoted to the best and noblest causes. Old age holds the mirror of the deeds of younger days, and blessed is the man whose advanced years reflect such high achievements as were accomplished by our brother during his long and useful life. As he was always a blessing as a man and a Jew, so he was as a Ben B'rith, and the B'nai B'rith News takes special pleasure in extending the heartiest felicitations to this loyal brother and his noble helpmate. Strength and power to them for many, many more years!

LEO M. FRANK DENIED NEW TRIAL BY THE SUPREME COURT OF GEORGIA.

Leo. M. Frank, under sentence of death for the murder in April, 1913, at Atlanta, of Mary Phagan, an employe of the factory of which he was superintendent, was on Oct. 14th denied a new trial by the Supreme Court of Georgia. The decision, which was concurred in by all members of the Supreme Court, says in part:

"An extraordinary motion for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence is addressed to the sound discretion of the trial Judge, and a refusal to grant it will not be reversed unless such discretion is abused. On the hearing of such a motion the court may hear affidavits making a counter showing on behalf of the State, so as to go to the bottom of the showing and discover, if possible, how much of real substance and merit there is in the alleged new evidence.

"We deem it unnecessary to take up each of the grounds offered by the defense, and of the counter showing made by the State. It is enough to say that after a consideration of them it cannot be held that the discretion of the presiding Judge in refusing to grant the extraordinary motion was abused or that a case is made requiring a reversal."

The court failed to find in the records as newly established any evidence that might not by due diligence have been set forth at the original trial, and it held that it would be improper to order a new trial except upon evidence that could not have been exhibited at the first trial.

The court held that it would be improper to go behind a completed proceeding unless it appeared that such action would reverse the previous findings strictly on new evidence.

The extraordinary motion for a new trial alleged numerous grounds, principal of which was the contention that Dr. H. F. Harris, State Medical Expert, had declared that hair found on the turning lathe in the pencil factory differed from the hair taken from the head of Mary Phagan after her death. Other new evidence included an affidavit by the Rev. J. E. Ragsdale, who alleged that he overheard a negro confess to the murder of Mary Phagan, which was later repudiated by Mr. Ragsdale; the alleged confession obtained from James Conley in the Fulton County jail by a negress named Annie Maud Carter, and numerous affidavits in which State's witnesses were purported to repudiate evidence given by them at Frank's original trial, most of which affidavits were later recanted by their makers.

This was Frank's fifth attempt to obtain a retrial or an annullment of the verdict, which was returned on Aug. 25, 1913.

The motion to set aside the verdict on the ground that Frank was not in the courtroom when the verdict was rendered, which was denied by Judge Hill, has been appealed to the State Supreme Court. Should the State Supreme Court refuse to set aside the verdict Frank's lawyers can appeal to the United States Supreme Court, it is said, as a constitutional point is involved.

AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE.

Under the auspices of the American Jewish Committee a meeting was held at Temple Emanuel, New York, on the afternoon of Oct. 25, 1914, for the purpose of raising a fund for the relief of Jews in the war zone of Europe. Mr. Louis Marshall presided.

The opinion prevailed that at least $10,000,000 was needed. Mr. F. M. Warburg was chosen treasurer, and a committee composed of Judge Julian W. Mack of Chicago, L. D. Brandeis of Boston and O. S. Strauss, Meyer London and Harry Fishell of New York was appointed to select a committee of 100 or more to do the active work of raising the money. Each national Jewish organization will be requested to appoint a representative on this committee.

OBJECTIONABLE MOTION PICTURE FILMS.

The Anti-Defamation League has recently condemned the following three motion picture films:

(1) "Rose of the Alley," a "Balboa" film, circulated by the Box Office Attractions Company.

(2) A "Kay-Bee" two-reel film, entitled "In the Clutches of the Gangsters," distributed by the "Mutual" circuit, released November 6th.

(3) "The Fatal Wedding," an "L-KO" film, circulated by the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, released November 8th.

LEO N. LEVI MEMORIAL HOSPITAL.

The Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital of Hot Springs, Ark., will open its doors for the reception of patients on Sunday, Nov. 1, 1914. The hospital is completely furnished and equipped and its activities will, no doubt, reflect credit upon the Order.

This institution is strictly a B'nai B'rith institution, having been founded, built and will be maintained by the Order for the treatment of the poor who are afflicted with rheumatism and blood diseases.

The hospital was erected at a cost of $90,000 and is provided with a modern bath house, which is supplied with curative waters from the United States government reservation. It has a capacity of 60 beds and will be an institution for the poor and needy. Applications for admission may be made through any of the B'nai B'rith lodges and charity organizations upon application blanks which can be obtained from the secretary of the hospital, Rabbi A. B. Rhine, Hot Springs, Ark.

MEMORIAL SERVICE IN HONOR OF THE LATE BERNHARD KLEIN.

Simple but impressive memorial services in honor of Bernhard Klein, charter member of Abraham Lodge No. 89, I. O. B. B. and life trustee of Congregation B'nai Israel of Bridgeport, Conn., were held under the auspices of the lodge and congregation at the Park Avenue Temple on Sunday evening, Oct. 18, 1914. The occasion attracted an attendance that taxed the seating capacity of the Temple.

The program of exercises consisted of the singing of hymns, scriptural reading, presentation of resolutions by the congregation and by the lodge and addresses by Hon. Alfred B. Beers and Dr. David Levy, and was concluded with the reciting of the Kaddish.

Judge Beers dwelt in his remarks upon the personal characteristics of the deceased, emphasizing his love for the home and his loved ones, of his qualities as a citizen working for the betterment of the community, and of his work and the support he rendered to all things tending toward civic and moral uplift.

Dr. Levy in describing Mr. Klein's personal traits cited his power for good in the Temple, his kindly advice and his charitable nature.

Among those attending the services were many men in public life. At the cemetery a representative attendance was present when the memorial chapel presented by Brothers Jacob B. Klein, former First Vice-President of the Executive Committee of the Order and Past President of District Grand Lodge No. 1, and Milton M. Klein of New York, in memory of their parents was dedicated. The services were simple in nature.

EXPLANATION BY THE ANTI-SEMITIC "STAATSBUERGERZEITUNG" OF BERLIN.

The Berlin "Staatsbuergerzeitung" recently published the following explanation at the head of the paper:

"In consequence of the interference by the head commandery of the district the Staatsbuergerzeitung explains that taking into consideration the patriotic position assumed by the entire population this paper from now on abandons its anti-Semitic character and not only during the war but also during the time of peace."

The interference by the head commandery can be explained by the fact that the German military officers find in anti-Semitism a danger for the unity of the German people. They consider it the more necessary to suppress it in all its phases in the army and among the people because even the Staatsbuergerzeitung is forced to acknowledge the "patriotic attitude of the entire population."

MRS. AUGUSTA SCHWARZ.

On Monday, Oct. 19, 1914, Mrs. Augusta Schwarz, a well-beloved and highly esteemed lady, died in Mobile, Ala. She is survived by ten children, seven sons and three daughters, and among the sons is Captain Leon Schwarz, Past President of District Grand Lodge No. 7, a loyal and ardent worker in the Order.

The B'nai B'rith News extends to the children and especially to Brother Leon Schwarz its sympathy in this bereavement and expresses the hope that the memory of this good woman, a representative of the truest type of the "Mother in Israel," will remain green.

JEWISH RECRUITS REFUSED

Ill Feeling Alleged---Regrettable Incident at Hackney

The Jewish Chronicle of London, England, in reporting the incident states as follows:

At a time like the present, when Jews. with great patriotic ardour, are flocking in their thousands to the colors, it might have been expected that the fine spirit thus shown would elicit a cordial recognition from fellow-soldiers, and that in England there would be the same goodwill resulting from comradeship-in-arms that is found today even in the armies of the Tsar.

It is painful, however, to have to say that this is not always the case, and that at the recruiting station at the corner of Devonshire Road, Hackney, a state of things arose recently which was, to put it mildly, extremely discreditable to those who were responsible. At this station recruits are being raised for the Reserve Battalion, 10th Territorials, and a number of Jews who presented themselves have been refused. The reason for this extraordinary action has been explained to a representative of the "Jewish Chronicle" by the Recruiting Officer.

"We are entitled," he said, "to refuse a man, without reason given, if in our opinion that man is not a fit and proper person, though he cannot be rejected on the ground of religion. In the present instance, however, we were not actuated by religious motives. What happened was that we found a great deal of very strongly developed prejudice among a certain section—not the best—against the Jewish recruits. Generally they gave the Jews a rough handling in any possible way. They called them names, hustled them, distorted their foreign names, and made things generally offensive. We therefore thought it best, in the interests of the Jews themselves, to refuse them.

"Since then, however, a good many thoroughly patriotic Jews were so anxious to enlist that, without any declaration of religion, they were recruited. When their religion became known, they were allowed to remain because they were numerous enough to protect themselves; and now the embargo has been entirely removed, and Jews are accepted unconditionally. What we intend doing is to form them into a special platoon of their own (a platoon is half a company—60 men). Already we have about thirty, but the strength of the battalion is not yet half completed."

"Have you been influenced in your subsequent action by any communcation from headquarters?"

"I have had none."

Has the Colonel (Col. Cobbett) had any?

"I could not say. Personally, I have no sympathy with these manifestations. Nor is there any on the part of the officer commanding the regiment. I myself have seen active service, and I know there is no better soldier in the world than the Jew. The Jews we have in our regiment are doing well. But there is one little difficulty that we have. Jewish boys under age, but remarkably well developed, will come and mis-state their age and be accepted. Then the parents come and complain, and we have to turn the boys out. We had three cases yesterday, two lads of 16 and one of 15. All passed as 19 or 20."

That does, at any rate, show patriotic zeal?

"I admit that, and I explained to their relatives that they should facilitate matters and let them go."

Perhaps the most unpleasant thing that the recruiting officer had to say was that even in the old 10th Battalion, and before the war, there was so much prejudice that the recruiting of Jews was stopped. "It is extraordinary," the official added, "because the battalion is recruited in a Jewish district."

We publish the following editorial comment of the Chronicle on this subject matter:

Discouraging Jewish Recruits.

"The temporary refusal to accept Jewish Territorial recruits at Hackney in order to protect them from the intolerance of Christian comrades is a jarring note in the happy harmony that has prevailed in the country. We are quite ready to agree that the men who have shown this intolerance are not the best or most intelligent section of the regiment in question—only a very foolish or ignorant person could offer so chilling a welcome to a comrade making the patriotic sacrifice which is demanded of him from every street hoarding. But it is difficult to overlook the fact mentioned by the recruiting officer to a representative of the "Jewish Chronicle" that a similar prejudice existed in the old battalion before the war and led to the stoppage of the recruiting of Jews. We are not inclined to attach excessive importance to this churlishness at Hackney. We do not suppose that the spirit thus evinced is widespread or that it represents anything much more profound than a mere hooligan tendency. But it does show that a Jew who volunteers to serve the King may have to face a heavier task than the non-Jew. The latter does, at any rate, receive encouragement from his comrades. The Jew may have to persevere in the face of positive discouragement and obstruction. Those in authority in the army have not, of course, a scintilla of sympathy with the anti-Jewish feeling and would be the first to resent and suppress it. But if the prejudice should become at all prevalent, it might be desirable to consider the formation of a Jewish brigade, to which Jewish recruits could be drafted. In these days of a Welsh army corps and the like, such a proposal could not be dismissed as clannish or unjustified with the same airy confidence that it would probably have been a month or two ago."

GERMAN NEWSPAPER ASKS RIGHTS FOR JEWS.

"Die Vossische Zeitung" appeals to the German Government to grant the rights of citizenship to the many Russian and Galician Jews, who have been living in Germany for many years and have identified themselves with German interest, married German wives and to all purposes are Germans. These have never been recognized as German citizens and in spite of their efforts were not granted the rights of citizenhsip, so that now their position in the country is precarious. They are regarded as hostile aliens.

DEVOTION OF GERMAN JEWS.

The German Jews have evidenced in the present struggle a patriotism that will astonish the world when the facts will become entirely known. In the province of Posen, where Jews form only one-fifteenth of the population, about eight hundred Jews are enrolled as volunteers in the army, several of them serving as higher officers. Similar reports come from almost every district of Germany where Jews dwell.

COMMUNICATED.

New Orleans, Oct. 12, 1914.

Editor B'nai B'rith News:

Kindly inform your readers that on Oct. 1st I severed my connection of twelve years' standing with the American Israelite and the Chicago Israelite.

Very truly yours,
Max Heller.

THE RUSSIAN SENATE AND THE JEWS.

The Russian Senate has legalized the circular of the Ministry requesting the authorities to postpone all trials concerning the residence of Jews outside the Pale till after the war, as well as the order not to expel from the non-Pale provinces the families of Jews serving in the army, provided no new arrivals be allowed to settle there. The orders will now become binding on all governors, some of them having been slow in throwing over the policy of Jewish expulsions. It was decided at the conference of Russian municipal workers, that each municipality should make representations to the Ministry to the effect that children of Jews serving in the army should be admitted to educational institutions above the norm.

JEWS DISMISSED AT GOVERNMENT WORKS.

A number of Jewish cabinet makers engaged on work undertaken for the government near Liverpool, England, have been dismissed. In dismissing them the manager had informed them that he had no alternative, for a large body of employes on the job threatened to strike on the ground that they as carpenters could not tolerate the presence of cabinet makers on the same job. Subsequently the manager confessed that the only reason for the dismissal was race prejudice, the large body of men objecting to work with Jews. Of the eleven dismissed nine were Russian Jews, and therefore not alien enemies, one was born in England and another was a naturalized Englishman.

THE WAR AND THE BIBLE

By Dr. MAX L. MARGOLIS

Written for the B'nai B'rith News.

The other day I chanced to be in a company of gentlemen who naturally, falling into groups, discussed the war. After a while, weary of a subject which, absorbing as it may be in interest, at length repels by the contemplation of how it might have been avoided, how much bloodshed and carnage and utter ruin it means, how its effects are far-reaching—they said, Let us be done with the war (and turning to me), Talk to us about the Bible.

From the war, I said, to the Bible. There is appropriateness in this shifting of subjects. Of course, the Bible has something to say on war and the cessation of warfare. Some of our Christian friends, indeed, have found fault with the bellicose utterances in our Scriptures and David has come in for a deal of criticism because he blessed the Lord who taught his hands to war and his fingers to fight. These friends have apparently forgotten Micah and Isaiah. The attitude of Christians to our Hebrew Scriptures or the Old Testament as they choose to call them has been different with their different sections in the course of their history. When the early Church was in the making, there arose a teacher, Marcion by name, who taught that the Old Testament was worthless, that the God of the Hebrew Scriptures and the G d of the Christian Scriptures were two different beings. Marcion was put under the ban and the Catholic Church stood out for the essential oneness of the two sets of Scriptures, claiming for both one and the same source and maintaining that there was merely an unfoldment in the New of the promises in the Old. But Marcionism was revived. A second edition was reserved for the German philosopher and theologian Schleiermacher. The seeds sown by Schleiermacher have borne fruit, and it may be said that he dominates modern German theology.

Whatever may be said of the birthplace of modern Anti-Semitism, the spiritual paternity of that monstrous creature may be located in France or Germany or in both countries. When Sanskrit, the language of the Hindus, was taken up by European scholars and by them in masterly effort brought into filiation with Greek and Latin and the other European tongues, the Aryan ancestors of the European nations were resuscitated and an attempt was made to learn of their language and culture. As things in this world go by contrast, the Semite and Aryan were sedulously compared, and the master builders of the new science of comparative philology discovered that the advantage was with the Aryans. Renan, the gifted man of letters, notwithstanding the unfounded calumny that he was in the hire of the Alliance Israelite. he it was that in a scholarly work defined the Semite as a narrow specimen of humanity, born and bred in the confining outlook offered by the desert. strong in will power, unimaginative, of a materialistic bent of mind, incapable of myth making. Monotheism was an endowment of the race, but it merely betokened an inferior range of ideas. True and inward religion was the gift of the Aryan. The Semite possessed a minimum of religion. He was clannish and unfriendly to outsiders. These charges were not new. Tacitus before him and the Alexandrian schoolmasters at an earlier period had said the same. Because the Romans could find no image of the Deity in the holy of holies of the Jerusalem Temple, the lie was spread that the Jews were a godless people. Because the Jews avoided contact with the heathen and thought themselves superior to other nations, Jewish ethics was declared to be inferior. What was new was the bolstering up of the argument by the contrast with the putative Aryan of Europe. The truth was that Europe, modern Europe, found itself spiritually conquered by the Jew, the Jew who was hated and despised. The hatred was old, so a new scientific formula was found to give it a modern but none the less formidable cloak.

The student who is acquainted with the literature of the middle of the last century will remember the many pamphlets in which by friend and foe the merits of the Semite were discussed. Chwolson who turned apostate to Judaism stepped into the breach and defended his former coreligionists. Christian writers opposed him. Suffice it to say that when Bismarck needed a weapon to fight off Lasker and liberalism he seized upon Anti-Semitism and made it an issue in the political arena. What followed we all know. How from Germany the virus was spread to the Eastern neighbor who translated scientific and political Anti-Semitism into bloody pogroms is a matter of knowledge to the youngest among us. German theology set about to dissect the Hebrew Scriptures. The Law was proclaimed a forgery. It was made to follow in time upon the prophets and the Psalms were placed last. What this inversion of the traditional order amounted to was nothing short of a revolution. The law was declared to be the mischief maker. Ezra was made responsible for Jewish ceremonialism and exclusiveness. The founder of Christianity was pronounced the true successor to the prophets. For the prophets, so it was maintained, threw the nation overboard. Amos was but an ancient Tolstoi. According to the German commentators, Amos preached the utter destruction of the wicked nation, given to temple going and the empty sacrificial worship, priest-ridden and hypocritically pious. No ray of hope was to illumine its future. If in the present book of Amos there is a comforting conclusion promising the advent of the Messiah who was to build up the fallen hut of David, that conclusion was denominated a forgery, a later addition the purpose of which was to sugar-coat the bitter pill. And so with the other prophets. Suffice it to say that all the commentaries of the Bible written by German scholars are instinct with an inveterate hatred of Jew and Judaism. The young Jewish student into whose hands they are placed is shocked, bewildered, and often the result has been of bringing up the Jewish youth in our theological seminaries in a spirit of revolt against the cherished traditions of Jewish purity of doctrine and loftiness of ethical purpose.

The race theorists completed what the theologians began. While the end of the eighteenth century saw the rise of ideas which made for the leveling of differences between man and man culminating in our own Declaration of Independence that all men are born equal, of late there has been an avowed reaction. Gobineau in France wrote a treatise on the inequality of races. Houston Stewart-Chamberlain whose book on the Foundations of the Nineteenth Century appeared at the turning point of the century is now widely read, and the central idea of his fascinating but one-sided work is the doctrine that race is ineradicable and is the dominant factor in culture. The blonde Teutons were the sole builders of civilizations. His Teutons comprise all the belligerent nations of Europe at this moment. For Slavs and Frenchmen are to him Teutons. Alas for this fratricidal struggle. And so throughout the lastest German literature there rings the same echo of the racial foundation of society and civilization. Vierkandt in a work on "Naturvolker und Kulturvolker" tells you that full culture is the creation of the Aryan and Teutons. The Jews are credited with "Halbkultur". Helmolt in his "Weltgeschichte" wages war upon the doctrine of "equalism" which levels nations and races. Vierkandt means the same when he alludes to "Americanism" poisoning the minds of Europe. It is nothing short of a spirit of overweening conceit and intolerable arrogance bolstered up by pseudo-scientific race theories. Nietzsche is the prophet of young Germany, and Nietzsche teaches that might is right.

We Jews cling and must cling steadfastly to the very opposite doctrine that right is might. English theologians have been fairer to the Jew and to his sacred book. American polity and civilization is rooted in Puritanism, the child of the Old and not of the New Testament. Here is the real conflict, a conflict waged with spiritual weapons which are more formidable than siege-gun and bayonet. The Jew, if he is to safeguard his heritage, must in self-defense take up the study of the Bible and give the Jewish youth a Jewish interpretation of the Bible. The new Bible translation will ere long be in the hands of English-speaking Jews. Let us hope that it will be in every Jewish home. But a translation, useful and necessary as it certainly is, is but the first step. The translation must be speedily followed by the Jewish commentary which, scientific to the core, shall unfold the Jewish understanding of the Scriptures and of the messages contained in them, a message which must be forced upon the attention of a world divided against itself. The Jewish Scriptures, adequately and truly set forth, will be potent to establish the peace that humanity is so direly in need of, a peace inward and lasting, because built upon the imperishable rock of divine revelation. The nations may rage; the blinded teachers may arrogantly spurn the little nation which swept away by the floods of militant great powers proved its right to existence by the portentous message it bore to the world; but truth must prevail, justice must fill the earth, just as surely as the Word of God shall abide for ever.

RUMANIANS AGITATE FOR JEWISH BOYCOTT.

In Czernowitz, the capital of Bukowina, which is now in the hands of the Russians, proclamations were spread broadcast one evening, calling upon the population to boycott the Jews. Many Jews were thrown in a panic and began to leave the town, fearing an attack. The Russian Governor, however, immediately stopped the distribution of these proclamations and endeavored to quiet the Jewish population. It was later said that these proclamations were issued by Rumanians, of whom a large number live in Czernowitz.

A NEW SYNAGOGUE IN TRIPOLI.

Although the work was begun in the year 1900, it was only last month that the new synagogue at Bengasi was consecrated to its sacred purpose. General Moccagatta (representing the Governor, who was prevented from attending the ceremony) opened the synagogue, having been presented with a gold key for the purpose. He was also presented with the Mitzvah of opening the Ark for the purpose of depositing the Sepharim therein.

WELFARE WORK AT INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL.

Mr. Jacob Myers of Columbus, O., a member of the Social Service Committee of District Grand Lodge No. 2 of the I. O. B. B., has arranged to hold services once a month for the twenty-seven Jewish boys at the Boys' Industrial School. Lancaster, Ohio.

Through the co-operation of the Central Conference of American Rabbis, fifteen Union Prayer-Books have been sent to the institution for the use of the boys.

STAGE NAMES.

The Cincinnati Times Star recently published the real names of certain well-known Jews with those under which they are known to the public. According to this journal Harry Carroll the song writer, is really Rabinowitz; Harry von Tilzer's real name is Gumbatsky. Geo. McKay was formerly Isaac Rubinsky; the Roger Brothers, before they became actors, were Gus and Max Solomon; and the real name of Alexander Carr, one of the stars in "Potash and Perlmutter," is Isadore Karetzky; his co-star Barney Bernard is really Isaac Berman.

AMERICAN JEWISH HISTORICAL SOCIETY.

The twenty-third annual meeting of the American Jewish Historical Society will be held in the city of New York on Feb. 21 and 22, 1915. The papers to be submitted to the meeting are not limited in treatment and subject matter to American Jewish history, but the object of the society includes the promotion of the study of Jewish history in general.

THE NEW RABBI OF STOCKHOLM.

Dr. M. Ehrenpreis, the new Rabbi of Stockholm, recently arrived in the Swedish capital after a very adventurous journey of about fourteen days from Sofia. Immediately before his departure, the King conferred upon him the Officer's Cross with the Star of the Civil National Order of Merit, and the Queen presented him with her signed portrait in a silver frame. Mme. Ehrenpreis received a beautifully jewelled brooch from the Queen.

NEWS FROM LONDON

BY OUR CORRESPONDENT DR. M. EPSTEIN

London, Eng., Oct. 21, 1914.

In the year 70 a small people was driven from its home and suffered the bitterness of exile. As the 9th day of Ab comes round its descendants recall the misery and the suffering of those days. But it is a little hard to picture something that is usually and normally remote from one's experiences. All that has been changed. Jews in England have had an object lession in the meaning of exile. For in the year 1914 another small people has been driven from its home and has directed its weary footsteps to these hospitable shores. Thousands and thousands of Belgians have come. There were numberless refugees a month ago; today they have increased tremendously. That Jews are of the number I reported in my last letter; in this I can only say that there have been huge additions to the original arrivals. The poor Jews' temporary shelter is their Mecca, and, certainly, never have pilgrims before received so warm and friendly a welcome.

Since 1891 the censuses in Belgium have not shown how large are the different religious denominations. Consequently it is impossible to say definitely how many Belgian Jews there are today. The Census of 1891 gave the number as 13,200. An estimate of (roughly) 15,000 is perhaps in accord with the actual present numbers. But we said Belgian Jews. The total number of Jews in Belgium is in all probability much larger. For we find many Jews from Russia settled in some of the larger towns, notably in Antwerp, where there was a big colony of them, living in their own quarters with their Synagogues, clubs and eating houses. Side by side with the Russian Jews were very many German Jews, Jews from Galicia, even Turkish Jews. Most of our German co-religionists in Belgium managed to flee to their native land; the others came of their own accord to London or were sent thither by the authorities. Accordingly the shelter has on its hands Russian, Galician and Turkish Jews from Belgium, to say nothing of the native Belgian Jews.

To deal with all the refugees a central National Committee has been formed. But in accordance with the established tradition of English Jews to look after their own poor co-religionists, the Jews of this country are sparing no effort to relieve the pressure on the National Refugee Committee by dealing with Jewish refugees themselves. And how? In three ways. By personal hospitality, by starting special homes or hostels for the homeless and by supporting the shelter in its enormous task. The refugees mainly fall into two social classes—those who may be termed the bourgeois element, who were more or less well-to-do before the war broke out; and those who belong to the wage-earning class. With the mass of the latter the shelter deals. For the former private enterprise is doing much, and it is pleasing to note that the example of the First Lodge of England has found numerous imitators.

Our own hostel is generally held to be exceedingly well managed, and for this we are grateful to the committee of ladies, the majority of them B'nai B'rith, who took the matter in hand. We are delighted to know that our methods have been copied, and our ideal aimed at by those who are managing other hostels (of which more anon). Another pleasing feature is the exceeding great kindness of Gentiles in placing our hostel on a sure foundation. The house itself belongs to a non-Jew, Dr. Baker, and he has lent it to the lodge rent free so long as it is required. The local municipal authority who controls the electric light supply of the district is making no charge for the electric light of the house; and the private gas company is doing the same for the gas that is consumed. In addition, gifts in money and in kind have been showered upon the hostel. The residents now have a bookcase, a piano, a graphaphone, pictures, books and whatnot. One of the best helpers is Miss Cohen, who comes regularly every morning and cooks for the residents. Other ladies come to teach English, and this is particularly valued by the half dozen students, who are anxious to master our tongue in order to be able to continue their studies here. Opposite the hostel stands the Parish Church of the neighborhood. Recently they held their harvest festival, and the surplus fruit the vicar sent over to the hostel. This kindly thought is much appreciated, though, truth to tell, it is not only on one side. Twenty minutes walk from our hostel is situated a chapel in the schoolroom of which a number of refugees are housed. A few of them were Jews, and as soon as the fact became known they were removed to a Jewish environment. Nevertheless, Jewish neighbors of the chapel, even after the Jewish refugees had left, continued to send gifts, and we heard of a local Jewish lady who one day brought a huge joint of Kosher meat for the day's dinner. All these emanations of friendliness are fine. Only the question cannot be suppressed, do we need a war for their generation?

The Hostel of the Lodge is rather proud of its students and we are pleased to be able to report that arrangements have already been made whereby they will all be able to continue their studies, including the medical student of four years' standing, a Russian by birth, who escaped from Strassburg in the nick of time. He intends, if possible, to settle as a doctor in Palestine. Another group of the inhabitants of our Shelter should not pass unmentioned: the children. They are as happy as ever, having a large garden to gambol in in dry weather and a special play room for wet days. That we have had an abundance of clothes goes without saying. Then, too, some of our friends have taken the students and others to places of interest in London—the British Museum, the Houses of Parliament, the Tower and the rest. This, too, shows a fine spirit.

We have said so much about our own hostel principally because brethren in America will, no doubt, care to hear about the London Lodge's undertaking; but also because our hostel has become the model for others. Of these there have arisen quite a number, and some are now in process of being organized. The most striking case is that of the Hampstead synagogue, where the Rev. A. A. Green appealed for the refugees, and in a week or two had £3,000 (say $15,000) for the purpose. The congregation has taken three houses (one, the property of Dr. Anghel Gaster, a Brother of the London Lodge, has been given rent-free) and Jewish refugees will be installed in them as quickly as possible. The Spanish and Portuguese congregation is also starting a hostel, principally, though not entirely for Sephardi Jews, and other congregations are likewise showing a keenness in the same direction. We must also mention the Shelter in North London which was opened about the same time as that of the Lodge and from which excellent accounts are heard. Here also many a London Brother is active.

Besides these public efforts numerous Jewish families have taken individual refugees into their homes—a form of charity which is in accord with the best Jewish tradition. When one considers that almost everybody has felt the small pinch which war must inevitably bring, all this activity and self-sacrifice is of splendid augury. But Jews have not been to the fore in this work alone. The country's call has been answered, it is said, by more than 5,000 Jewish soldiers and the proportion of Jews serving their country in the army just now is certainly as high as that of the general body of the population. In all probability, however, it is higher. In this connection it is interesting to record that the following appeal was recently issued: "Royal Borough of Kensington. Men wanted to join the special Jewish section of the Kensington battalion of Lord Kitchener's army." Side by side with this piece of news we must mention that the Jewish battalion in France is said to carry not only the French flag, but also the Jewish National White and Blue banner.

Reports of Jews distinguishing themselves in the field continue to come to hand. In the recent dispatch from the Field Marshal commanding the British troops in France several Jewish names appeared in the list of those "specially mentioned." That there have been casualties among Jewish soldiers goes without saying. One or two are of names well known and honored in Anglo-Jewry. The Henriqueses have lost a gallant officer and one of the Sebag-Montefiores has been wounded. So that there is some ground for the King's praise of Jewish loyalty in a letter which Lord Stamfordham, His Majesty's Private Secretary, sent to Mr. Joney Benjamin, of Romford Road, Forest Gate, who has four sons serving in the army: "I am commanded by the King to congratulate you on having four sons serving His Majesty, of whom you should be very proud. His Majesty wishes them to know that he thoroughly appreciates the loyalty which they share with so many thousands of others of the Jewish persuasion in the United Kingdom."

It is only fair to add that the story is the same in the other armies. Russian Jews appear to have covered themselves with glory on the battlefield, and we have heard of at least one German Jewish soldier who received the Iron Cross for bravery. All this, of course, is bound to have an immediate effect. Do we not indeed see it? Recently the Vorwaerts was suspended in Germany. We mention the fact only because of the reason for its re-appearance. It promised not to preach class-war during the period of the war. At the same time the anti-Semitic press in Germany was allowed to continue publication on condition that it did not preach Jew-baiting. This it undertook, and not merely for the duration of the war, but forever. Can we believe our ears? Yet such was the story we read. Has anti-Semitism as a faith given up the ghost? Even if it has, Jews are sure to feel the evil effects of war more than other folk. In Russian Poland they are between the nether and the upper millstone. And is it otherwise in Galicia? Remember the dense masses of Jews residing in both areas. Fortunately for the trend of Jewish history the center of Jewish gravity (if we may put it so) is no longer in these parts of the world, but far away from there, across the Atlantic, in the lands of the New World. All the same the Jewish question will not be a negligible quantity when the settlement after the war comes to be discussed—any more than it was in 1878. The talk now is of small nations. Small nations are to come into their own when the settlement is made. What does this mean? It means presumably that the Belgians, the Montenegrins, the Servians, the Poles, even the Albanians, will receive recognition as an entity and presumably a land of their own. But what of the Jews? It is, of course, difficult to speculate. But one thing is clear. Whatever be the issues of the war Jews must demand absolute political and religious liberty in those lands where these as yet are denied them. Whether there is to be a Jewish land, say in Palestine, remains to be seen. But civic equality is not too much to demand at the beginning of the twentieth century.

Perhaps Roumania will show the way now that she has a new king. Poor King Carol did not seem to have sufficient courage to do the right thing. To Jews he professed to have sympathy with their just claims; yet he did nothing, taking refuge in the excuse that he was a Constitutional sovereign. And yet it may be said that just because he prided himself on his constitutionalism that he might have done so much behind the scenes. Seemingly the justness of the Jews' claim did not sufficiently appeal to him. Will it to the diplomatists who will settle the new map of Europe? At least let us see to it that the Jewish case is adequately represented. After all, it is not much the Jew is asking for. It is for a right recognized by the theory and practice of political science: a right which in a democratic age is almost axiomatic.

In the midst of war news we have two items of peace which should not be left unchronicled. Sir Matthew Nathan has been appointed Undersecretary of Ireland. This gifted Jew has served England in many capacities—in the army, as a colonial governor, as financial expert, and now he goes to Dublin. Those who know Sir Matthew will realize that his quiet strength of character is manifest in his very presence; and those who have come into contact with him are aware that his goodness of heart is as much a reality as his strength of character. How many potential Sir Matthews may there not be in Russia and Roumania! Yet these lands are stupidly depriving themselves of the services of such men. The other item of interesting news is that in the recent list of new King's Counsel was the name of Mr. Benjamin Arthur Cohen.

The war has produced a crop of curious phenomena which it is interesting to note. Readers of the Bible naturally turn to the passage in Ezekiel where the wars of Gog and Magog are pictured and where Rosh and Meshech are mentioned especially. There are simple souls who are convinced that the war of Gog and Magog is raging in Europe now; who believe that Rosh is none other than Russia and Meshech only Moscow. Others again turn to the Apocrypha, to the Second Book of Esdras. In the eleventh chapter at verse 36 they think they find a reference to the devastation of Belgium. Others finally fear that the earth is shaken as it is, that nations rage and kingdoms tremble only because the days of the Messiah are close at hand. And those who are not quite so mystical tell you confidently that the war was sent in order to bring this age of pleasure, of irreligion, of carelessness sharply up against the lasting realities of life. See, they say, the empty churches are full now and those who scoffed now pray as they never prayed before. Life is becoming simple. Luxury, like Great Pan, is dead. Who shall say that these folk are wrong? Who would wish to rob them of their illusions? Their opinions only show that the sixteenth century outlook on life has not yet quite disappeared, and that simple souls find an easy solution to complex problems. But will any one deny the interest of it all?

The general motto here in regard to all things is "Business as usual." The Jewish community is adopting it also, and so we find that our literary societies and communal oraganizations are commencing work after the High Holidays as in past years. There is the same crop of meetings and debates and what not. Possibly there will be a more serious tone in all of them. At its first meeting after the summer recess, the London Lodge dealt with several important topics and its deliberations were marked by a keenness that was good to see. It is of good augury for the session 1914-15, and loving harmony as we all do, our earnest prayer is that before long our sessions may be held under the star of Peace. That is our chiefest longing at present.

THE JEWS OF LUXEMBURG.

Luxemburg, which shares with Belgium the unwelcome distinction of having its territory invaded by a hostile force, may be considered in Jewish history as forming at one time a portion of Flanders, at another part of the German Empire, and at another of one of Napoleon's kingdoms. In Luxemburg also Jews have been settled almost from the beginning of history, but they have never been of any consequence either on account of number or of influence. Throughout the Duchy today they do not exceed 1,200 and are settled in about twenty-five different centers. In 1908, when the Jewish community was organized, the Jews of the capital numbered seventy-five. The center of gravity of the Jews of Luxemburg has often varied, but it has never been within the Duchy. The important neighboring German town of Trier (Trevers) has long had much influence over it. When Luxemburg was an integral portion of Holland the community was attached to the synagogue of Maestricht. In 1830 it became nominally independent, but for many years past, so far as Jewish affairs were concerned, Luxemburg has been in effect a portion of Germany. It is interesting to note that the famous citadel of the capital was built by a Jew, Isaac de Traybac, in 1644, as is reported on a tablet in the wall of the present fortress.

OFFICIAL VISIT OF THE PRESIDENT OF DISTRICT NO. 4.

On Nov. 11, 1914, Grand President Mr. Morris N. Schneider of Oakland, Cal., will pay an official visit to Los Angeles Lodge No. 487. Brother Schneider will be accompanied by Grand Orator Rabbi N. Friedlander of Oakland. Los Angeles Lodge is preparing to give these officers the royal welcome they deserve. After leaving Los Angeles the visitors will proceed to Arizona in an endeavor to institute Lodges in that state.

Thoughts and Tidings---A Review of Passing Events

By H. Eliassof

War Reflections.

In times of great catastrophes, such as the outbreak of a world war which drenches the earth with blood and destroys the happiness of thousands of homes, or such as a tremendous upheaval of the mighty forces of nature, which shakes the foundations of the earth and fills the heart of man with dread and despair, many prophets arise who undertake to foretell the results of these cataclysms and to depict the sweeping changes which they will bring in the life of man. A few of these prophecies and prognostications may be deserving of notice, because they are inspired mainly by the real needs of the times, by the very hopes and longings which for many years have been throbbing and palpitating within the souls of the living generations. These prophets, so to say, see the shadows cast by coming events and their prophecies are illumined by the light of logical deduction. But most of these predictions are figments and fictions born in the minds of men who seek notoriety. They lack all foundations and support of reason. Therefore, they deserve more to be ridiculed than respected.

The present war in Europe has also aroused many oracles and seers who venture to forecast the outcome of this catastrophe and the influence which it will ultimately manifest upon the life of nations and commonwealths. In the words of a writer in one of the Sunday papers we can say that all Europe is aflame with prophecies foretelling a thousand and one dire calamities and any number of pleasant events. We are told of the total downfall of religion and the complete destruction of civilization, of the full extinction of Teutonic culture and the rise of Slavic idealism. We are also informed that this is the last war; that after this rain of shot and shell the sunshine of everlasting peace, of true democracy and real liberty will enlighten the world; that the rivers of blood which are now flowing will wash out all race hatred and obliterate all boundaries; that thrones will totter, crowns crumble and upon the ruins of royalty the reign of the people will rise and mankind will live in brotherhood from the rising of the sun to the going down thereof. All these prophecies are mere phantasies of overexcited minds. Civilization will not perish and religion will not die. This war will not be the last war, and it will take many, many years before humanity will be blest with everlasting peace. Man will have to toil on and on for the development of a better and greater civilization, for the realization of a universal brotherhood and for the completion of the temple of humanity.

Alas, many of the prophets of this day seem to follow the war in too close proximity to the canteens and to derive their inspiration from the frothy contents of these vessels more than from any other source.

Among the multitude of war prophets we also find many of our co-religionists who predict all kinds of wondrous happenings which are in store for the house of Israel in consequence of the present war. About nine million Jews are involved in this terrible war and are suffering from its horrible devastations. At least half a million Jews are among the 20,000,000 soldiers of the five great European nations who are now fighting on the many bloody battlefields. The Jews, as such, can expect little for themselves from the outcome of this war, whatever this outcome may be and whichever side wins in the end, except Russia. The Jews have been the unfortunate victims of every modern war fought by European nations. It is not enough that thousands of Jews be slain and their surviving brethren be reduced to poverty and penury, but they must also bear the moral responsibility for its cause which the guilty parties and the anti-Semitic agitators will invariably throw on them, as was particularly the case in France in the Franco-Prussian war, in England in the Boer war and in Russia in the Russo-Japanese war. Accusing voices against the Jews have already been heard in this war. Men brazen enough and cowardly enough are already trying to place the blame of this European war upon the shoulders of the Jews. They already shamelessly repeat the old lie that the Jewish financiers have brought about this bloody conflict. The Jews are today the same scapegoats for all the sins of the human race as they have always been since they were scattered among the nations.

The Jews know full well that it would be a calamity for them if Russia wins in this world war.
in this world war. In case of the success of Russia in the present war, the lot of the Jews in Russia will be infinitely worse than it is at the present day. Russia as she is now constituted cannot be brought into the family of cultured nations. Russia has stabbed the Jew to the heart. For years she has been luring away the young Jewish generation from the faith of their fathers; she has been disrupting the unity of Jewish family life and is thereby pulling down the two strongest pillars which upheld Judaism all through the ages. In the year 1913 not less than 1,147 Russian Jews are known to have accepted the Greek Catholic faith because Russia cut off from the Jews the possibility to attain a higher education. It can safely be stated that the figure of Jewish converts to Christianity, for this reason and on account of the terrible economic condition under which the Russian Jews are forced to live by the Russian government, has been for some years between 3,000 to 4,000 per annum, and most of the meshumodim are recruited from the intellectual classes of the Russian Jewish population. In case of the success of Russia in the present war the number of Jews in her realm will be increased to almost seven million, so that more than half of the entire Jewish population of the world will be condemned to slavery, to spiritual degradation and to economic misery! Russian success may bring about a restoration of the old kingdom of Poland. There are at present 1,800,000 Jews in Russian Poland, 40,000 in German Poland and 830,000 in Galicia. These 2,670,000 Jews who will then be under the rule of the Polish government will only exchange one oppressor for another, equally as cruel, as relentless and as determined to destroy the Jewish soul. The Polish commercial boycott against the Jews which the Poles of Warsaw and of other cities are now carrying on will then assume a national aspect and will be expanded and spread more systematically by the aid of an independent Polish government. The Poles of Russia are now showing openly their hatred of the Jews in every conceivable manner. They even refuse to serve with Jews in the groups of the Red Cross and what these anti-Semites will do to the poor Jews who will be thrown completely under their power is not hard to foretell. Under these circumstances the Jew can only hope for the defeat of Russia. This would mean the speedy end of the present regime and the establishment of a form of government that would be more in sympathy with the liberal ideas. That would necessarily lead to the liberation of the Jews from the thraldom in which they are now held.

The great manifestation of patriotism by the Russian Jews is the wonder of the world and the glorious bravery of Russo-Jewish soldiers on the battlefield astonishes Russia herself. It is reported that many Russian-Jews have returned to Russia from the Orient and voluntarily joined the Russian army. Bourtzeff, the Russian revolutionary, makes the statement that Mendel Beilis, whom the Russian government was recently so anxious to railroad to the gallows or to Siberia, on a trumped up ritual murder accusation, wants to be allowed by the Russian authorities to return to Russia from Palestine where he now lives, in order to offer his services to the Czar as a defender of the Russian flag. The world asks what is the Russian Jew fighting for? Has Russia ever been a real fatherland to him and has the Russian flag ever given him any protection? Many people say that the Russian Jew is kissing the rod which is smiting him. Ah! the world never fully understood the Jew and never appreciated the noble traits of Jewish character. The Jew is not vindictive and he easily forgives and forgets the wrongs which the world inflicts upon him. The beautiful story which the papers tell of the late Chief Rabbi of Lyons should teach the world that the Jew is broad-minded enough and kind hearted enough to give his love even to the Christian, and that he has long ago forgiven and forgotten all the sorrows which he suffered at the hands of Christianity. The newspapers relate that a French soldier who fell on the battlefield horribly mangled by a shell called the Rabbi, who was also fighting in the battle, taking him for a priest to come to him to hold the cross before him and to recite with him the prayer for the dying. The rabbi did not refuse the request of the dying Christian. He took the cross which the sinking soldier carried around his neck and held it up before his eyes. At that moment a bullet struck the praying rabbi, he fell dead at the side of the expired soldier and in the midst of war the souls of Christian and Jew were united by God in eternal peace.

The King is Dead.

When a good and noble-hearted king dies—a king who belonged to the people over whom he ruled, who sympathized with the masses and was imbued with the traditions of the country over which he reigned, then his people will sincerely mourn his loss and bless his memory. The death of King Charles of Roumania can hardly awaken great grief in the hearts of the Roumanian people and the Jews of Roumania have certainly no reason to indulge in deep lamentations over the demise of their cruel task master. King Charles was not a Roumania by birth, he was a German, a Hohenzollern Prince. As a German Prince his aim was to make Roumania a strong military power, which is at best a questionable blessing, and as a German he was an anti-Semite, who is always an unjust enemy of the Jews.

As a king he was weak and vacillating, and as an anti-Semite he was bitter and persistent. During the forty-eight years of his reign in Roumania the condition of the Roumanian Jews grew worse from year to year. He made many promises to ameliorate their sad lot, but he never kept one of them. He always excused himself by stating that his ministers would not let him show any favors to the Jews. There is no doubt that he sympathized with the Cuzas and Bratianos, for he showed his animosity for the Jews in word and deed from the very day he entered Roumania as king to the last days of his life. Anti-Semitism is certainly no sign of greatness. Any common school teacher or hod carrier can possess such trait. It only becomes more dangerous when a king, a ruler of man, shows such proclivities, because a king has power and he can cause much suffering. But the power of evil never really made a king great.

King Charles died childless and has been succeeded by his nephew Prince Ferdinand who is 39 years of age. The Jews of Roumania do not know yet what they have to expect from the new king. Since the times of the Pharaoh the Jews have always been apprehensive of "vayokom melech chodosh," of the rise of a new king. The King of Roumania is dead, a new king is sitting on Roumania's throne and well may the Jews of Roumania anxiously ask: "Will the new king be a better man than his predecessor, or will he be a worse Pharaoh?"

CARE OF THE WAR SUFFERERS.

By the Berlin Lodges.

[The names of the donors will be published in the official bulletins.]

My dear Brothers: The entire German Nation is aroused; all those able to bear arms are hurrying to rally around the flag; the entire German people are preparing to take care of the wounded and of the families of the fallen warriors. Whatever may be in store for us, whether victory or defeat, we must be prepared to bear; through victory we must not become arrogant and in defeat we must not despair. We trust and expect to vanquish our enemies in this struggle, and that this war, forced upon us in defense of our National existence, shall terminate, under God's guidance, with a lasting honorable peace. All Germany has but one thought and offers but one prayer: "God protect and God safeguard our dear Fatherland." One wish animates all hearts: "To help and assist."

The Honorable Grand President then called for a vote on the propositions, and they all were UNANIMOUSLY adopted.

Bro. Timendorfer then thanked the assembly (more than 800 brothers having attended the meeting) for the interest displayed. The meeting adjourned after the recital of the customary closing prayer.

Before the assembly had dispersed the president of the German Empire Lodge, Bro. Siegmund Kaufmann, delivered a short address to the brothers, wherein he also stated all the emotions called forth within us in these troublesome times; he appealed to the well-known liberality and to the patriotic sentiments of the members, and called attention to the sacrifices made by our valorous troops in the field, who are offering their lives in defense of the Fatherland and at the same time fighting to preserve our social organization and with it the existence of each and every one of us. They cheerfully sacrifice their blood and their lives; we must not hesitate to do our duty, each one according to his ability.

The dearest wish of our hearts is that our ruler may lead his armies, with the aid of God, to the complete victory of the German people. We join in the cry: "Our Emperor Wilhelm, Hoch, Hoch, Hoch!!!

After arising to sing the National hymn and the "Wacht am Rhein," the members gradually retired.

EX-MINISTER AS CHAMPION OF JEWS.

The Russian Jews have found a warm defender in M. Timirazeff, ex-minister of Commerce, and member of the Upper House. He has signed the appeal of the commercial and industrial bodies, who ask the Government that the Jewish merchants and agents should be permitted to visit non-Pale districts.

GENERAL COMMITTE MEETING DISTRICT GRAND LODGE No. 2.

The first meeting of the General Committee of District Grand Lodge No. 2 was held in Cincinnati, Ohio, on Sunday morning, Oct. 25, 1914, with President Dr. J. S. Kornfeld in the chair.

A special committee on by-laws of lodges was appointed. Bonds of such of the officers as are required to furnish them were presented and approved.

Request of the Executive Committee for a report of removal work as conducted in the District for the past five years was referred to a special committee for compliance.

The distribution of copies of the message of President Harry Simon was referred to a special committee to determine upon the manner of such distribution.

More fully to effectuate the work of the convention in respect to nationalizing the social service work, it was resolved that the Executive Committee of the Order be requested to invite Brother Jacob Billikopf as a guest to the San Francisco convention, so that he may lay before the delegates the activities and character of the work now being conducted.

It was unanimously resolved to appropriate the sum of $1,000 to the maintenance of the Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital at Hot Springs, Ark.

It was resolved that the secretary communicate to District Grand Lodge No. 6 and the Jewish Orphan Asylum of Cleveland the resolution of District Grand Lodge No. 2 respecting the change of site of the asylum as presented to the convention in the report of the Committee on Charitable Institutions.

Appropriation of $100 was made for the use of the Social Service Committee.

The President and Secretary were authorized to draw vouchers from time to time not exceeding the sum of $500 for propaganda purposes in the District.

The Secretary reported having transmitted to the Lodges of the District the call of the President of the Order, supplemented by a call from the President of the District for contributions to aid the war sufferers, and the appointment of committees was requested in all the lodges to solicit contributions from the members. On motion it was unanimously resolved that the sum of $1,000 be appropriated from the funds of the Grand Lodge in aid of the widows and orphans and direct sufferers of the war.

It was further resolved that May 30, 1915, be set as the date for the convention of the District Grand Lodge to be held at Columbus, Ohio.

It was resolved that in cities where it is deemed that the existence of more than one lodge would be for the best interests of the Order and the District, that the Propaganda Committee make efforts in that direction.

The meeting thereupon adjourned.

THE NEW RUSSIAN TREATY AND THE JEWS.

The United States, after the usual ratifications of the peace convention signed at Washington, will again have treaty relations with Russia. But there remains to be negotiated a commercial treaty to take the place of that of 1832 abrogated by America because of the refusal of the Russian government to recognize the passports of American citizens of Jewish faith.

With the Czar professing a change of heart, or of policy, towards his Jewish subjects, under stress of present circumstances, it would seem that the time is opportune for diplomatic insistence upon the full correction of the conditions which have marred the otherwise friendly relations of the two great nations.

While the iron is hot the administration should strike, if the term can be used of diplomatic negotiations. It may be found easy now to secure that measure of justice for American citizens and that respect for the American flag that was not possible in any of the years gone by and that may not be possible in the years following the war.

Conditions to-day are highly favorable to the successful negotiation of a treaty that will end Russian discrimination against American citizens on the ground of their race and their faith.—New York Evening Mail.

JUSTICE FOR THE JEWS.

The decree by which several hundred Jews are to be raised to the rank of commissioned officers in the Russian army is one of the compensations that are borne to humanity on this avalanche of blood. In Russia, as in Germany, the government service has been practically closed to Jews. The present concession was granted in recognition of the valorous action of Jewish common soldiers in the capture of Lemberg. It is heralded as an earnest that the Czar will keep faith with the race and give to the Jews in his empire the promised privilege of full Russian citizenship.

The anti-Semite press of Russia applauds the action of the monarch. In a few days the prejudice that has existed for centuries among the Russian people against the Jews has disappeared. Bravery on the battlefield has won what constructive work in building up the trade of Russia failed to win. The race without a country has proved again, as it has often proved before, the depth of its patriotism for an adopted land. And war, the twin-born leveler with death, has brought in Russia what enlightenment failed to bring in Germany, what education failed for centuries to bring in other parts of Europe, the justice that is due all men.—Boston Advertiser.

WAR'S CHANGES.

The appointment of Jews as officers in the Russian army, the promise of civil rights to the race, the prospective abolition of the pale, are instances of the good that may come out of the war. Looking at it optimistically, war is not all loss. It breaks down old barriers and opens new avenues for human progress. It gives a new sense of values. When life itself is cheap, when homes are abandoned, when blow after blow falls in numbing successful institutions that once looked precious seem easy to dispense with. Old prejudices disappear in a night. The despised Jew fights as bravely as the Slav, and a first-class fighting man is as good as any man in the world when a nation's existence or its vital interests are at stake.

It is because of the revaluation that goes on in war, because men see things in their essential light when brought back to the primal struggle for a bare "place in the sun," that the most hopeful predictions are heard of the consequences that will flow from the present great struggle, such as that this will be the last great war, and that if Germany is beaten militarism will come to an end and that democracy will go forward on the powder carts now being hurried over Europe.

Not only does a remaking of geographical maps usually follow a great war, but a change takes place as well in the boundary lines of ideas, institutions and ancient prejudices. The decline of anti-Semitism in Russia is the first step in this kind of new map making.—New York Tribune.

THE JEWS AND THE WAR.

Of utmost importance to the world, as well as to the Jews, is it that when the time for peace negotiations come, there should be a settlement of the Jewish problem. Such a settlement must involve securing for them equal human rights with others in each of the countries which now discriminate against Jews, either by their law or by administrative practices.

Among other things, this involves a removal of the disabilities under which the Jews labor in Russia, in Roumania, in Persia, and in certain respects, in Palestine.

The importance of removing the disabilities in Russia and in Roumania have been so much discussed publicly that the problem as to those countries is well understood. The importance of the problem as it concerns Palestine is not as well understood.

The Near East must play an important part in the future history of the world. It is to the Near East that we must look for a reconciliation of the contrast and antipathies between the Orient and the Occident. Each needs an interpreter to the other, and civilization demands that the world should have the benefit of the good that each can contribute. If the world is to live in peace and is to advance undisturbed, a better mutual understanding between East and West is essential. The Jew is a natural interpreter of the West to the East and of the East to the West. He can understand the Musselman and the Musselman can understand him.

Increased settlement of Jews in Palestine, the establishment for them there of the publicly recognized, legally secured home for which the Zionists are working, would therefore not only satisfy the longing of a large number of Jews the world over but it would serve as a bridge between the Musselman East and our Western civilization.

The Ottoman Empire also needs what a Jewish settlement in Palestine can give—economic development through an industrious and able people, educated in the best that modern science can afford and desirous of becoming permanent citizens of the Empire. From such economic development the Western world would gain, as well as the Ottoman Empire.

The development which has been made of Palestine through the Zionist inspiration, particularly in the last ten years, has proved that Palestine is fitted for the modern Jew and that the modern Jew is fitted for Palestine. The Jews, in reasonable number, are sure to go if they can be given reasonable assurance of equal civil and political rights and of the opportunity of developing the country.

In the settlement of the world problems which must follow the war, the relation of the Jews to Palestine is therefore one of truly first-rate importance.—Harper's Weekly.

THE JEWS AND THEIR PERSECUTORS.

Of all the romances of literature, of all the greater romances of history, there is no romance like that of the Jew.

The Jew saw the rise of Greece from a cluster of warring city states into the great empire of Alexander, and saw that empire shattered. He saw the passing of the Ptolemies. He saw the empire of Rome grow, ripen and rot; saw the western half go down before the surge of the barbarian, the eastern half yield slowly to Saracen and Turk. As he had seen the beginning of Moorish power, so he saw its end.

Dynasties, nations, races—they have passed across the stage of history, but the Jew lingers.

It is a long history and a tragic one. The same qualities that made it possible for him to maintain his individuality through all the ages have made him ever the victim of abuse.

He would worship none other gods but one; hence all other religions have persecuted him as an infidel. He could live and even thrive where less hardy races starved; hence his economic superiority has ever brought upon him the jealousy and hatred of those with whom he so successfully competed, a hatred which his social non-conformity made more bitter. He eschewed fighting but accumulated riches; hence warlike princes made use of him, or stole his wealth and seized his possessions.

Outlawed, killed, tortured, exiled, robbed, circumscribed by jealous laws, pent up in reeking ghettos, subjected to every abuse, every degradation, persecuted in a thousand ways, the Jew has survived. But—and this should be noted—they who persecuted him most severely have not survived.

At all times the prosperity of the Jew has gone hand-in-hand with the prosperity of the state that sheltered him. In the days of the true greatness of Spain, when Castile and Aragon were winning back their land from the Moor and the country was gathering the riches and power that were to give it the leadership of Europe, the Jew had his proper share in the prosperity.

Alfonso X, Alfonso the Wise, made Jews his chamberlains and chancellors of the exchequer. Fifty years later Jews were the treasurers for Alfonso XI and Don Pedro, while Henry III of Castile employed them as his political and commercial agents. They made the maps and the astronomical tables by which the great navigators of Spain and Portugal steered their courses; they were themselves navigators and pilots and they financed many of those wonderful expeditions into new waters.

Then persecution came, and the same year that witnessed the downfall of the Mahometan empire of the west, the same year that saw the discovery of the New World, saw the Spanish Jews banished, driven by the tens and hundreds of thousands from the land where they had dwelt for long centuries.

That was the beginning of the end for Spain. On the fruits of the prosperity which the Jews had done so much to create, supplemented by the wealth snatched from the New World, she flourished long. But the blight had fallen, and the rapid decline of Spain from her proud pre-eminence is the byword of history.

So, too, with Poland. When Casimir the Great and his nobles had Jews for their bailiffs and financial advisers, or when Sigismund and Stephen Bathori offered them asylum, Poland was a power to be counted with in Europe And when the Jews suffered persecution and destitution, then Poland, too, sank into humiliation.

Ever the picture is the same—the Ottoman empire at the height of its power under Soliman the Magnificent and Selim, with Jews as ministers and chosen ambassadors; Holland, when she wrested East Indies from Portugal and held command of the seas; Florence under the Medicis, Ferrara under the d'Este rule, Rome under its most powerful popes—always when wealth and power abounded the Jews were protected, honored and prosperous.

The great rulers of Russia have been Peter, Catherine II., Alexander I. These are the rulers who welcomed the Jews, even favored them Today in no country are the Jews so persecuted as in this Russia, and Russia lags far behind other European nations in all that makes for real civilization.

On the Jewish calendar are few red days, records of glory and gladness, and many black days, memories of sorrow and wrong. But it is ill for the nation by whose acts those black days are set down.

For the Jew makes prosperity not only for himself, but for those about him, and that people which persecutes the Jew and drives him away thereby serves but to drive prosperity away with him.

Spain, Poland, Turkey—their power has been and is not. It is for Russia—and for anti-Semites the world over—to pause, scan the page of history and consider.—The Boston Globe.

"PATRIOTISM" AND SIR FRANCES MONTEFIORE.

More dramatic and more ludicrous than the "volte face" of the German Socialists, was the denouement supplied by Sir Francis Montefiore at the last monthly meeting of the London Jewish Board of Guardians. A group of members had formed themselves into a committee to discuss methods of assisting Austrian and German Jews stranded in London. The spectacle was too much for Sir Francis, the (former) president of the English Federation of Zionists and the offspring of that greater Jew, Sir Moses Montefiore. In stentorian, bitter tones, reverberating with the passion of an Englishman's loyalty, Montefiore scathingly denounced this vicious attempt to feed the implacable foes of England—these poor, helpless, starving, homeless Jews—his own co-religionists, of his own flesh and blood. Sir Francis Montefiore declared that to provide soup-kitchens and beds for these hounded fugitives—little less outcast in their own "fatherland"—would be treason to England, and therefore he indignantly withdrew from his incongruous position as presiding angel of English Zionism. So Zionism has suffered another loss — a 'deadly" blow dealt by the dagger of an alien "patriotism" which the Jew is constantly pointing at his own heart!

It is time to clear the air somewhat of the mysteries surrounding such tragedies as the defection of Sir Francis Montefiore. The Jew may try his hardest to convince his Christian compatriots of his loyalty to his native land, of which he is a citizen freely tolerated and freely (alas!) humiliated. But try as he might, it would take him aeons to prove himself as patriotic as, say, the genuine Englishman, who has no need to strain himself over the matter. That is as true as the laws of gravity, and we are content to leave the fact speak for itself. But when a Jew's anxiety to exhibit his patriotism reaches such bounds that he must submerge his most sacred feelings—his Jewish racial and religious sympathies—he is infinitely more traitor to himself and his race than he is "patriotic" to his adopted country.

The Jew who is a subject of England is perfectly at liberty to act charitably towards his famishing and destitute co-religionists, even if they have been subjects of countries with which England is at war. These particular refugees are altogether exempt from the military regulations applying to combatants, spies or prisoners-of-war. They are merely peaceful Jewish families, as much desiring to injure England as they are to rush to the battlefield. These Jewish families—AS ALL JEWS KNOW—have no ulterior interest in the war once they have taken up their residence in a freer and a tolerant country, which they recognize as their home. Hence Sir Francis Montefiore was utterly wrong in the attitude he took. Only a perverted outlook and a false sense of "patriotism" could have so misled the former leader of the English Zionists.

We have no hesitation in condemning this ill-judged and puerile outburst of an otherwise excellent Jew, as Sir Francis Montefiore has on many occasions proved himself to be. Apart from the fact that there was no necessity whatever to accuse his charitably-disposed colleagues of treason, his action is the more regrettable because the non-Jewish section of Englishmen will be roused to action which otherwise they could not contemplate. Is it, after all, characteristic of the Jewish people to supply our friends with ridiculous pretences to suspect us, and our enemies with weapons to destroy us?—Canadian Jewish Chronicle.

RUSSIA AND THE JEWS.

It was due to the Russian government's intolerant attitude toward Jews that the treaty between the United States and Russia was denounced and abrogated. American Hebrews, citizens by birth and naturalization, attempting to enter Russia, were stopped at the frontier. Their passports regularly issued by the State Department, were ignored or treated with contempt and they were turned back. As an example of the enlightenment of the ruling classes of Russia it is worth while to recall this, the familiar Muscovite attitude toward Jews and contempt for the opinion of civilization. Has Russia had a conversion as sudden and effective as that of Saul of Tarsus? It is sudden, at least, but as for the other, perhaps and perhaps not. We shall learn in time, of course. It would be something of assurance on the point were the Russian government to notify the United States of its wish to negotiate a new treaty along the liberal lines insisted upon by President Taft when the old treaty was denounced and ended. Russia is busy with war at the moment, but not too much so to express its desire, even if too busy to frame details until later. A treaty with the United States recognizing the rights of Jews in full equality with the rights of others would be a guarantee that recent pledges are of face value.—Pittsburgh, Pa., Chronicle.

JEWISH OFFICERS ADMITTED TO GERMAN ARMY.

Although there was no law prohibiting Jews from entering the German army, none had been commissioned up to the opening of the war. Since then, however, according to news received here, more than 150 Jews have received appointments.

"THE MERCHANT OF VENICE" ELIMINATED FROM THE CINCINNATI PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

During an affair given in the Jewish Settlement House of Cincinnati, Mr. Condon, the superintendent of the public schools, made the announcement that "The Merchant of Venice" had been eliminated from the literature course of the high school for the reason that the play is offensive to the Jewish people.

What Our Lodges Are Doing

HOREB LODGE, NEW HAVEN, CONN.

The possibilities of a lodge room to serve as a forum wherein matters pertaining to the general welfare of a people to which the members therein congregated belong, can be discussed and brought home to their knowledge, were never before more clearly demonstrated than at a meeting of Horeb Lodge that was held Sunday night, Sept. 27, 1914. The hall was crowded with members, who had come to witness the initiation of several men into the Order and to listen to Rabbi Louis Mann, of Temple Mishkan Israel.

Rabbi Mann was introduced by President Samuel J. Witz, who stated that the broad patriotic spirit of the Jews was due to the deep and comprehensive knowledge of the history, traditions and ideals of their people, that as long as there were young men inspired to ask as Rabbi Mann did to be sent "to contribute a share, however small, in working out the destiny of a people with a history more noble, more heroic and more filled with sacrifice, than which there is none in the annals of the world, and to aid in solving the unique problems of Judaism in the east, to voice their desire in as eloquent a manner as did Rabbi Mann at his installation, the integrity of the Jewish nation was safe, its future existence was assured, and no external force, however strong, could vanquish it.

When Rabbi Mann rose to speak, he was given a splendid ovation. Rabbi Mann took for his text a passage from the lesson in the Bible that had been read on New Year's Day in every synagogue throughout the world, and clearly expounded the importance of unity of thought, purpose and action on the part of every Jew who ardently desired the betterment of the spiritual, physical and social conditions of his brethren. He said that the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith was an admirable medium by which it was possible to carry these high purposes into practical effect. Rabbi Mann complimented the members upon the character of the meeting and expressed the hope of being able to participate in many more meetings in connection with his work in New Haven.

After he had concluded his remarks, the members of the lodge were individually introduced to him, and the repeated expressions of satisfaction at the ideas advanced by Rabbi Mann showed clearly that he had struck a responsive cord.

DR. J. LEONARD LEVY ADDRESSES CINCINNATI LODGE.

In spite of the inclement weather a large audience assembled Monday evening, Oct. 26, 1914, in the Reading Road Temple to listen to an address on "The B'nai B'rith and the Union of American Hebrew Congregations" by Dr. J Leonard Levy of Pittsburgh. Rabbi Jacob Mielziner, chairman of the Intellectual Advancement Committee of the Lodge, presided and introduced the speaker.

Dr. Levy pointed out the origin of the B'nai B'rith and dwelt upon the good work it had accomplished. He also spoke of the history of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, and in the course of his argument stated that inasmuch as there could be no B'nai B'rith if there were no Jews it is incumbent upon the B'nai B'rith to contribute to the maintenance of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations. Dr. Levy spoke for over an hour, receiving the closest attention throughout and the very widest appreciation of the large audience.

Professor C. H. Grimm rendered several musical selections on the organ and Mr. P. Dreyfus gave the "Meditation from Thais" on the violin with organ accompaniment.

ZION LODGE, COLUMBUS, OHIO.

Zion Lodge No. 62, I. O. B. B., Columbus, Ohio, opened its fall term with a large and enthusiastic membership in attendance at the September meeting.

As a tribute to the President of District No. 2, Rev. Dr. Jos. Kornfeld, a member of the lodge, a class of 25 candidates was initiated.

This class of initiates was due to the activity of the new Propaganda Committee under the able leadership of its chairman, Mr. Aaron King.

A banquet followed the intiation, President Sam J. Herskowitz officiating as toastmaster.

Brother Jos. Kornfeld, President of District No. 2, delivered a most eloquent and inspiring address upon the work of the District.

Brother S. J. Kornhauser of Cleveland, Ohio, Vice-President of District No. 2, followed with an address regarding the active interest and co-operation of the members of the lodge.

Brother Julius Kiser of Indianapolis, Ind., read a most interesting paper prepared by his father who, unfortunately, was unable to attend, on the subject, "Why I Am a Ben B'rith," which was most interesting to all the members.

On behalf of the new class of initiates Brother Robert Felsman responded with a short talk, pledging that the class which was a most representative one, the majority all young professional men, would be more than active in all the affairs of the Order.

The meeting was one of the most interesting that Zion Lodge had enjoyed for some time.

Zion Lodge No. 62, I. O. B. B., Columbus, Ohio, celebrates its fiftieth anniversary in 1915, and in its honor the convention for the District will be held in Columbus, Ohio, in 1915.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.

At a meeting of Isaac Lodge No. 87 of Milwaukee, Wis., held on Oct. 15, 1914, the following program was carried out:

"Chronological Notes About Jews," by Joel Rubin.

"Discussion on the Present World's War and Its Possible Effect on the Jew"; from the religious viewpoint, by Rabbi Chas. S. Levi; from the sociological viewpoint, by Chas. Friend.

The above discussion aroused great interest among the members, and the meeting was voted an unusually successful one.

COVENANT LODGE, DULUTH, CELEBRATES B'NAI B'RITH DAY.

B'nai B'rith Day was celebrated by Covenant Lodge No. 569 of Duluth, Minn., on Friday evening, Oct. 30, 1914, at Temple Emanuel.

In the absence of Dr. Maurice Lefkowitz, the rabbi of the congregation, services were conducted by the lodge, and the B'nai B'rith Day address was delivered by Mr. Gustavus Loevinger of St. Paul, who chose for his subject "Selling the Shadow."

A large audience was present in honor of the occasion and also to observice the tenth anniversary of the institution of Covenant Lodge.

Value of a Shadow.

Citing the old fable of the Jew, who sold his shadow for a pot of gold, and, who, on discovering later the real value of a shadow, bought it back. Mr. Loevinger declared that the real shadow of the Jewish race is its mission in this world, that of teaching the common brotherhood of man and fatherhood of God. If a man sells his Judaism for social position, political power or commercial success, declared the speaker, he is selling his shadow.

"The selling of Judaism," said Mr. Loevinger, "means the selling of Israel's real mission in life. And the world needs the Jew more today than at any other time in all history. Look at the persecution in the Balkan states, the Beilis trial, the closing of schools in Berlin, Vienna and Paris against the Jew and look in our own country to see the injustice, intolerance and persecution. Can we afford to lose our shadow? The Gentile needs the lesson more than we do.

"Look at Europe, where men are killing one another not by the hundreds, not by the thousands, but by hundreds of thousands. In the South, the white man is persecuting the negro; in China, the white man is persecuting the yellow man, and in Peru, the white man is perscuting the Indian. Yea, the Gentile needs the lesson more than the Jew, the lesson of the common brotherhood of man and the fatherhood of God.

Mission of B'nai B'rith.

"The purpose of the B'nai B'rith is to teach the Jew that he has a shadow. This organization teaches the Jew, orthordox and reformed alike, his mission in life, it tells him that there is still work to be done in overthrowing bigotry and intolerance. It tells him that he must follow in the footsteps of his fathers and continue in destroying the walls of prejudice and hate against the Jew. The Jew must be a crusader, not like the one of old but as the Jew going to the land where his brothers are oppressed. And never has an appeal been made from any country, but what the B'nai B'rith stepped in and gave its share. Besides all this, it has established schools, hospitals and sanitariums throughout the world. Its mission, therefore, is to teach the real value of a shadow."

At the close of the entertainment, an informal reception was held in honor of Mr. Loevinger.

RAMAH LODGE, CHICAGO.

Ramah Lodge No. 33 held an unusually well-attended meeting on the evening of Oct. 8, 1914. The special order of business was the consolidation of Ramah Lodge with Northwestern Lodge of the same city, which was consummated under the auspices of the District Grand Lodge, represented by Brothers B. J. Samuels and Dr. H. I. Davis, First and Second Vice-Presidents of the District Grand Lodge, respectively. A class of candidates was initiated by the degree team of the lodge and a large number of new petitions for membership were presented.

The appeal of the Order for contributions to aid the war sufferers aroused a sympathetic and animated discussion, with the result that an appropriation of $1,000 from the treasury of the lodge was unanimously voted and a collection from the members present at the meeting amounted to more than $600. The lodge also appointed a large committee to solicit contributions from individual members, and it is expected that several thousand dollars will be secured. Addresses on the good and welfare of the Order were made by the visiting Grand Lodge officers and many members of the lodge.

OFFICIAL VISITATIONS OF THE DEPUTIES FOR MASSACHUSETTS.

The State Deputies of Massachusetts of District No. 1 met on Oct. 14th at the Nayasset Club, Springfield, Mass., and have selected the dates for their official visitations. They have also decided to send out letters to each lodge under their jurisdiction, requesting the presidents of the different lodges to inform them what is lacking in their respective lodge in order to make it one of the leaders in the District and informing them that they are ready to assist them in that direction. On the day of their visitation they expect to have a conference with the officers of the lodge earlier in the evening and talk over matters pertaining to the welfare of the lodge. A similar circular like the one enclosed has been mailed to each member in the state. They have also made an insignia of the office for each Deputy which they intend to wear at the visitations. It consists of a light blue silk band with the following inscription in gold letters: "State Deputy of District No. 1, I. O. B. B." and the Order's emblem. They will wear full dress. The Deputies are working with the object of having Massachusetts lodges take the lead in the District.

Billadeaux and Trender and Al Franks, of the Tivoli, entertained with songs and a monologue. The meeting emphasized the fact that the order is now making preparations toward gathering a large sum to help relieve the distress incident to the European war. The committee in charge of the affair included Benjamin Levin, N. E. Spear and Samuel Fisher.

VICTORIA, B. C.

At the request of the Grand President, District Deputy I. Lancaster paid an official visit to Victoria Lodge No. 758 at its last meeting.

A large membership gathered. He was introduced by the president, Brother Dr. S. M. Hartman, and spoke upon "B'nai B'rith."

The three working tools of the order—benevolence, brotherly love and harmony—were explained by Brother Lancaster. Benevolence teaches us to do good unto all mankind, brotherly love unto our immediate circle and the combination of the two will bring harmony and unite us into one sacred band.

The deputy explained that committees are now working, looking into the ways and means of facilitating the immigration question when the Panama Canal is finished and those who felt the pangs of oppression in Russia and Roumania decide to come to this country and our friendly neighbor, the United States, to make their home.

He spoke eloquently and enthusiastically and saw a great future for Victoria Lodge.

Incidentally there were six new candidates balloted for.

HOREB LODGE OF NEW HAVEN ALIVE TO ITS DUTY.

The meeting of Horeb Lodge No. 25 of New Haven, Conn., held on Sunday evening, Oct. 25, 1914, set the high water mark for attendance. The special feature of the meeting was an address by Prof. Chas. F. Kent of Yale College on the subject, "Five Universal Ideas of Judaism."

He spoke upon the universal ideas of Judaism and showed how they were as well adapted to the ideas of the present day as they were to the ideas of ancient days. In discussing the war, he said that it had been predicted by the prophets of Israel, and that to them the conflict had been inevitable. He also said that, as the life of Christ had been one of self-sacrifice, so the mainspring of Jewish life and Jewish faith had been self-sacrifice.

Upon the recommendation of the Grand Lodge, the lodge voted the sum of $1,000 as an appropriation out of the funds of the lodge for the relief of the sufferers from the war. In addition to this generous appropriation a local committee consisting of the most prominent and active members of the lodge was appointed for the purpose of obtaining individual subscriptions to the fund now being raised by the Order, and it is expected that an additional $5,000 will be raised bv the members of the lodge.

The recruiting teams are busy with their undertaking to enlist into membership as many of the best class of Jews as they can reach, and all indications point to a decided increase in membership.

Benjamin Lubinsky, to whom was entrusted the duty of organizing a new degree team, is doing splendid work along these lines, and Horeb Lodge will soon have a degree team that will uphold the high standard set by teams of former years.

JERICHO LODGE, PITTSBURGH, PA.

Preparations are now in progress for a big meeting of Jericho Lodge No. 44 to be held on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 22, 1914. Committees having in charge the preparations for this meeting are arranging for addresses and other interesting numbers for the entertainment of those who attend. Mr. Sigmund Livingston of Chicago, chairman of the Anti-Defamation League, who will be the principal speaker of the occasion, will address the gathering on the work performed by this particular branch of the Order. A feature of the day will be a large class initiation to be conducted by the efficient degree team of the lodge.

VICTORIA, B. C.

The Simchas Thorah ball, given under the auspices of Victoria Lodge No. 758 of Victoria, British Columbia, on Monday evening, Oct. 12, 1914, was a great success. Almost the entire Jewish community attended and enjoyed the affair. It being Canadian Thanksgiving Day, the occasion gave all an opportunity to make the preparations, and the hall was tastefully decorated and looked very inviting. During the evening refreshments were served by the committee having charge of the affair, and much credit is due the committee for its splendid work.

COVENANT LODGE, DULUTH, MINN.

Under the auspices of Covenant Lodge No. 568 of Duluth, Minn., the annual fall banquet was held at the Holland Hotel on the evening of Oct. 6, 1914. Mr. J. J. Robinson, president of the lodge, presided, and short talks were delivered by Dr. Maurice Lefkovits. Chas. D. Oreckovsky, A. B. Kapplin and Solomon Sachs of Eveleth, Minn. The principal topic of discussion was how to provide for the great influx of immigrants which will be the result of the present war in Europe and to aid in their distribution and removal from the congested districts in the East.

Arrangements were also made by the lodge for the observance of B'nai B'rith Day on Oct. 30th, which will be held at the Temple Emanuel. Rabbi Lefkovits also outlined the program of papers to be read by the members during the winter. These will deal with the Jews of the world and will be specially interesting on account of the European war.

ABRAHAM LIPPMAN LODGE.

The entertainment and corn roast given by Abraham Lippman Lodge No. 672 of Pittsburgh, Pa., in September was a pronounced success, the attendance being unusually large, more than 300 members and friends of the lodge being present, including delegations from the lodges of McKeesport and Braddock.

The program was of high order and consisted of vocal and musical numbers and the rendering of short sketches, which proved exceedingly realistic. The affair was the first of a series of social events which the lodge intends to hold during the present season. The propaganda committee is being ably supported by the lodge at large in its attempt to make social and fraternal life one of the important features of the lodge.

GAN EDEN LODGE, TERRE HAUTE, IND.

Gan Eden Lodge No. 110 of Terre Haute, Ind., renewed its activities after the summer vacation with a rousing meeting held on Sept. 6, 1914, at which the work of the District Grand Lodge was discussed and the election of Past President Harry Schloss as delegate to the convention of the Order in San Francisco was received with much satisfaction.

An elaborate report of the work of the Anti-Defamation League was presented and the paper of Brother Billikopf on Social Service Work was discussed. The lodge appointed a special propaganda committee, with the object of securing new members and to increase the membership of the lodge by the end of the year to 150.

LOS ANGELES LODGE PREPARES TO RECEIVE AND ENTERTAIN DELEGATES TO THE CONSTITUTION GRAND LODGE CONVENTION.

Under the title of "The Ways and Means Committee," Los Angeles Lodge No. 487 of Los Angeles, Cal., appointed a large committee, composed of some of its most influential members, of which Mr. Geo. N. Black is chairman, to devise ways and means to entertain the visiting delegates to the Constitution Grand Lodge convention in 1915. The committee has tentatively decided to arrange an automobile tour throughout the city and its environments and a banquet. The committee also plans to have a special meeting of the lodge take place during the stay of the delegates and to secure a large class of candidates which will be initiated by the degree team composed of visiting delegates.

The principal addresses were delivered by Mrs. Henry Solomon of Chicago and Rabbi Morris M. Feuerlicht of Indianapolis. A general discussion followed, participated in by Dr. H. I. Davis, Rabbi Gerson B. Levi, Mr. Hugo Sonnenschein and others. Mr. Julius H. Meyer acted as chairman and acquitted himself most admirably.

LOS ANGELES, CAL.

At a meeting of Los Angeles Lodge No. 487 of Los Angeles, Cal., on Oct. 27, 1914, a debate on the Eight Hour Amendment Law was held which was participated in by Brothers W. W. Bearman and Harry Goldman.

The educational committee of the lodge has decided to open a course of lectures in the Temple street district of the city. It is planned to give all those who will attend the opportunity of learning somewhat of the history of the country, of its national laws, of civic hygiene and other worthy subjects.

Nov. 11th next has been set for the visit of the Grand President of the District, Brother Morris N. Schneider of Oakland, and on that evening the lodge will hold a class initiation and smoker. It is expected that the full membership will be in attendance.

The social committee of the lodge is making arrangements for an entertainment and dance to be held under the auspices of the lodge in December.

A class of 18 candidates was initiated by the degree team consisting of Brothers Chas. L. Aarons, Max Ascher and Harry Marks. SAGINAW, MICH.

A well attended meeting of Saginaw Lodge No. 636 was held on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 1, 1914, at the Odd Fellows' Hall. The special order of business was the initiation of a class of candidates conducted by the degree team of Bay City Lodge No. 178. The work was done in an exemplary manner and evoked much applause.

Delegations from the nearby lodges located in Bay City and Flint were present. The Grand Lodge was represented by Brothers Edward Sonnenschein, chairman of the Propaganda Committee, and A. B. Seelenfreund, Secretary of the District Grand Lodge, who made a special trip to pay an official visit to the Lodge.

Addresses were delivered by the visiting officers, Brother Sonnenschein speaking on the work of the Order and tracing its history from its organization up to the present time. Brother Seelenfreund spoke upon the condition of the Jews abroad, closing his remarks with an appeal for funds in response to the call issued by the Executive Committee of the Order. Almost $200 was collected from among the members present and at the conclusion of the regular order of business and closing of the Lodge, the doors were opened to the public and a large number of ladies and friends of the Lodge availed themselves of the privilege of attending the open meeting, which was presided over by Brother Ed Lichtig of Bay City Lodge. Addresses were made for the good and welfare of the Order and on subjects of interest to Judaism. The meeting was a great success, and thanks are due to the committee that had charge of its arrangements.

RESOLUTIONS.

We stand in the shadow of a great sorrow—our brother Joseph Hirsch has gone to join the silent majority. Death loves a shining mark, and when our belover brother was called to his final rest, all Judaism wept. The shock is too great, the grief too poignant, the calamity too overwhelming for us to fully recognize and appreciate at this moment the loss we have sustained. But to us, his brothers of District No. 5, who knew him best in his highest endeavors, as a man, as a citizen, as an Israelite, as an American, we mourn his untimely end, and with us the liberal-minded and intelligent men of all creeds, the loss of an unselfish, wise, and patriotic citizen.

It is a beautiful custom of our fathers to remember the dear departed, for memories of the dead have a treasury of example and precept upon which the living may draw for ideals and incentives. Gate City Lodge No. 144, in convention assembled, wishes to give expression to its sense of grief in the loss of our beloved brother: therefore, be it

Resolved that in the death of Brother Joseph Hirsch, the Independent Order B'nai B'rith has sustained an irreparable loss—that it has been deprived of a wise and energetic leader, and Judaism of a loyal, earnest devotee.

Resolved that we extend to his widow and family our deepest sympathy in their boreavement.

Resolved further, that this expression of our sorrow and our love be spread upon the Minutes of our Lodge, and a coyp thereof sent to his widow and family, with whose tears join our own, and with whose grief our grief commingles.

LEONARD HAAS, Chairman.
MILTON KLEIN,

Conditions in Russian Poland

By GEORG BRANDES

I. An Introduction.

The war raging in and out of Europe does not give the experienced much reason to hope. The immense mischiefs daily caused by it are certain enough. The benefits which are expected to result from it, and of which the various nations dream differently, are so incertain that they cannot possibly be reckoned upon. Before those who had sympathy with the deep national misfortune of the Polish people, there arose the shadow of the reunion and emancipation of this thrice severed people under extensive autonomy, and most probably under the protection and supremacy of a Great Power.

For the present we are far away. Polanders are, compelled by necessity, fighting against each other in the Prussian, Austrian and Russian armies. Not the smallest attempt towards emancipation has been made either in Prussian Posen or in the Russian "Kingdom" or in Austrian Galicia. We might even say that the dismemberment at present is going deeper than ever before, as it is also cleaving the minds.

The only fact which might suggest a future union is the manifesto of the Grand Duke Nikolaj the Russian captain general to the Polanders issued in the middle of August. It began: "Polanders the hour has struck in which the holy dream of your fathers and grandfathers may be fulfilled. Let the borders cutting asunder the Polish people be effaced, let them in common unite under the scepter of the Czar. Under this scepter Poland will regenerate free in religion, language, and autonomy."

And it ended in the following way: "The dawn of a new life is beginning to you. In this dawn let the sign of the cross, the symbol of the sufferings and the resurrection of the people shine."

Although this manifesto with its surprising love of liberty, its pious reference to the cross wore the stamp of having been enforced by the circumstances and although one had been accustomed not to consider promises from the Russian government about full constitutional liberty and the like, as those given before had not meant very much either in Finland or in Russia itself, still the manifesto as a sign of the times was well calculated to make impression on the great masses who had always before heard the authorities stamp as criminal plots, as high treason what now suddenly from supreme place was called "the holy dream of the forefathers."

The purpose of the proclamation was probably before all to hinder a revolt in Russian Poland, the moment hostile troops should invade it. On the Austrian Polanders the manifesto seems to have failed its intended effect. As these enjoy full autonomy in Galicia and for a century have witnessed the severity and cruelty with which their kinsmen in Russian Poland have been kept down, they received the proclamation with loud vows of their faithfulness to the house of Habsburg, nay all the sokol—societies which in time of peace (keeping a decision in view) had trained in games and use of arms, placed themselves as Polish legions at the disposal of the government against the Russians. But that was not all. The Ruthenian inhabitants of Galicia, one half of the population of the country, founded a league for the release of Ukraine and flooded Europe from the 25th of August with notifications and descriptions hostile to Russia. The founders did not keep back their names. They are D. Donzow, W. Doroschenko, M. Melenewsky, A. Skoropyss-Joltuchowsky, N. Zalizniak, A. Zuk.

And it has very soon proved that in spite of the proclamation of the independence of Poland the Czar at any rate does not include East Galicia in Poland whether the inhabitants are regarded or treated as Polanders or Ruthenians. The Russians were hardly in Lemberg before this town and the whole East Galicia in the orders of the day were called old Russian land and the inhabitants described as Russians whom their brothers had now come to set free.

What impression the imperial manifesto made in Posen is hardly to be proved as each hostile remark against Prussia would have been punished as high-treason.

The German emperor has, however, no less than the Russian Czar been courting the favor of the Polanders and tried to gain them through promises. One month after the issue of the Czar's manifesto a proclamation from von Morgen, the German lieutenant-general, was stuck up in the governments of Lomza and Warsaw. In this the following sentences are to be found: "Arise and drive away with me those Russian barbarians who made you slaves, drive them out of your beautiful country which shall now get back her political and religious liberty. That is the will of my mighty and gracious king." Knowing the passion with which the Polanders hitherto have been driven away from their soil and persecuted because of their language we learn from this proclamation that the German government has felt the necessity of outbidding the Czar.

As far as may be seen the Czar's manifesto made very little impression on the intellectual in Russian Poland, who of course received it with much suspicion. The masses in Russian as in Austrian Poland were for some time standing passionately against each other accusing each other of treason to the holy cause of their native-country, until now a new party has been formed which politically is the most unripe but just for that reason has had an enormous growth. Its password is this: "We do not want to know of Russia nor of Austria; we want only one thing: the Polish state without assistance of guardianship from any side." In other words; they want the quite impossible. It brings its own punishment to a people to have been politically crushed for almost one and a half centuries. Political skill in such a people too easily becomes local-patriotism, or it remains in the state of innocence.

Of what use is it to begin singing: Polonia fara da se. That Poland cannot come right by itself is evident to anybody who has any political ideas.

Still I am inclined to say: never mind, the forms which the Polish independence and thirst of liberty are taking, seem to go like a purifying storm through all Polish minds. Many times before a glorifying future apparently rose to the Polanders. 1812 when Napoleon began the second Polish campaign, 1830 when the Polanders were borne up by the sympathy of Europe, 1848 and 1863; but hardly ever has a change of established conditions appeared so possible and painful, and painful barriers never seemed so near the point of falling as under this great and dreadful crisis.

The person who through a generation has been busy with Polish and Russian affairs may therefore without much difficulty imagine how many young Polish hearts are now beating and burning with hope, expectation and the most noble intentions.

Nevertheless the state of affairs in Russian Poland, is at present desperate as it has never been before during war and revolt; and this is not due to the pressure of the conditions or the horror of the situation, but it is due to the Polanders themselves, to the overexcitement of the national feeling which sends out its breath of madness all over Europe and now whirls round in Polish brains to drive out magnanimity and humanity, not to speak of reason which on the whole in the year 1914 has no jubilee in Europe.

I dare truthfully say that for none other people have I felt the enthusiasm I have felt for the Polanders. I have revealed this feeling at a time when they were not the order of the day and when only very few shared this feeling. I pronounced it long ago but made so little to draw the attention of the Polanders to my writings about them or to reap their thanks for them that the Polanders did not discover my book about them till ten years after it appeared and after it had been by chance translated into German. To write in Danish, is as a rule, to write in water.

It would be very ungrateful of me on this occasion where I am obliged to use sharp words to the Polanders, not to remember the undescribable affection and kindness they have showed me in Russian Poland, as well as in Austria Poland. Among them I have found quite incomparable friends.

For a long time I therefore refused to say an unkind, not to mention an offensive, word. As early as 1898 I refused so absolutely to make myself the advocate of the Ruthenians against them that the Ruthenian leaders became my bitter enemies who never got tired of attacking me; and I was mute as a fish, when Bjornstjerne Bjornson not long before his death upon application of the Ruthenians attacked the Polanders, fortunately for them with so unreasonable exaggerations that the attacks did no harm. (Bjornson maintained that the Polander as such was the devil himself as the middle-ages had imagined him.) I knew better than Bjornson what might be said against electioneering geometry and pressure on electors in Galicia, but I remained silent because I considered it unworthy to attack a people who was in such a difficult position and who was able to defend many minor injustices committed by it in self-defence. I considered it especially as impossible for me to attack the Polanders to whom I was bound by honor and towards whom I bore the warmest most sincere sympathy.

It is therefore with no light heart I write these lines.

Denial of the rights of man to Jewish subjects belongs to the nature of Russia. Now and then Europe has been startled when an uncommon massacre of innocent Jews has taken place as in Kisheneoff, but all have known and know that Russia stows together her Jewish population in the Polish outskirts of the realm, stows them together so tightly that they can neither live nor die, denies them the liberty of moving, liberty of studying, even the right of school—and university—education beyond a certain (too small) percentage. Only such Jews as hold a university-degree are allowed to live in the capitals of the empire; no young Jewish woman is allowed to take up her abode near the universities in Petersborg or Moskva, unless she has been inscribed as a prostitute, and it has happened that the police have made their appearance and complained of her forgery, in that she did not carry on the profession but instead was reading in scientific books. If a man is for instance a doctor of medicine he may go to take up his abode in Moskva; in case he is married his wife may live there with him. But if the couple has a two years' old child the mother is not allowed to take it with her into the railway-carriage or let it live with her in the capital. For the child has no right to live there. If this right is wanted a detailed petition must be sent in to the governor-general in whose power it is to grant or refuse it.

In a few of the cases where plunder and murder of a Jewish population in Russia have taken place the outrages have partly been excused or at any rate explained through the almost incomprehensible ignorance of the peasants. Russia's most famous political economist, who at the same time is a great estate owner has told me, that when the elections to the first Duma took place he was informed that each of the peasants on his estate had voted for himself. He asked them, surprised, what they meant and explained to them that in this way none of them could be elected; but they said, does not each deputy get so many rubles a day? Yes. And do you think that we would leave so much money to another if we perhaps might get it ourselves.

The same prominent estate owner told me that one day he asked some of his peasants, if they really had partaken in a Pogrom which had taken place in the neighboring parish—he could not believe it, as they looked so good-natured. To his astonishment they answered yes, and when he asked them the reason they answered: "You know it very well." They then explained that they had killed these Jews, because they had killed their Saviour. "But," said he, "that is so long ago. It was not they who did it and it was not done in this country." To which they in astonishment exclaimed: "Is it long ago? We thought it was last week." It appeared that they had understood from the pope's explanation, that the crucifixion had taken place then and there.

Under such conditions one can not be surprised at any outrage. But to see the hatred of the Jews spread in Russian Poland, where people are able to read and write, that must and with right, fill one with wonder. A great number of Jews in the old Polish kingdom originate in the days of Casimir the Great (1309-1370), who out of love of his concubine Esther opened his country to the Jews and gave them favorable circumstances. Since then the number has increased as the Czars locked up all their Jewish subjects there, where they had to suffer every possible hardship, living separated and with a special dress like the Jews of Denmark at the time of Holberg. They have, however, felt and suffered as Polish patriots. As early as 1794 a regiment of Jewish volunteers fought under Kosciuszko; their colonel fell in 1809. In 1830 the shallow Polish National government refused the Jews' petition to be allowed to enter the army. As they then ventured to apply for admission to the Polish publice-schools Nikolaj I punished them letting 36,000 families be carried away to the steppes of South Russia, where the enlistment of children overtook them. All their small boys from the age of six years were sent to Archangelsk in cossac custody to be trained as sailors. They died in multitudes on the way.

The mischief which befell all the inhabitants of Poland, regardless of their creeds for some time kept down the hatred of the Jews which is always lurking in the masses. The great men of Poland hindered the development of it. Adam Mickiewicz, Poland's greatest author, went so far that in his chief-work, Poland's national epos Pan Tadeusz (1834) he makes a Jewish innkeeper one of the most sympathetic leading characters. He is introduced in the fourth canto as a genius of music, the great master of the national instrument the Cymbal; and Mickiewicz makes as the culmination and end of his poem the moment when Jankiel before Dombrowski himself plays the Dombrowski marche, nay the whole history of Poland symbolical from 1791-1812, the year in which the poem takes place, the Napoleon year.

At the year 1860 the equalization of the Jews with the Catholics was in Warsaw a reality, and when in February, 1861 at two large public places in Warsaw the Russians had fired on the kneeling masses singing the national anthem (Z dymem pozarow) the Jews felt impelled to show their national disposition through an unmistakable manifestation.

They accompanied in masses their rabbins into the Catholic churches just as the Christians in masses entered the synagogues to sing the same hymn.

This last feature, the processions of the two creeds into each others' churches singing the same impressive song made such an impression on Henrik Ibsen, the great Scandinavian poet, that again and again he returned in his conversations to this as something of the greatest and most beautiful he had experienced.

And now under the whirlstorm of madness which nationalism has chased across Europe all this is lost; nay from a religious reconciliation it has been turned into flaming hatred between the races.

II. Facts.

In 1912 the election of a deputy to the Duma was to take place in Warsaw. The population of the town consists of between 7 and 8 hundred thousand. As among those there are 3 hundred thousand Jews and between these the majority of electors, it was in the power of that majority to elect a Jewish deputy. Of Polish national feeling, however, they gave up this right as they wanted Warsaw as the capital of the kingdom of Poland to be represented by a man who not only by disposition but also by race was a Polander. Of the Polish committee they only demanded that the party concerned was no enemy to the Jews. It proved, however, that the committee in its arrogance would not at all deal with them and proposed Kucharschewski, a pronounced antisemitic candidate and a man who publicly declared that he desired his election to the Duma only to work for the extermination of the Jews of Poland. By the way it is strange to notice how the word exterminate which 30 years ago in the days of Bismarck and Edward von Hartmann as Ausrotten was subject to the curse and condemnation of the Polanders has now come to honor and how easily it passes their lips.

As the Jews of course could not vote on such a man they urgently asked the committee to propose another candidate not inimical to them. This reasonable request was refused with coarseness and Kucharschewski's candidature maintained. Because of that the Jews were obliged to look about for another candidate of Polish family who was fit for the position and was not inimical to them. In spite of numerous applications they did not succeed in finding such a man; in the last moment when all attempts had failed Jagello, the social-democrat declared himself willing to accept the candidature of the Jews.

The only thing which in their eyes spoke for him was the fact that he was of pure Polish blood. As their leading men all belong to the higher middle-class, they did not share his views. But the state of affairs forced them to support him. Lord Beaconsfield always used to maintain that the natural disposition of the Jewish tribe was conservative, but foolish politics instead of encouraging the conservative instincts of the tribe forced it to cast its lot with the most extreme elements of the opposition. It has proved true here.

Jagello was elected.

The leading men in Russian Poland, who, as a matter of fact, through the whole new century had fought against the Jews although secretly for fear they should forfeit the sympathy of the intellectual aristocracy of Europe, used this electoral victory of the Jews forced upon them to throw the mask and openly act as their passionate enemies. The socalled cooperative movement worked up during the last twelve years and in itself being nothing but a differently called fight against the Jewish commerce now changed into a systematic and cruelly effective boycotting of the Jewish population. In private as in public life the openly pronounced password was: not to buy from Jews, not to associate with Jews.

At the head of this movement went the intelligence of Poland, among others some of its most famous authors, avowed freethinkers as Nemojewski nay as Alexander Swientochowski. Literary life presents many changes, metamorphoses, which in thoroughness are not so much inferior to those of Ovid. A great deal is necessary to make one, who for a half century has witnessed the want of character among writers, feel even the slightest surprise. But I should willingly have sworn that I should never have lived to see Alexander Swientochowski as a Nationalist —he the most uncompromising adversary of the Nationalism, who endured a good deal for his conviction—to see the poet of Chawa Rubin as an antisemitic chief. Not only does all that Alexander Swientochowski wrote rise against him but also the words, the powerful words issued from his mouth in his palmy days.

The whole Polish press placed itself at the disposal of this movement. Young Polish louts were posted outside the Jewish shops and ill-treated the Christian women and children who wanted to buy there. By means of the well-known Dumowski a new paper Dwa Groszi was started, which simply invited to Pogroms. It soon came to bloody struggles. Polish undergraduates killed an old Jew in the Sliska street in Warsaw. In the little town of Welun peasants poured naphtha on the house of a Jew and put fire to it, whereby a large family was put to death. Similar cases are to be found in several other places, until the Russian government stopped this pogrom-movement in order to hinder the Polish nationalism from getting stronger.

The polish priests in the villages incited from the pulpit to boycotting of and war against the Jews. After the sentence in the Beilis-action the Polish newspapers were almost alone in publishing in circulars the information that Beilis had been acquitted but that the existence of religious murder had been satisfactorily proved. Nay the freethinker Nemojewski wrote a book, in which he maintained the monstrous lie, that Jewish religious murders are facts and travelled all over the country with an agitatorial lecture to the same purpose.
whose characters were so undisputed,

Under these circumstances the Jews in Russian Poland, turned to the few men, whose names were so esteemed or that their words could not be unheeded.

Ladislas Mickiewicz, the excellent son of the great Mickiewicz, who had passed his whole life in Paris first as a publisher and translator of the works of his father and then as a Polish patriotic author, convened together with some other prominent men a great meeting at Warsaw to restore the inner peace. In vain he begged and besought his countrymen, who had enemies enough otherwise, not to act as enemies of the Jews, who had always been their friends. No Polish newspaper gave any report of his speech.

All this took place before the war. The provisional result was the economical destruction of the Russian-Polish Jews. But now during the war the glow of the bloody hatred of the Jews has blazed out with far stronger flames and the Russian government has hitherto done nothing to subdue or quench the fire.

During the mobilization several Polish newspapers, for instance the Glos Lubelski, brought the alarming news in heavy type: In England great pogroms against the Jews. The English government does not hinder them. The paper was conscious of the lie. But the question was to set an example to follow.

When the want of gold and silver began to be felt, the Polish newspapers accused the Jews of hiding the noble metals. On closer examination it was found out, that many not Jewish business people (for instance Ignaschewski in Lublin, a very rich Polander) were keeping back whole bags full of gold and silver coins, for which they were punished rather severely; but this was not proved about a single Jew.

Further the Jews were among other things accused of having in a coffin smuggled one and a half million rubles in gold into Germany; and the protest against the accusation entered by the representatives and ministers of the Jewish congregation of Warsaw was printed in Russian papers but not in a single Polish one.

All these things were preparations for pogroms; but many others were made. The Anti-Semites printed a proclamation in Yiddish, in which the Jews were called upon to revolt against Russia; they took care that this proclamation was put into the pocket of the unsuspecting Jews in the streets of the different towns; those who had distributed the papers denounced the party concerned to the police. Everybody with whom the proclamation was found was shot.

At last the Jews were quite as in the middle ages both in word and writing accused of having poisoned the wells. If some cossacks or other Russian soldiers died the Polanders accused the Jews of having caused it.

The chief accusation was, however, the accusation of espionage, which obtained general credence and was used both when Austrian troops came to some town or village and when Russian troops expelled the Austrians. The result was the same. A suitable number of Jews were conscientiously shot by the Russians as well as by the Austrians. There are, however, lists of those, who really have been unmasked as spies. A Potocki was among them and had to pay for it with his life; but no Jewish name is found on these lists.

The accusation is, however, always believed, as the Jew has through about two thousand years been characterized as Judas.

The legend about Judas may without exaggeration be described as one of the most foolish legends made in the antiquity; that it has been believed is one proof among thousand of the indescribable simplicity of mankind. Few legends carry like it the stamp of falsehood on their faces, and few legends have millennium after millennium caused such an amount of mischief and horror. It has tortured and murdered by the hundred thousands.

According to the supposition the story is impossible. The supposition is that a man in possession of superhuman attributes, a god or a demi-god, day after day goes about and speaks in the open air in a town and its neighborhood. So little he makes a secret of his doings that a short time before he made his entry at broad day-light, welcomed with exultation by the whole population. He is known by each and all, by each woman and each child. So little He seeks to hide Himself, that He walks about accompanied by His disciples, preaching at day and at night, sleeping among them. And yet it was necessary to buy one of His disciples to denounce him and deliver him up, to betray Him, and that—for the sake of the effect—with a kiss! Indeed if He had hid Himself in some cellar then there were some meaning in it; but as things were, those who sought Him need only have asked, "Which of you is Jesus? He would not have tried to deny His name.

Judas is then not only quite superfluous but an absurdity, the origin of which is to be found in the desire to place the black traitor opposite to the white hero of light and of the awakening hatred of Jews arising among the first Gentile Christians, who by and by made the world forget that not only this straw-doll of a Judas, but also Jesus and all apostles, all disciples, and all evangelists were Jews.

Nevertheless in the conception of the rude masses this Judas — as he was called—has become the Jew, the typical Jew, the traitor, and the spy

Still as late as in the last decennium of the last century Captain Alfred Dreyfus fell a victim to this old foolish legend.

And now it is again rehashed against the Jews in Russian Poland.

The pogroms have by virtue of these Judas-accusations and the many other dreadful accusations spread all over great parts of Russian Poland and there they extend more and more, while Galicia as well as Posen have proved susceptible to the incitations, which have not failed. Many hundred innocent people have fallen victims to them.

Here are a few instances from the many:

In the town of Bechava, conquered by the Austrians, the Polish leaders, among whom was a very well-known estate owner, applied to the Austrian commandant, accusing the Jews of secret connection with the Russian army. In consequence of this the Austrians killed a 67-year-old man called Wallstein and his 17-year-old son. When after a short time the Austrians were driven away, the same estate owner accused the Jews of the town to the Russian commandant of being in connection with the Austrians, having delivered up to them all provisions for the purpose of depriving the Russians of them. In consequence of that many Jews were shot and their houses burnt down.

In the towns of Janow and Krasnik the Jews were accused of having put out mines to destroy the Russians. The Jews and among them many children were hung on the telegraph poles and the two towns destroyed.

The town of Samosch was conquered by Austrian Sokol troops, these beautiful slender people, whom you do not forget when once you have seen them train in the capital of Galicia. When they were driven away by the Russian army, the Polanders accused the Jews of the town to have been the accomplices of the Austrians. Twelve Jews were arrested. When they denied, they were sentenced to death. Five of them were already hanged when in the middle of the execution a Russian pope carrying an image of the Virgin in his hand appeared and with his hand on this image took the oath that the Jews were innocent and that it was all the outcome of Polish hatred of the Jews. He proved that the Polanders of the town themselves had supported the Austrians and that even a telephone connection with Lemberg was to be found. The seven Jews were then set free, the five having already been hanged.

In the town of Jusefow the Jews were accused of having poisoned the wells, through which hundreds of cossacks had lost their lives. Seventy-eight Jews were killed, many women were ravished, houses and shops plundered.

Similar events happened and still happen daily by hundreds. Greater or smaller pogroms with murder, rape and plunder have thus taken place in the governments of Warsaw, Radom, Petrikow and Kelts.

Only a few Russian governors such as Korff in Warsaw, Kelepowski in Lublin, and the governors of Wilna, Petrikow and Grodno have spoken, although too late, against the pogroms; but neither the government nor the Polanders take these warnings seriously.

Eye-witnesses have told me about Jewish soldiers in the different lazarets, who have turned mad not through the unavoidable horrors of the war, but because of the pogroms they have witnessed in the towns they have passed. They mistake their own relations for those they have seen murdered, they think to see their own mothers, sisters or beloved ones in that situation. They are always raving about the same thing.

The pursuing of the Jews by the Russian-Polish anti-Semites is the more invidious under these circumstances, as 300,000 Jewish soldiers, among whom are many volunteers, are serving in the Russian army, and as the self-sacrifice of the army and the Red Cross hitherto was immeasurable. In the great congregations are special hospitals for Russian soldiers—regardless of their creeds —founded by Jews and with Jewish money. Not a few Jewish soldiers have already got the highest military distinctions, nay a few of them have even received them from Mr. Rennenkampf, the commander-in-chief himself, who used to be a zealous anti-Semite, as the Russian court on the whole is passionately anti-Semitic. The manifesto from the Czar To my dear Jewish subjects, which has been printed in French newspapers, has never been anything but invention.

While the usual accusation against the Jews in Russian-Poland was that of sympathizing with the Russians—for which they have no special reason—Mr. A. Warinski—who in Russia classes among the black ones, also called the true Russians—in "Politiken" has made the charge against them, that the German attempts at gaining the Polanders "have only had the effect wanted on the Russian and Polish Jews, as these elements, because of a psychological relation with the Prussians, feel disposed to place themselves at the side of Germany." This accusation and the arguments for it might express the culmination. The Jew shall and must be Judas. If it cannot be made in one way the opposite way is tried. Mr. Warinski does not speak one word about how many Jews have gone into the war as volunteers out of pure enthusiasm for Poland. They have not been able to believe, as I for my part cannot believe, that the last outcrop of nationalism in Russian Poland, is more than a temporary epidemic.

How could Russian-Polanders, in the long run, keep unfaithful to the only powers they have been able to appeal to, the only powers which gave heed to them. How can they who are fighting for their liberty after so many years ill-treatment be willing to seize an opportunity to ill-treat the only people who (to its misfortune) is in their power, the only people who have suffered far more and twenty times as long as they themselves; and the only people that is too strong to be destroyed through any ill-treatment. How can the Polanders, who sometimes were ruined as a state through the treachery of their own men, want to fling out the accusation of treason against a tribe who has never betrayed itself and who even in the deepest abasement never betrayed the only slavic tribe, who in the middle-ages, gave a refuge to its children.

XII.

BY PROF. GOTTHARD DEUTSCH, Ph.D.

The teacher was, in the period of transition following the first attempt at an improvement of the political condition of the Jews, in the thirties, the most popular person in the Kehillah. The clearest evidence of this fact is found in Jewish fiction. In the semi-Polish congregation of West Prussia, Aaron Bernstein gives us this picture in his charming novel, "Voegele der Magid." He makes the Bachur leave the Beth ha Midrash, where he spends his time studying the dead literature of the past, and come to Berlin where he shall equip himself to be a teacher. The same author, in his "Mendel Gibbor" presents to us the ideal—one is almost tempted to use "Utopia"—of the young peddler, transformed into a farmer. These two features, leading the Jew to agriculture and giving him a secular education, present an aspiration of the Jews shortly before the storm of 1848 swept off the mediaeval restrictions from which they were suffering. The same we find in Leopold Kompert's, the most genial of all Ghetto novelists' stories. His "Herr Lehrer," boarding with a widow, whose daughter he teaches with such great assiduity the penmanship of capital G, is as lovable as he is true to nature.

In our city, the school was opened in 1852. I am sorry now that I did not ask the first principal, David Loewy to give me the story of his early struggles. I unfortunately missed the acquaintance of his successor, Solomon Schuetz, subsequently principal of the Jewish school of Czernowitz, who spent the years of his retirement with his son, a judge in Bruex, the place where I was rabbi from 1887 to 1891. He arrived there after I had left. As a matter of more than personal interest I state that I am indebted to him for my name. As is a common practice among Jews, I was given the name of my grandfather, Eliezer, called in the Ghetto, Lesser Reb Salma Wolfen's, although our family name is already found on the tombstone of this grandfather's great grandfather, Joseph Deutsch, who died in 1723, and signed as "Joseph Teutsch" among the representatives of the provincial Jewry of Moravia the minutes of 1720. Officially, my grandfather was called Lazar Deutsch. My father, somewhat romantically inclined, wished to register my name as Eliezer, but Principal Schuetz, like all men of his station, an advocate of modernism, warned him against stigmatizing a child by such a name and proposed the fairly literal translation, Gotthard. Another story equally illustrative of the condition of that time, is the following: The teacher then was elected by the congregation. Previous to his election he was invited to present himself for a trial lesson in the school. As candidate, staying in town over Sabbath, Herr Schuetz was the guest of my uncle, Isaac Wiener, 1804-1897, called by us, Vetter Yizchak, who was then president of the congregation. Having given general satisfaction by his trial lesson, Schuetz left on Sunday morning, the congregation sending him in a farmer's wagon, called "Gelegenheit," to Raigern, the nearest railroad station, about eight miles distant. My aunt, the Muhme Chaile, wishing to shine as hostess, insisted that the Herr Lehrer take a plate of soup before leaving. This was quite an effort in those days, for the meat had to be bought Sunday morning, because the butcher killed the ox or cow which hardly occurred more than twice a week, Saturday night, and the meat was not ready for sale until Sunday morning. Adding to it the process of "making the meat kosher," which means soaking it for half an hour, keeping it in salt for an hour afterwards, and then washing it carefully, it required extra work to have a plate of fresh soup Sunday at 10 o'clock. Our friend Schuetz took of the soup without expressing any astonishment at Muhme Chaile's effort, so the good woman asked directly: "How is the soup, Herr Lehrer?" The latter, evidently not sufficiently acquainted with the difficulties of a housewife, replied: "Well, the main thing is to get something warm in your stomach, when you start on a long journey." Poor Muhme Chaile, who survived this shock for nearly thirty years, could never forgive him. I remember that the slightest allusion would arouse her indignation, and she would exclaim, "Such a boor! I gave him a plate of soup which the emperor would have relished, and he said, 'Eppes warmes!'"

My own recollections begin with a principal named Moses Kobler, a native of the Moravian village, Damborzitz, about 1864. Kobler was a typical representative of the school of transition, a good Hebrew scholar who occasionally contributed to a Hebrew periodical—I believe it was the "Kochebe Yizchak"—writing on Exegesis in the typical way of the post-Mendelssohnian school. The highest ambition was then still in spite of the progressing secularization of education, the training of a class of boys so that they should be able to translate the most difficult passages of the Bible, as the Prophet Isaiah, and to read Rashi's commentary on the Pentateuch. I was too young to participate in this instruction, but I remember the great delight with which we greeted the Herr Oberlehrer, when he gave us a lesson in Biblical history. This was something modern, for the old Jewish school limited itself to teaching Biblical history by the translation of the Biblical books. The school then had still three teachers. When it was opened in 1852 it had 105 pupils, because parents wished to avail themselves of the opportunity of giving their older children a better education, and at the same time, then, even as in my time, the school was considered a good place to keep the children off the streets and prevent them from doing mischief, under which category playing was reckoned, and so the school comprised children from the age of four to fifteen. In my days the number had been reduced to about 60. The main reason was the gradual decrease in population by migration to Bruenn and Vienna. Another reason was that the boys did not stay in school after they were ten years old, but were sent to Bruenn, where they attended the Realschule (Science High School). The "Gymnasium" (Classic High School) was very rarely chosen. By the time when I entered it, 1868, there was only one other local student besides myself who attended it. Few parents could harbor the ambition of shouldering the heavy expense of preparing a son for a professional career. In most instances the boys were sent to the Realschule to have a few years of higher education before entering business. Very exceptionally such cases had occurred before. I had a cousin, born in 1824, who studied medicine and practiced in one of the suburbs of Vienna. A somewhat older contemporary of his, Jacob Boehm, the first Jew to obtain the rank of staff surgeon in the Austrian army, who died in 1886, was a native of my place. Such cases required special efforts both on the part of the parents and of the student who had to help himself at least partly, during his years of study.

The school, though reduced in numbers, maintained three grades, which required a great sacrifice on the part of the congregation, as no subsidy from public funds was given up to 1888. No less admiration is due the teachers, who at best eked out a precarious existence, were subject to sudden discharge, had to put up with the whims not only of the trustees but of every member of the congregation, and could not expect any provision for their old age. The exact conditions of the salaries I do not remember, but since the salary of the rabbi elected in 1867 was not more than $200, the position of the teachers must not have been very enviable. The "Oberlehrer" had free residence in the school-building, while the second teacher was dependent on his salary, and the undoubtedly modest side-income which he obtained from private lessons. The third teacher was given no more than about 100 Gulden per annum, and depended for his maintainance on free meals, which the better situated members gave him in that way that he ate every week in a different family. Such a position was naturally considered just as a start in life. Still in my time, we had had as teachers men who had gone through some years of high school, and being unable to support themselves, chose the teacher's profession, as one which would sooner lead to self-support. The older teachers were, in most instances autodidacts. This was surely the case of our second teacher, Mandel Brunner. He was a native of our city, and had attended the Yeshibah of the Landrabbiner, Marcus Benedict, in Nickolsburg. It was one of his proud recollections to exhibit a note book containing some of the lectures of the celebrated Talmudist, and to tell the story, how he was present at the last lecture which the rabbi delivered previous to leaving for Karlsbad, where he died August 12, 1829. Like all men of his type, Mandel Brunner, when he reached the required age, married and engaged in business. His special line, I think, was taking a contract for toll-gate receipts, "Mauthpechter." At any rate, he was soon through with the money which his father-in-law gave him to start in business, and fell back on teaching as the next best thing that he could do. The congregation felt that as a poor man he ought to have the first chance, and so he was elected serving until in 1868 the school was taken over by the state, which gave him not merely a better salary and a life position, but also a pension.

His method of teaching was naturally very much of the old Cheder type. The most efficient aid in pedagogy was the rattan, and one of the things that I still remember with a shudder was the almost fiendish cruelty with which these punishments were meted out. The child had to stretch out his or her hand. The teacher raised the rattan or occasionally a prismatic ruler. The teacher deliberately holding that instrument aloft, while evidently enjoying the child's anguish, and finally bringing it down deliberately on the finger tips, in the case of the ruler, with the sharp edge. Besides these punishments meted out on the ground of a regular sentence, passed by the teachers, there were occasional cuffs, pinches or slaps that were administered informally. One must take into account that these men, paid poorly, working ten or eleven hours a day, and without any vacation, teaching in ill-ventilated, overcrowded rooms, were bound to be in bad humor all the time. In addition it was general pedagogy of these days to believe that a child was wicked by nature, and had to be educated by compulsion. The most important feature of a child's training was to break his will.

A natural consequence of the lack of training on the part of a teacher was his faulty German and especially his faulty pronunciation. I remember the definition of a verb as a word which expresses "ein thon oder lassen" by which "thun" was meant. The teacher never seems to have considered it his duty to ascertain, whether the children understood him. Quite difficult it must have been for these men in advanced years to take up the new methods, prescribed by a more progressive school administration. In 1868, when the new school law was issued, Mandel Brunner was 58 years old, and he had to learn how to teach arithmetic with the aid of a "Rechenmaschine." He had not learned such pedagogy in the school of Rabbi Marcus Benedict. So one day the school inspector entered the school and witnessed Brunner's lesson in arithmetic. The teacher said, "How many 'Kaulen' (Yiddish for balls) do you see here?" The child answered, "Four." "If I take two Kaulen away from the four, how many remain?" It was a great mortification for the principal, who was a man of pedagogic training, to be present, because it naturally was his ambition to show that the Jewish school was up to the highest standard. This proved Brunner's unmaking and he was retired. Previous to that a similar occurrence showed the wide breach between the past and the present. The school inspector, appointed for the district, addressed the teachers on the necessity of keeping up their studies by reading modern literature. Brunner, wishing to show how modern he was, said, "Yes, Herr Inspektor, I am just now reading 'Paris Ohne Dach' (or some such yellow novel of the lowest type), I tell you it is a grand book." The inspector, not wishing to express himself in the presence of other teachers, told the principal afterwards what he thought of such kind of reading. Undoubtedly such cases were not infrequent but otherwise these teachers put as a rule, more soul in their activities than the regular normal school graduate.

They did not enter their profession with the conceit that they knew all, and just because they were dependent on the congregation they had to work for results. The cruelty in the treatment of pupils is, as we see from Dickens, not limited to Jewish schools. It is an unfortunate trait of nature that consciousness of authority leads to abuse. In addition, the parents believed in the same method. I remember that parents would occasionally come to school and ask the teacher to give their boy a good licking, because he did not behave well at home. I remember a woman bringing a plate of soup to school and asking the teacher to make "Gustel" eat that "Linsensuppe" which was so fine, as the teacher could convince himself by tasting. Gustel was made to sit down and had to eat the soup. Once in a while the opposite would happen, and a father would come to school, imploring the teacher not to give Mundel (Sigmund) the promised whipping, because Mundel was in poor health. Another difficulty was expressed by the teacher in procuring books and supplies. I remember in one instance, a boy, being asked why he had not done his night work, replied, "I did not have a note book." "Why did you not buy one?" "Father said he could not afford it now, he would buy me a note book when the 'Parnoseh' will be better!"

As a matter of particular interest, I wish to report that we had a teacher in our school a little before my time, who was a proselyte. His name as a Jew was Joseph Goldstein. His story is highly interesting and proves that our historical sources are very incomplete, and that the racial conception of Judaism is not as correct as some think it is. The grandfather of this Goldstein was a peasant in some Moravian village, who had conceived the idea that Judaism was the only true religion. On his deathbed he adjured his children to become Jews. They subsequently went to Pressburg, where they were received into the Jewism community, for while the law in Hungary prohibited conversion to Judaism till 1895, Hungary like Poland, was anarchical. The family which formerly was called Sedlaczek, adopted the name of Goldstein in order to avoid suspicion, and our Joseph Goldstein, who at the time of his conversion was a little boy, was trained to be a teacher. Nobody suspected anything about his origin, when Goldstein, at his trial lesson taught Pentateuch with Rashi's commentary, but at some later period it leaked out, and owing to this difficulty in the days when Austria was under the concordat, Goldstein left for Vienna and at a somewhat later period, he applied for a position in the Vienna schools. He was given to understand privately that there could be no position for him, because they had no use for Jews. He thereupon said, "This means no difficulty for me, for I can be a Christian, too." and he produced his certificate of baptism, showing that he had been baptised two days after his birth, and that his name was Franz Sedlaczek. One thing may be said with certainty, that the Jewish teacher even of the type represented by the Yeshibah Bachur, was superior to the teacher in Christian schools of the same place, where often retired sergeants, in order to be able to make a livelihood were given teaching positions. The Jewish schools soon passed out of existence. When I visited my native town in 1902, it still had a school with 13 children. Three years afterward, when the teacher had reached the age of retirement, the school was closed, the few remaining Jewish children being assigned to the general school of the town. This is the case almost everywhere in Moravia, because the Jewish school exists as the town school of the Ghetto which still possesses municipal rights, and which is deserted by the decendants of its former Jewish inhabitants. In Bohemia, where Jewish schools maintained themselves longer, because they served there the purpose of German education, national fanaticism, acted as aid to the shifting of the population, and even there the Jewish school is a thing of the past. In places having settlements, dating from modern times, the Jewish school is very rarely found.

FOUNDING OF THE NATIONAL Y. M. H. A. CONCERT SERIES

After some consideration, the National Council of Y. M. H. and kindred associations, through the Chief of the Board of Experts, Mr. I. E. Goldwasser, has decided to co-operate with the Music League of America and its special representative, Mr. Laszlo Schwartz, in the most worthy object of bringing good music to the masses.

Such a co-operation as this means not only greater opportunities for artistic recognition and success of the young and excellent artists on the Music League of America's roster but means that communities to whom good music has been made impossible by prohibitive prices will now find it possible to hear musical programs of a high order well rendered.

To both the Music League of America and to the National Council of Y. M. H. and kindred associations this co-operation means an extension of activity and an increased opportunity for doing much good.

Anti-Defamation League

By Dr. EMIL G. HIRSCH

In The Reform Advocate

Somebody has remarked that the woman about whom least is known and who therefore furnishes least provocation for gossiping is entitled to be classed among the most virtuous. That the observation is sound in its psychology requires no lengthy proof. True gold as a rule finds ready acceptance. Gold-plated ware stands in need of extensive advertising. Purchasers need no assurance that the genuine article is worth its price. It is the counterfeit and the surrogate which display lavish credentials, in order to attract attention to their pretended qualities. What the framer of the judgment predicated of woman holds good also of organizations and movements. Not that they are necessarily the worthiest that are most prominently in the eye of the people. Nor are they the most efficient that command the largest headlines in the public prints.

This almost elementary consideration comes to mind as the mail carrier brings to the desk a modest folder issued by the Anti-Defamation League founded and maintained by the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith. The leaflet bears the superscription "Bulletin Number Three." The contents demonstrate the well balanced zeal of the sponsors of the cause to which the League has given itself as well as the tact and skill of the men who have been in charge of the work. There is unfortunately call for the League's quiet but efficient efforts. This may be a surprise not to the liking of such enthusiasts as have indulged in the delusion that in the second decade of the twentieth century of Christian civilization prejudice especially of racial and religious parentage had if any only a very weak hold on men. Many had doubted the need for a League of this purpose. There would be none if civilization had in real truth established her dominion over men. But as the boasted Christian culture of the day exists largely on paper prejudice still speaks a language which finds glib currency on the lips of vast throngs. And those who speak the dialect are by no means exclusively recruited from the ranks of the untutored. Not infrequently is the jargon heard in the company of men and women who pose as aristocrats of the intellect, the elect four hundred lifted mountainhigh above the common vulgus.

Be it granted that sometimes defamation is the thoughtless offspring of a cheap desire to laugh at the expense of another. A philosopher who has made a study of the psychology of laughter assures us that malice only rarely is involved in the production of caricature. Men instinctively focus their eye on persons or traits differing from the ordinary. Routine regularity and conformity never arouse attention. Moreover men are impelled by a natural drift to the assumption that difference in appearance or attitude and language implies inferiority. Of one's own excellence every man is convinced. To underscore that excellence of his the inferiority of the other marked by difference of speech or dress and the like, or the cast of countenance is eagerly seized upon. Mild megalomania and other malicious hatred may be diagnosed in the earlier stages of the distemper's development. Yet these harmless manifestations must be resisted as strenuously as ever the more malignant and later paroxysms.

For the innocent indulgence in ridicule at the cost of the neighbor of different tongue or color or religion hardens to the creation of a type which ceases to correspond to reality. As soon as the line between the casual and yet true depicting of the neighbor's harmless but amusing idiosyncracies and the permanent caricaturing of them into a type is crossed the mischief is almost beyond control. The travesty is soon accepted as the rule. What few departures from the so fashioned type are admitted are graciously labeled and tolerated as exceptions. The Jew and all minorities tell the story of the havoc wrought by this mental habit of substituting a non-existent type for the living person. The experience of the men that differ from the regularity of the larger numbers illustrates how easily this mental habit blends with moral bluntness. Then the intellect is dulled and soon conscience is stifled. Hatred, jealousy and that large brood of nightborn bastards have easy access to the citadel of the Will after mental indolence and moral lassitude and laxity have captured the outer forts.

Heine characterizes the Jews and another people whom to mention now regard for the neutrality of our country forbids, as the best hated among human beings. The epithet is Heine-esque indeed, but it strikes the nail squarely on the head. The Jew has everywhere been one of the minority. He has everywhere since the days of his dispersion been "another." He differed from others and he protests by his very existence against much that the others would have him accept as the ultimate and absolute truth. Small wonder that he furnished ready and abundant material for ridicule first invoked to amuse the crowd who would enjoy guffaw at none so heartily as at the Jew. Church dogma, economic injustice, racial arrogance were not long in twisting amusement into a horrible tool of persecution. Laughter played into the hands of defamation, defamation intentionally set adrift to further the ends of malice.

In our day both amusement and malice have come into possession of new appliances wherewith to operate. Stage and book, newspaper and magazine, the illustrated daily, weekly and monthly, the film and what not place within reach of the good and the wicked potent channels of propaganda the like of which no other generation found ready to hand. If knowledge now owns new wings so does prejudice. The poison is carried to thousands when formerly in the days of denser ignorance not one hundred were exposed to the infection. All the more urgent therefore the duty to be watchful. He who has even a slight inkling of the methods pursued in the shaping of what is dignified as public opinion need not be told how essential it is to be on the lookout. The fury of war is fuel not to the least extent by the prejudice for years and years spread abroad through ridicule and in caricature thrown on the screen of the moving picture theater. It was not so much the yellow sheets of the various capitals which disseminated the hellish seeds of antipathy and distrust as it was the film which showed the barbarians that crouched across the border. Indifference to the pernicious influence which the newer forms of popular amusement may wield is a policy that cannot but result in deplorable mischief.

But the film is only one of the many servants of the wily propaganda. Science would be popularized. The books engaged in popularizing biology and anthropology multiply at a frightful rate. As long as science addresses itself in technical terminology to the men trained to weigh the proclamation the danger is not great that prejudiced ethnology or sociology will sweep many of their securer base. Not so when the specious theory is dressed out in garments of easy fashion. The glittering generality, the half-truth, the premature hypothesis will at once float about every drawing room and be glibly mouthed in every culture club. And when the learned Professor addresses the readers of a popular monthly and lends the ponderous weight of his scholarship to hasty inferences from data doctored to support his theory the echo of his "results" will not cease in the councils of the leaders of the new life and the prophets of the new thought.

It were idle to maintain that there is no justification for the existence of our anti-defamation league. The work of counteracting the many attempts both of modern make and of ancient mien could not be left to the haphazard competency of an individual. The graver the situation be, the more essential it is that it be met delicately yet strongly. The success undoubtedly had by the League in securing the suppression of objectionable material, of misrepresentations on the stage or the screen, in suggesting the withdrawal of novel and story and obtaining the promise that the injury done by a psuedo-scientific article will be neutralized by publishing in the offending magazine another article correcting the conclusions and the material of the earlier, is proof enough of the sound judgment and the tact directing the decisions and the methods of the officers of the League. Where the voice of the individual might not have been heeded or his protest injudicious perhaps might have done injury, the dignified communications addressed to willing and unwitting offenders have never failed to make a deep impression and to attain the desired effect.

American Israel is certainly under great debt to the men piloting this noble craft of defense. Bulletin number Three informs us that the League has begun an extended study for the purpose of sifting data on which Professor Ross' "conclusions" are speciously based. This line of investigation for very truth is the best method to unmask the hypocrisy as well as the quackery of the Professor. Let the League be encouraged to purusue its labors. Let it be equipped with greater means. The League has made no noise. It has disdained to resort to advertising. All the greater has been the good it has done. May it continue as it has begun efficiently if dignifiedly silence the ridicule as well as the malice of them who would laugh or jeer at the Jew, or malign him in order to flatter their own petty self into the unwarranted assurance of being of better clay than any of the sons of Jacob.

Our Plain Duty

Address delivered by Rabbi Martin Zielonka of El Paso, Tex., at Temple Mount Sinai:

"The neutrality of this pulpit has been as complete as possible. The request of the president seemed timely and proper. A nation composed of more or less recent immigrants from all parts of Europe must control the sentiment naturally associated with the place of birth; seek, above all, the common welfare of American citizenship and check the animosities and feuds engendered by this international war. A German by birth, I appreciate my American citizenship above everything else, and if a decision were instantly demanded, there would be no doubt as to where my influence, my ability, my means, or my life, would be pledged. To America I owe my all, and to America I am willing to repay all. Germany was the place of my birth, but to the principles for which the stars and stripes stand I am indebted for the possibilities that came into my life.

"The results of the European conflict, the immediate results of war, are becoming more evident every day. The human element facts are reaching us, and they make us shudder. To Petrograd a Jewish soldier was recently brought from the Austrian battle line. Even though Russia granted him no rights, it was the land of his birth, the place of his residence, and for it he took up arms. His regiment was sent to oppose an Austrian force, and bravely he did his duty. The battle waged bitterly; it ended in a hand-to-hand encounter. With the fury born only of battle he rushed upon his opponent and thrust his bayonet into him. As the latter fell he heard Israel's watchword, 'Sh'ma Yisroel,' and hearing it, he swooned, and now has lost his reason.

"Men may shed honor and glory in this way upon their country; men may be pawns of an invisible destiny changing the checker board of nations; men may die for the glories of their country, but the women and children, the wives and daughters, bear the brunt of battle. Theirs is the heartache, the longing and the sorrow; their is the suffering of body and mind. A warring nation naturally gives its first attention to the men upholding the colors; these receive every consideration. But in the multiple questions arising at such a time the individuals left behind are forgotten; want and hunger, cold and disease reap a harvest equal to that of the battlefield.

"And this want and hunger is becoming more pressing each day. Appeals for help have come from every nation of Europe to this mightiest and wealthiest nation at peace. And these appeals must be answered. The appeals are not for money to add to the war funds of nations, but for the necessities of life from those in want; in want, not through any fault of their own, but on account of the absence of the bread winner, who is fighting at the front for the rights of his country.

"And among the many appeals which have come from Europe there is one from the Jews of Europe to the Jews of America. 'Ivri Onochi,' 'I am a Hebrew,' is the cry sent forth, and we must hearken to this cry, for we have been taught 'Rachamono Libbo boey,' 'God desires the response of the heart.'

"When the world was shocked by the Galveston tidal wave and a magnificent American metropolis lay in ruins, the response of the nation was equaled only by the wonderful recuperative power of this Texas city. And when the Jewish community sent an appeal to the Jews of America, they responded with alacrity; none doubted their right to appeal to us as Jews for a special fund for Jewish sufferers. When the earthquake and fire laid in ruins the metropolis of our western coast, American citizenship again responded immediately to the cry of need, and when the Jewish community of that city made an appeal to the American Jewish communities, these answered this appeal, and none cried out that the Jewish sufferers should be helped from the general fund.

"Such being the history of other calamities, it is all the more surprising that when a calamity, a thousand fold greater than these, comes, some should doubt the right of appeal of European Jewry to American Jewry, some should come forth with the plea that the Jews of Germany should receive help from the German general fund, the Jews of England from the English general fund, the Jews living in the dual alliance should receive aid from the fund collected for this alliance, while the Jews residing in the triple entente should receive help from the general fund collected for these, and the Jews of America, hailing from the one side or the other, should simply give to the general fund of that section to which their sympathies compel.

"I cannot understand such arguments; I cannot appreciate the reasoning which leads to such conclusions. If we are able to give to the general fund of either side and yet believe we are neutral, let us so give, but let none of us forget a plain duty, the duty to give to the fund for Jewish sufferers of all the lands. This does not violate any neutrality, and is just as non-partisan as giving to the general Red Cross fund.

"Let us consider this problem for a moment; let us reason together. We are all, and if we are not we ought to be, American citizens. We have found peace and happiness under the stars and stripes and shown our appreciation of this peace and happiness by seeking American citizenship. We have forsworn allegiance to the various nations now at war, and sworn allegiance to this country, its laws, institutions, hopes and aspirations. In other words, we feel this country offers us and our children more than the land of our birth, that here we and our children may develop the abilities God has planted with us without let or hindrance, that here we are granted the 'unalienable rights,' 'life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness' to a greater extent than anywhere else in the world.

"And though we have forsworn allegiance to European rulers, we have not forsworn allegiance to Judaism. We are still faithful to the faith of our fathers, we still believe it necessary to remain a distinct entity in this nation, we still believe that Judaism answers our heart craving and is the most satisfactory of all faiths.

"Is our duty to the land which we have forsworn greater than our duty to those who hold the faith to which we have remained true? Are the German Jews in America better Germans than Jews? Are the English Jews better Englishmen than Jews? Are the French Jews better Frenchmen than Jews? Are the Austrian Jews better Austrians than Jews? Are the Russian Jews better Russians than Jews? And if they are. being American citizens and faithful Jews, should they be?

"Who is the truer American citizen and patriot? The one who obeys the request of our president and remains strictly neutral, by helping a neutral land for all nations, or the one who contributes to the special fund of the nation from which he came? Who is the truer American Jew, the one who gives only to the country of his birth or the one who responds to the appeal of his fellow Jews from all the nations now at war? What does the American citizen. not of Jewish faith, think? The Providence, R. I., Journal recently said:

"'It is a graceful and fitting appeal that has been issued in New York City in behalf of the Jews in the European war zone. The Jews of America can be depended upon to rally to the support of this gracious and kindly experience.'

"The non-Jewish world then calls this appeal 'gracious and fitting.' Should we call it less?

"We wish the European catastrophe were over; we wish the day were at hand when nations recognized the futility of human sacrifice; but since it is not over and the cry of our brethren comes to us from all sides, let us respond in the good old Jewish way by doing our duty, by doing our full duty as American citizens and as Jews. The duty seems plain enough; why not be true to ourselves and our heritage?

"If America were involved in a war with one or all of the European na-

ISRAEL ZANGWILL AND THE PRESENT WAR

Translated from "Report of the German Grand Lodge"

The "New York Times" recently published the following report from London:

"Israel Zangwill sent to 'The Standard' a proclamation to the Jews of the neutral countries urging them to support the allies against Germany. Zangwill appeals specially to the Jews of America. He says:

"'Although the most terrible war of human history is "made in Germany" and although the German conduct in the war is as barbaric as is her state of mind in times of peace, I notice to my regret that some of the Jews in America and in other neutral countries seem to withhold their sympathy from Great Britain and her allies.

"'The pro-German feelings of those Jews who are Germans by birth are easily understood. Their sympathies are with their native land just as my own sympathies are with England. But if the sympathies of the other Jews are influenced by the consideration of the interests of the Russian Jews, to whom Germany and Austria are offering equal rights, I must say that it is better that the Jews continue to suffer, and that I myself would rather lose my rights as a citizen of the English state than to have the great interests of civilization perish under the triumph of Prussian militarism.

"'In saying this I do not speak as a British patriot but as a world patriot, who is filled with uneasiness and abhorence by the inhuman ideal of the Gothic superman. I see indeed that Germany's press agent points out Germany as the guardian of civilization and as an angel in desperate combat with the wild hordes brought from Africa. But when we make use of black war forces it is done for white purposes, while Germany employs white war forces for black purposes.

"'But it is not even certain that the Russian Jews will continue to suffer when England is once freed of this Teutonic nightmare. The assurance which I had the special honor to receive from Sir Edward Grey, that he will miss no opportunity to foster the emancipation of the Russian Jews, mark a turning point in their history, because these promises really offer a strong political basis for hope instead of windy Russian rumors. And this is not the mere assertion of a politician in need.

"'I am in a position to state that these assurances of Mr. Grey reflect everything that is best in English thoughts. I therefore appeal in confidence to the American Jews and other neutral Jews that they should not permit the shadow of Russia to prevent their sympathies from being with this invincible island, which now as often before, is fighting for humanity and which may yet civilize Russia and Roumania.'"

"In answer to this Brother Elbogen writes:

"'Israel Zangwill is inspired by the ambition to unite the fame of the writer with that of the benefactor of the people. He has often before caused strong head shaking by his plans for the saving of the Russian Jews, but his recent utterances, called forth by the world war, in a "Proclamation to the Jews of the neutral countries," challenges the sharpest contradiction and the most energetic refutation. Not alone because he abuses Germany in the most unjust manner; the German people and army stand too high to be hit by the wrathful scolding of English commercialism. We may safely and confidently leave it to history to decide which party is fighting in the present war for humanity and with humane tactics, whether we are the ones or those on the other side of the channel. The thing that makes it our duty to take a position against Zangwill's deductions is the fact that they form a treacherous attack upon the rights of the Russian Jews.

"'In order to gain for England the sympathy of the Jews in neutral countries, especially in America, Zangwill cheerfully sacrifices the rights of the Russian Jews. He prefers to see the Russian Jews continue to suffer martyrdom for a longer time rather than have Germany and Austria bring them equal rights. He also believes himself able to promise that this war will bring about a turning point in the condition of the Jews and create a strong political foundation for their emancipation.

"'It is hard to understand that the man who knew how to paint the whole wretchedness and misery of the Russian ghetto in such glaring colors has all of a sudden been blinded. It is an open secret that every respectable person in England is ashamed to see his fatherland fighting at the side of Muscovite barbarity and that the English government whenever possible intentionally omits to mention the name of its noble confederate in its public announcements. The hearts of the Jews of England, France and Russia may bleed when they think of it that they must give their lives for the Russian Knout regime, for the inventors of the pale of settlement and the instigators of the pogroms. It is one of the tragic conflicts between duty and sentiment and the Jews of those countries may finally submit to compulsion and may console themselves with the saying: "Right or wrong, my country." But for the Jews of the neutral countries to become enthusiastic for Russia and work without being forced for her success, would be one of the most hideous crimes against their faith and treachery against millions of their brethren.

"'What has Russia done so far that would indicate an attempt to pave the way for a change in her interior-policy? Has she ameliorated or abolished even one of the mortifying and humiliating restrictions against the Jews, which two years ago were enumerated in England in the memorial document, "The Legal Sufferings of the Jews in Russia," by Lucian Wolf? The Czar was merciful enough to permit the Jews, who are forced by the war to do it, to enter his chief cities, Moscow and Petrograd, and to stay there for sixty-one days, or, according to the latest reports, for one month only. But has anything else in the shape of an alleviation in the domicile restrictions of the Jews been heard of? Just to state one example were the Russian high schools opened to the many Jewish students, to whom the universities in Germany and Austria were closed, in order to make it possible for them to continue their education? Or has it not recently been reported that the percentage rule for Jewish students at the higher schools of Russia is being most rigidly enforced at present? What change then has taken place in the midst of Russian officialdom and in the psychology of the Real Russians? The war has, of course, brought about an important change. The Muscovite has called the Mongol to his aid and by the example of the latter he has heightened his own skill in human oppression, avarice and thirst for blood. Reports of new pogroms are already arriving from Russia and there they are already beginning to blame the Jews for the mishaps in the war and to mark them as lambs for the sacrifice. The real sentiment of the Real Russians is revealed to us by an announcement in the "Russkoye Znamya," which goes so far in its blind hatred of the "dirty Jews" (the friends of Mr. Zangwill never knew of another expression) as to approve of the alleged destruction of Louvain because it is "a pestilential Jew city like our Berditchev." These are the men who rebuke the Kaiser, "the slave of Jewish capital" and President Wilson "in whose veins flow dirty Jewish blood," for having hindered the destruction of Paris by Zeppelins. Even Paris, which for decades is sacrificing its work, its intelligence and its wealth to support the vampires of the Czar's empire, even Paris finds no mercy in the eyes of these incendiaries on account of "its Jews and its millions." Of course this is all plain madness, but this is the bloody "banner" of the Real Russian folk, which Zangwill now wishes to carry in the front and for which he demands protection and backing from the Jews of the neutral countries.

"'What guarantee does he bring that the Russian Jews will not continue to suffer? Assurances which he had the honor to receive from Sir Edward Grey in the course of a conversation. Do not assurances from Sir Edward Grey remind every one of Hamlet's saying: "Words, words, nothing but words"? Who can place confidence in assurances of Grey who is accused even by his own partisans of double-dealing and deceitfulness? He has betrayed his own people, can it then be expected that he will not spurn the Jewish cause after the war? And even if he had the will to keep his word what possibilities has he to realize his promises? What will Sir Edward Grey do when the Grand Ducal party, after the victory of the Pan Slavic idea and the holy Russian church, forbids interference with the interior affairs of the Czar's empire and with the legislation against the unbelievers? "Vestigia terrent." We are well enough acquainted with the energy of Mr. Grey, the gravedigger for all freedom; we know that he has never taken a single step in favor of the Russian Jews. A year has just passed since the Beilis case was before the Russian court, when the conscience of the whole world revolted against the shameless attempt to degrade justice. Who knows in how many meetings Zangwill then presided and undertook to enlighten the cultured world about the love of justice by the Russian ministry of justice, her states' attorneys and her sworn experts? The entire cultured world was susceptible to this cry of indignation, but Mr. Grey refused to receive a deputation of English Jews and to accept from them a report about the dangerous condition of millions of innocent victims. For Grey was then already sailing in the tow-path of Russian politics and guarded himself from the sting of the Real Russians.

"'This is the truth about Mr. Grey to which Mr. Zangwill is surely able to add many other features of brutal self conceit of this statesman. Mr. Zangwill in his false display of wit has spoken of a white and a black cause. What he represents is indeed the interest of the black hundred, the deadly enemies of the Jewish people. Whoever follows him is guilty of a cursed crime against Jewry. The Jews of Poland themselves have recently plainly shown from which side they expect liberty, when they greeted the German and Austrian troops as their Moshiach. The redemption can come to them through our victory only!'"

ACTIVITIES OF UNITED SYNAGOGUE OF AMERICA.

The Executive Council of the United Synagogue of America held its first meeting after the holidays at the Jewish Theological Seminary on October 27th. Those present were: Dr. Cyrus Adler, of Philadelphia, Pa.; Prof. M. M. Kaplan, Dr. Elias L. Solomon, of New York; Rabbis Charles I. Hoffman, of Newark, N. J.; Max D. Klein, Philadelphia, Pa.; Herman H. Rubenowitz, Boston, Mass.; Jacob Kohn, of New York, and Messrs. Samuel Wacht and Meyer Goodfriend, of New York.

The propaganda work carried on throughout the country was considered, especially that done by Rev. Dr. C. Hillel Kauvar, who had been cordially welcomed in the Middle West. A number of applications for membership were received. Arrangements were made for the continuance of this work throughout the country.

Co-operation on the part of the United Synagogue with the Seminary and the Seminary Alumni was provided for, looking to the establishment of a Central office for the promotion of common interests.

The reports of the second annual meeting have been published and are ready for distribution. It is an interesting document containing a detailed account of the activities and the program of the United Synagogue as set forth by speakers and committees.

The Education Committee of which Prof. M. M. Kaplan is Chairman, has in hand the manuscript of the first part of Rabbi Eugene Kohn's book, "A Manual for Teachers for Instruction in Biblical Narrative," and will proceed toward its publication.

A curriculum for Jewish schools is in course of preparation and co-operation with various teachers organizations is projected.

The Sabbath Observance Committee has published and distributed the Jewish Festival Calendar, for the guidance of schools and institutions in arranging their work so as not to conflict with religious obligations of Jews.

For the American edition of the Authorized (Singer's) Prayer Book, certain suggestions looking to a more convenient text have been made and well received.

The United Synagogue was represented at the War Relief Committee held recently in New York by Rabbi Jacob Kohn and Messrs. S. C. Lamport and Meyer Kussy. It will be represented also on the American Jewish Committee and the permanent Committee on Relief Measures.

An amendment to the Constitution was proposed looking to the holding annual meetings on the second Sunday after Passover.

The next meeting of the Executive Council will be held at the Seminary on December 27th prox.

THE EUROPEAN WAR AND THE PROBLEM OF JEWISH IMMIGRATION.

By Arthur Meyrowitz.

(A liberal translation from the German)

Whatever the outcome of the great war, the status of the Jew must be materially affected. Should Russia prove victorious, the prospects for the emancipation of the Russian Jew are negligible. The alleged promises that the Russian government is reported to have made to the Jews are of dubious value. No thoughtful student of politics can believe that a government, whose program is a systematic persecution of the Jews, would all at once liberate them. Excuses and evasions will always be found to prevent the carrying out of these promises should they indeed have been made. The most that may be hoped for is that, perhaps, new restrictions, if these can be invented, will not be imposed upon the Jews in the near future. History shows that a successful war is always followed by a growth of national feeling, and when it is remembered that the very bureaucrats whose activity in times of peace is the persecution of Jews, are those that play the greatest part in this war, it is not difficult to imagine the situation of the Jews in Russia, should that country be victorious.

Even more complicated are conditions in Poland. No matter what the political future of that country may be, the Jewish question there will always remain complex. Whether Poland receives autonomy under Russian sovereignty or becomes an independent Polish state under German or Austro-Hungarian protection, it is to be feared that the two and a half million Jews that live in Polish provinces will be at the mercy of their Polish persecutors. Only they who know the oppression, the persecution and the rabid anti-Semitism of the Poles, are able to appreciate the fact that Polish Jews look with almost envious glances towards their co-religionists in the Russian provinces, whose conditions seems infinitely better and more bearable than theirs. One who knows the character of the Poles knows that anti-Semitism is inextricably rooted in their nature, and that the condition of the Jew would be much worse under Polish than under Russian administration. To illustrate this attitude of the Poles towards the Jews, the following incident is in point. When, after the outbreak of the war, the Russian government solemnly offered autonomy to Poland, the various Jewish papers in that country heartily congratulated the Polish people. In this manner the Jews wished to show their sympathy with the Poles, whose culture they had striven to acquire. The Poles, however, ignored these manifestations of friendship, and moreover hastened to denounce the Jews as traitors to Russia, because they were secretly in sympathy with Germany.

It seems to me that only that solution can be regarded as satisfactory which would guarantee the Jews a proportionate representation in the national legislative and executive bodies of Poland. Any other solution is illusory.

Regarding the future of immigration to the United States, it may be said that the Jewish influx will depend to a large extent upon the economic conditions prevailing in Russia after the war. As regards immigration from Poland, in view of the foregoing analysis, it seems clear that there will be a heavy influx from the Polish provinces, unless a radical solution of the Jewish problem in that country is found.

In any event I believe that the Jewish immigration problem will remain a serious one even after the war, because it can hardly be hoped that the problem of the Jews in Eastern Europe will be completely solved. It is to be hoped that the misery which is intensified by the war will not become more acute because of adverse political events.

For the present I believe it necessary that those who are active in the regulation of Jewish immigration, should maintain their endeavors towards a healthy distribution of Jewish immigration, and to keep open the door of opportunity for immigrants not only from economic motives, but on humanitarian grounds.

Happiness consists in activity; it is a running stream and not a stagnant pool.—J. M. Good.

It makes no difference as to what man believes, but what he practices is what counts.

ITEMS OF INTEREST IN CONNECTION WITH THE WAR —JEWISH GALLANTRY ON THE BATTLEFIELD

JEWISH HEROES.

The recent issues of the Jewish papers of Germany and Austria contain glowing reports and inspiring narratives of the loyalty, bravery and heroism of our co-religionists who are now fighting in the German and Austrian armies. The lists of the names of Jews who have died a heroic death on the battlefields and of those who were awarded medals of distinction and were promoted to higher ranks for acts of great courage and bravery, are constantly growing longer.

The world generally holds the whole Jewish people responsible for the weakness and lapses of every individual Jew. In the face of this fact we are fully entitled to feel proud whenever a Jewish brother distinguishes himself by nobility of character, by wisdom and learning and by patriotism, bravery and loyalty to the flag of his country.

We therefore copy here some of the lists and narratives from the German and Austrian Jewish papers for the benefit of our readers.

The golden bravery medal is bestowed upon non-commissioned officers from ensign up, for extraordinary bravery, when successful military results have been achieved through their heroic action. It is the highest mark of life-long distinction connected with a monthly allowance of 30 kronen. Up to date about thirty golden bravery medals have been distributed and among the recipients, besides those who have in the meantime fallen on the field of honor, are the following Jews:

Dr. Otto Eisler, sergeant Mendel Fuss, both of Przemysl, and ensign Ludwig Loewy. The brother of the latter, Sergeant Adolf Loewy, received a premium of 50 kronen.

The silver bravery medal, first class, was received by Julius Sofer, of Goeding; Corporal Abraham Freimann, Buxbaum; Sergeant Gedalye, Hilsenrat; Sergeant Leo Lustig, Automobilist Richard Adler, Adolf Breit, Ensign Wilhelm Wunderlich, Corporal Schick, Josef Oszwald, Albert Schoenhof, Ensign Karl Neubauer.

The silver bravery medal second class, was awarded to Abraham Kom, Isidor Erster, Josef Ullmann, Corporal Rubin Mandl, Ensign Leopold Kolben, leader of Patrol Arnold Goldstein.

Colonel Arthur Berger received the military merit cross with the war decoration.

Dr. Karl Brust was awarded the cross of the Knights of Franz Josef with the ribbon of the military merit cross.

Richard Stoessler received the bravery medal and the army reward.

Dr. Sigmund Bruell was awarded the golden merit cross with the crown on the ribbon of the bravery medal.

Major Moriz Mansch of Lemberg, received the military merit cross with the military decoration.

Lieutenant Moriz Kornfeld received the merit medal and was highly praised for his bravery.

Dr. Alfred Fried and Dr. Samuel Leitner were awarded the golden merit cross on the ribbon of the bravery medal.

Oscar Freund of Budweis, officer of the bureau of construction, received the golden merit cross and ribbon of the bravery medal.

The iron cross was awarded to First Lieutenant Dr Leo Loewenstein, Aix-La-Chapelle; Hans Panofsky, and Rudolf Ullstein, Berlin; Adolf Braude, Bierstadt; Siegfried Rosenthal, Bierstein; Corporal Heinrich Joachim Auerbach, Lubinski; Dr Hugo Hauf, Dr. Georg Hartmann, Corporal Berthold Guttmann, Georg Sternberg, Dr. Martin Biberstein, and Dr. Arnold Fuchs, Breslau; Corporal Curt Goetz, Briesen; Second Sergeant Paul Suessholz, Corporal Willy Oppenheim and Corporal Berthold Victor, Cassel; Dr. Muehlfelder, Chemnitz; Herman Gotheim, Fritzlar; Lieutenant Dr. [illegible] Pepper, Frankfort-on-the-Main; Max Hahn, Halle; Dr D. Private Leopold Meier of Harburg was seriously wounded in the war by a bomb shell and was taken to the hospital. The dowager Grand Duchess Louise of Baden visited the wounded. She had a grenade splinter which was taken from Meiers' wound, framed in gold, a proper inscription engraved on it and presented it to him as a thankful remembrance.

The Grand Duke of Hessia has given the bravery medal to cand. med. Oscar Roos of Hagenau.

An interesting story is told about Nathan Loew, a hussar in a South Hungarian regiment. Loew who is a strictly orthodox Jew who prayed three times a day and layed his tephiliu every morning, even on the battlefield, paying no attention to the gibes of his comrades. One morning he went too close to the enemies' position in order to say his prayers. As soon as he was noticed by the Serbians they commenced firing, several hussars were wounded and the rest ran under cover, but Nathan continued his prayers unshaken. But before he was able to unwind the straps from his arm the bugles suddenly sounded "storm." Nathan mounted his horse and fought bravely, and though being always in front he did not even receive a scratch from the enemy. Only when the hussars rested Nathan found time to unwind his tephilin straps. But then a real rebellion burst forth, the hussars wanted to take away the straps, for the legend had spread among them that the one who carries these straps upon his body becomes bullet proof. Each one of the hussars wanted to have at least a little piece of them.

Lieutenant Dr. Oscar Singer met with a heroic death upon the battlefield. In his pocket was found a letter to his parents in which he expressed his ardent love for his fatherland and stated that he was not afraid to die for his country. try.

The following item appeared recently in the "Pesti Hirlap":

"A Ruthenian soldier recently wrote from the Galician war theater to his wife who lives in the Ugocs comitat, Hungary: 'My dear wife: I am well and in want of nothing here. Please go to the Jew Chayim and ask him what is the meaning of "shema yisroel." When the missiles whistle in great numbers around our heads, the Jews call out these two words and it really seems that the balls avoid them. Many of us die while nearly all of them remain alive. I therefore request you to ask the Jew Chayim what these words signify, so that, I too, may know it and can make use of them in case of need.'"

For exceptional bravery on the battle fields the following Jewish soldiers were awarded the decoration of the Iron Cross by the German Emperor:

W. Frankel, Dr. Philos. & Chemist; Dr. Hans Jacobson, the son of Privy Councillor Jacobsohn in Berlin; Richard Israel, landed proprietor in Schultzendorf, near Berlin; Vice-Sergeant Assessor Dr. Jur. The Russian commander-in-chief, Grand Duke Nicholas, has personally expressed his thanks to the Jewish hero Tabatznikof, who received the order of St. George for bravery on the field

Nish, the capital, pro tem, of Servia, is filled with nearly all the Jewish inhabitants of Belgrade. They have been installed in the synagogues and Jewish schools and other buildings placed at thier disposal by the community. They belong to all classes, and are living on charity, as in their hurried flight they abandoned everything they possessed. More than nine hundred persons are living on twenty centimes a day per head, the amount allowed them by the government.

Baron H. Ginsburg of Petrograd, who recently enlisted in the Russian Army, has been enrolled in the Russian Guard. This is a signal honor for a Jew, Baron Ginsburg being the first Jew to obtain it.

JEWS LIKELY TO RULE PALESTINE AFTER WAR.

An Independent State in the Holy Land Is Held to Be Feasible.

CZAR FAVORS THE PROJECT.

With Russia Backing Britain In the Move London Paper Predicts It Will Succeed.

The Associated Press published the following from London, England:

"One result of the present war may be the realization of the dream of centuries past—the setting up of Palestine as an independent Jewish state. Both England and Russia will favor the project," says the London Globe. "England, because a small neutral state in the holy land will be the best possible protection to Suez and Egypt, and Russia because it will make the way easier for her to settle certain Jewish problems within her own border."

Either British or Neutral.

Continuing, the Globe says:

"The events of the moment show how immediately Egyptian integrity is imperiled by the fact that a right of way through Palestine is open to a hostile power. Palestine must become either British or neutral. There is an obvious political objection to a British occupation. Neutrality is the more desirable solution.

"But if Palestine is to become neutral, who is to govern it? Directly that question is raised the claim of the Jews forces itself upon our attention. We have to deal with the remarkable fact that a people which lost its country over 2,000 years ago still cherishes the memory of that loss, and links the hope of recovery with its deepest religious instincts.

Many Jews In Poland.

"Here, then, we have two influences at work for the re-establishment of a Jewish state—the British desire for a neutral Palestine, and the territorial instinct of the Jews themselves. There is a third influence. Russia has pledged herself to the re-establishment of an autonomous Poland under the czar. But in Poland, as we know it now, there is one obvious obstacle to the development of a Polish state strong in its national consciousness, and that is the presence of a large Jewish element. All who know Russian Poland will agree that a settlement of the Jewish question is essential to the complete success of the great scheme to which Russia is pledged, and will recognize that it is precisely to the Polish Jews that the reconstitution of the Jewish state would make the strongest appeal."

SAVINGS-BANK DEPOSITS IN EUROPE.

It is believed by "The Wall Street Journal" that the war in Europe "is fairly certain to reduce the available deposits of the peoples immediately involved." In the countries at war are populations aggregating 426,000,000, who have savings that in total are believed to fall little short of $9,544,000,000. Germany leading, with Austria next, and then follow Great Britain and France. Average deposits are highest in Hungary, where they amount to $372.44.

Since the last report in the November issue of the News the Executive Committee of the Order forwarded the following additional sums by cable:

60,000 Kronen to the Grand Lodge of Austria in aid of the Galician refugees.

30,000 Marks to the Grand Lodge of Germany in aid of the Jewish war sufferers.

20,000 Rubels to the Jewish Colonization Association of Petrograd, Russia, exclusively for the aid of Russian Jewish war sufferers.

The Executive Committee has made banking arrangements whereby it is enabled to forward money either by mail or cable to all the countries at war except Turkey for the present. The Bank assumes full responsibility for the payment of such transmitted money and if the payee fails to receive the money the Bank will refund the amount at the same rate of exchange at which it is purchased. It is suggested that in view of the fact that many of the men are away from home that moneys be ordered sent to some female member of the family.

The Executive Committee will be glad to be of service to those who desire money forwarded to relatives in any of the countries as stated above. All money orders to be forwarded should be made payable either to Mr. Adolf Kraus, or the National Bank of the Republic, Chicago.

GENERAL RELIEF AND JEWISH RELIEF.

The duty of the American Jew in the face of the suffering engendered by the war ought really to require no setting forth, but what shall be said of Jews who although prosperous, turn a deaf ear to the cry for help of the unfortunate brethren who now in war-stricken Europe are homeless, breadless and shelterless? The excuse offered that there is no necessity for a specific Jewish relief fund, that a general relief fund is everywhere being organized by generous and public spirited men and women of high standing, that such fund is destined for all the sufferers in Europe irrespective of nationality and creed and that Jewish sufferers will be taken care of along with the rest, is at best a poor excuse. We shall not be surprised if when some of those very men who are making this excuse are requested to increase their donations to the United Charities in order to relieve suffering at home they are heard to decline on the plea that they have relatives in Europe who are [illegible] sufferers and must be taken care of first. For one who seeks an excuse, for refusing help, one excuse is as good as another.

That we should contribute generously to the General Fund needs no arguing whatsoever. Moreover, Jews have been and are contributing liberally. Jews are prominent in Red Cross collections. Jewish names appear in any and every list published in the press. Jewish men and women ought to be too proud to be flattered when an invitation reaches them to serve on a General Committee. They are called in because through them the Jewish giving public is expected to be reached, they ought to be called in as a matter of course. They ought properly to be called in as American citizens, and not as Jews. But let this not be forgotten. So far it is the Belgians that occupy the forefront of the attention of the American people. It is but natural that they should. Across the Atlantic ocean the Belgians are our next door neighbors. With England and the American Ambassador at the court of St. James as their spokesmen, with a commission of their own making a direct appeal, the plight of a suffering people is brought to our notice, and our sympathies are naturally aroused. Compared with Belgium, Poland, Russian and German and Galician, is a distant land. Shut off as that land is from communication with the Western hemisphere, it might as well be situated in far-off Siberia or behind the Himalayas. When some day the veil shall be lifted, the enormity of the distress and suffering that is going on there will be simply staggering. But what news has already been suffered to filter through bespeaks a condition compared with which the sufferings of Belgium would pale into insignficance. The eastern theatre of the war is coextensive with that part of the world where the Jewish population is densest. Communities have been wiped out. Villages and towns are occupied and reoccupied by the belligerents. Jewish honorables are retained as hostages and as often shot. Fortunes are lost overnight. The poor that have always sustained themselves as if by miracle are now beggared. Fleeing men and women and children who chance to save their lives within the walls of fortified cities must be taken care of by an overburdened community. Berlin, Vienna and Warsaw are over-run by Jewish refugees. They cast themselves upon the mercy of their co-religionists and these in turn appeal to America, to the American Jew. We are free to assume that when the great American public will be apprised of the appalling disaster there, Polish Jews will just as readily enlist the sympathies of Amerca as do the Belgians today. But at present it stands to reason that we Jews are approached on behalf of fellow-Jews: shall we hide ourselves from our own flesh?

If segregation in charity is frowned upon, why, it may be pertinent to ask, do we year in year out maintain at home our own charitable organizations? The experience of mankind has been that while with the growth of sympathy and humanitarian endeavor charity is readily dealt out on nonsectarian lines, the maintenance of orphanages and hospitals and charity societies must be undertaken on denominational lines. For charity is intimately bound up with religion, it is an offshoot of church and synagogue. The state and the municipality may have their eleemosynary institutions, but on the whole and by virtue of its greatest range of activity charity is still largely a matter of private enterprise and of private societies. It is rightly felt that the dispensation who are nearer the recipient in sympathy, who, in the language of Scripture, know the soul of them that are in need. No matter how well organized your office may be, in the end it means everywhere personal contact and mutual confidence. Only a Jew will understand a brother Jew's need, only a Jew will beget in the Jewish dependent that measure of confidence without which all relief is futile. An organization like our Order, world-wide as it is in its sphere of activity, rooted as it is everywhere in the large masses of Jewry, is at once in constant touch with the vast relief-area and particularly capable in reaching those to whom relief must be extended. We have the machinery. We have the information. Ours has been the initiative in many undertakings that have the amelioration of our brethren as their object.

To the Jews of America we say, Give freely to the cause of the sufferer without regard to race or creed. But remember that the Jewish sufferer will ultimately have to be relieved by his more fortunate brother Jew. Leave a balance in your purse for it will surely be called for. Leave it for him who is your own flesh, whom you understand better than anybody else, who at present is shut off from contact with you, but who will surely ere long stretch out his appealing hand to you. We are living in extraordinary times. Surely we cannot abandon at such a time our policies upon which we pride ourselves in normal periods. What is meet for home purposes ought to be fair for the emergency in the distance. American Jews, it is your duty, is your privilege to extend a helping hand to the European as well as Oriental brother in trouble, to the widow whose stay and staff has departed, fallen on the battlefield, to the fatherless, to the hungry and naked. And we know that the appeal will not be in vain, the appeal to Jewish sympathy, rahmanut.

THE BIBLE IN THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

It has come to our knowledge that a Christian clergyman has been seeking to enlist Jewish support and approbation in connection with a publication containing selections from the Scriptures for use in the public schools of this country. The plea is made that Bible reading in public schools has been made compulsory in a number of states and that therefore, whether you like it or no, the situation exists that the Bible has been introduced in the curriculum of schools maintained by public money. If so, it is argued, Jews and Christians, Catholics and Protestants ought to come to an agreement about the text that shall be used. And if now comes a man and prepares for us in an attractive form a Bible reader which moreover confines itself to the Old Testament and sets out to eliminate all objectionable phraseology, it would seem as if he ought to be encouraged. Let it be remembered that he avers that he is combating the extremists in his own camp, those of his brethren who may be dissatisfied with the limitation to the Old Testament.

So far so well. It cannot be gainsaid that the law has given the Bible a place in the schools in some states. The law may have been carried by sheer majority and may have been contested by a respectable minority. But the fact remains that the law is on some statute books. Of course, legislatures come and go, and it may happen that a law felt to be obnoxious by some citizens may in the future be repealed. There is no reason why the minority should give up hope of rescinding an act which meets with their displeasure. The law indeed must be lived up to. But the minority may refuse to lend countenance to a publication which, while useful and meritorious in itself, may produce the impression that all those who approve of it in itself approve at the same time of the principle that the Bible should be read in the public schools The booklet is innocent enough and may be readily accepted. As long as the Bible is read, let it be read in a text that will give offence to none. To that extent the compiler may be sure that no dissenting voice will be heard. But it is the principle that is of prime importance.

Of course, we have our doubts about the efficiency of mere Bible reading. We understand that comment by the teacher is forbidden. But the mere reading of the Bible without a commentary and without elucidation is to our understanding just a waste of precious time. The Bible is literature. Imagine a book of English literature merely recited and not read understandingly, with a discussion of meaning and purport. If the Bible has a place in the schools, it ought to be read as literature, on a plane with other literatures. As sacred literature, of course, it could not be read there. For the public school lacks the atmosphere that can rightly be found only in a denominational Sunday School. It is a great question therefore whether a law forbidding explanation does not fail entirely of its purpose. But even so there ought not to be any opposition to a mere textbook of selections propertly supervised by an unbiased committee comprising all religious elements of the papulation.

Nevertheless all such men as have been approached within our own camp feel a natural aversion to ally themselves in any manner, however unofficial, with the undertaking. The fear may not be justified, but the feeling cannot be gotten rid of that somehow and somewhere there is an Ethiopian in the wood-pile. We fear that we may be made unwilling tools for the realization of objects which lurk behind and are not openly avowed. We fear that we are in the hands of schemers. Politics is a trade bad enough, but ecclesiastical politics is the worst profession. Religion is a matter of concern to us all. That the Bible should be read with understanding by the people is a proposition we readily agree to. But we are not sure that religion is not used as a cloak for political machinations which we cannot enter into partnership with. The compiler of the text-book may be animated by the loftiest and most innocent motives, but we are not sure that the crowd behind him may not be using him for purposes other than an interest in Bible knowledge on the part of the youth of this country. We know that there is such a thing as a Christian lobby in Congress which is watchful for an opportunity to Christianize the Constitution. We doubt whether it is to interest of religion to have God acknowledged on the statute book. We should think that the sacred convictions of religion derive their authority from more potent sanctions than the statecraft of legislators. We are satisfied with the present status which gives unto Cæsar what is Cæsar's and to God what is God's. We do not wish the spheres of Church and state tampered with. The borderland must not be wiped out. The wisdom of our ancestors, who as a matter of law and state policy, disestablished the Church and removed it from State tutelage must not be undone. It has worked well in the past, to the advantage of both. And so we say, hands off! when it comes to any attempt to turn religion into an affair of the state. The infidel may object to all such scheming because he is hostile or indifferent to religion. We Jews object because religion is indeed our chifest concern. We prefer to have it remain a private affair. When Europe is realizing that the salvation of the Church depends upon its separation from the Church, shall we in America return to a system which others are discarding? No, and a thousand times no.

With the reading of the Bible in the public schools we may and may not be in agreement. Where the Bible is read because the law enjoins that it should be read, we may as individuals approve of this or the other text-book which will safeguard the interests of all. But we must have the assurance that by giving our approval we are not betrayed firstly into forcing Bible readings upon states which so far have resisted all attempts at legislation in this direction, and secondly that there is not a more far-reaching scheme behind to Christianize the Constitution, a scheme which we shall do our level best to fight to a finish along with a large section of the American people. The issue is perfectly obvious and is recommended to the attention of all clear-thinking men and women.

GOVERNMENT HELP FOR FOREIGN JEWS IN PARIS.

The French government is looking after the needs of foreign Jews in Paris. General Gallieni, the military governor, has caused placards in Yiddish to be affixed to the walls in the streets of the Fourth Arrondissement, the Ghetto of Paris, notifying Russians, Belgians, Serbs and English who have resided in that quarter for some time that they are at liberty to apply at the Marine for pecuniary assistance, should they be in need of it, during the continuance of the war.

FIRST JEW IN AMERICA TO ATTAIN EXECUTIVE STATE OFFICE.

Mr. M. Alexander of Boise City, Idaho, was elected Governor of the State of Idaho at the election held Nov. 3, 1914.

Mr. Alexander is president of the Congregation Beth Israel and also a member of Joseph Lodge No. 73 of the I. O. B. B. of St. Joseph, Mo.

The election of Mr. Alexander as Governor of the State of Idaho is the first instance where a Jew was exalted to the high office of governor of any State in the Union. This indicates the broad spirit and tolerance of the general public of the State and is proof that in that State at least there is an equal chance and opportunity for every one and that a man's religious belief is not considered in connection with the duties of citizenship.

GENEROSITY OF A BEN B'RITH.

More than 500 children gathered at the Elks Temple, Saginaw, Mich., on Thanksgiving Day afternoon to partake of the annual Thanksgiving dinner given by Mr. Max Heavenrich, a member of District Grand Lodge No. 6 and prominent worker of Saginaw lodge. The number far exceeded all expectations, there being over 100 more boys and girls than had been prepared for. At the close of the dinner the children were the guests of the management of Dreamland Theater, where a special performance was given for their benefit.

PRO-JEWISH APPEALS TO RUSSIAN PREMIER.

The Council of Trade and Commerce, having failed to impress the Minister of Education, has sent a petition to the Premier asking for the admission of Jewish students at foreign educational institutions in Russian high schools. The Council dwelt on the scarcity of men who possess a higher education in Russia, a dearth likely to be felt even more keenly after the war.

The President of the Duma is also using his influence on behalf of the Jewish students.

The appeals made on behalf of the vast number of ruined Polish and Jewish communities near the frontier (whose claim has been recognized even by the Novoe Vremya is bearing fruit. Government representatives, who had large sums placed at their disposal, are visiting the areas affected in order to examine the situation and administer relief.

At the same time the Liberal and Russo-Jewish Press continues to express amazement at the absence of any real indications pointing to radical changes in the Jewish position in Russia. On the contrary, recently regrettable measures leading to the revision of the rights of domicile of Jews and their expulsion were again adopted at Kieff and Petrograd and in Turkestan, although, happily, the number of exiles was small in all cases.

PROF. EHRMANN, PRESIDENT DISTRICT NO. 10, REPORTS ON CONDITIONS IN AUSTRIA.

Vienna, Nov. 17, 1914.

My dear Sir and Brother President of the Order.

We are exceedingly grateful to you and to the American brethren for the aid and assistance you are extending to us.

Everyone here is suffering under the horrors of the war, the majority by having their dear ones exposed to the dangers in the field. Many of these have been killed or wounded and but relatively few have been taken as prisoners of war and have to undergo a treatment not nearly as humane as was the case formerly.

Many of our brothers are suffering under the economic depression, but altogether the middle classes do not fare nearly as bad as the foreign newspapers have claimed. The working people have ample employment and the organization for the unemployed is doing its utmost to secure these people sufficient work to provide for the actual necessities of life, and has so far been fairly successful.

The greatest sufferers are those who had to flee from their homes before a cruel enemy and most of these unfortunates fled to the western countries, principally to Vienna and thence to Moravia, Bohemia and Silesia. There are hundreds of thousands of such unfortunates.

As events happened with surprising rapidity the people found themselves without shelter and as too often they found it impossible to take with them even the most necessary clothing they were exposed to the inclemency of the weather. Even the well-to-do among them were compelled to accept public support and I am glad to say that public charity, Jewish and Christian, as well as of the state was liberal and self-sacrificing. The fugitives were principally Jews.

As the winter progresses constantly increasing means will be needed to protect these poor sufferers from actual want. We will manage to provide for the needs of the poor of our congregations from our own means, but in order to be able to properly assist the fugitives at this time and until the period when it will be possible for them to return to their own homes, mostly devastated, we appeal for aid to our generous American brothers. We shall conscientiously apply all means placed at our command according to such instructions as you may choose to furnish.

Our brothers and sisters are almost all busily engaged in the care of the fugitives, their wives and children and they look not only after the material welfare of these unfortunates, but also after their spiritual and moral well being. Not only are these people furnished with shelter, food and clothing, but work is found for the women and girls, the children are looked after and given instruction. Many of the women fugitives who are in childbed and the many others who soon will be, are furnished medical attention and the best of care. The same care is taken of all the sick.

When peace shall have been restored, the one advantage of these sorry times will be that humanity has learned to draw into closer communion through misfortune and that we shall have learned anew to help our brothers bear their burdens and to feel for and with them. Such unanimity of opinion as now prevails in Austria has never before existed within the recollection of the oldest persons.

May God grant that these trials may turn out for the good!!!

With hearty brotherly greetings,

S. EHRMANN, President
District Grand Lodge No. 10.

PERSIA AND SALONIKA JEWS.

The Retch (of Petrograd) states that the Persian Minister in Constantinople, through the medium of the Turkish Chief Rabbi, has invited the Jewish merchants of Salonika who had settled in the Turkish capital to proceed to Persia. The merchants have been promised exemption from taxation and other privileges. The German Ambassador has announced that the German banks and factories would also support those merchants with the object of enabling them to settle in Persia.

EDISON DENIES ATTACK ON JEWS IN GERMANY.

(From the American Hebrew.)

In an interview which the Detroit Free Press claimed to have obtained from Thomas A. Edison on the war in Europe, the inventor is reported to have said: "It is the Jews who have advanced Germany to the high position in business. You know the business ability of our Hebrew friends. They have control of the business of Germany, and the military gang which governs the country does their bidding. As an instance of this, the electrical business in Berlin is controlled by a Jew and it employs about 86,000 men. The German man can claim little credit for the business rise of Germany, except in that the country has allowed its business men a free hand to combine, and has not restricted them as has the United States."

Believing that Mr. Edison was misquoted, Mr. Jacob H. Schiff, of New York, wrote the inventor, asking whether the printed interview states what he had said to the reporter. Mr. Edison's answer to Mr. Schiff is as follows:

Mr. Jacob H. Schiff,
William and Pine streets,
New York City.

My dear Mr. Schiff: Replying to your favor of the tenth instant let me say that I have not seen the newspaper article you refer to, but I remember what I said and it was this: That the Germans took all the credit for the great advance of their nation in commercial prosperity, whereas, the fact is that the military group that rules Germany had brains enough to take the advice of the great Jewish bankers and business men, and gave the captains of industry a free hand, thus enabling them to build up the enormous industry of modern Germany. I instanced the Blechroders, Ballin, Rathenau and Loewe, and said that if one went down to the bottom of things in the great and most successful industries, one would dig up a Jew who furnished the ability that made them a success.

Yours very truly,
(Signed) THOMAS A. EDISON.
Orange, N. J., Nov. 12.

MESSAGE OF MR. MORRIS N. SCHNEIDER, PRESIDENT DISTRICT GRAND LODGE NO. 4.

Grand President Schneider recently issued his semi-annual message regarding the condition of the Order in District No. 4. We quote from the document the following particularly forceful statements:

" . . . The year's work has been one of absorbing interest, educative, and a great developer in the sense of awakening one to a fuller realization of his obligations and duties toward self and the Jewish community. It has indeed been a wonderfully impressive lesson. . . .

" . . . The B'nai B'rith Lodge in each community should be an important factor in the Jewish activities, and its work is resultful in the same degree as the members exhibit substantial support and the officers inspire same; its usefulness can only be measured by the results attained through much personal sacrifice, the expenditure of considerable nervous energy and a keen appreciation of the demands, both from sources within its own limits and the outside! . . .

"The Independent Order of B'nai B'rith has been the powerful agency in the uplift and betterment of the Jew from a despised and shunned nation, having to its credit the establishment of enduring monuments as represented by institutions throughout the world, magnificent tributes to the concerted forces and effective power of a united Jewry! . . .

"It is our bounden duty, our sacred duty, to ourselves and future generations to throw the broad mantle of B'nai B'rith Protection, Kindliness, Harmony, and Equality around our people who come among us from abroad, as a Glorious Welcome to the Land of Promise and Fulfillment and make them an asset, not a menace, and to that end we must strive by every individual power and collective force to exemplify our creed of Brotherly Love and Unified Helpfulness! . . .

"It is but fitting recognition that your President give expression to his appreciation of the splendid work and co-operation of our Grand Secretary, who is always obligingly on the job and ready to respond enthusiastically to any and every call. District No. 4 has indeed a secretary worthy the name. Active, energetic, faithful and conscientious, and District No. 4 challenges its sister Districts to produce a secretary that can compare to our worthy, perfectly good, and enthusiastic secretary, I. J. Aschheim. I know this is the expression of the sentiment of the entire membership. . . ."

INSTITUTION OF NEW LODGES IN DISTRICT NO. 4.

Tucson, Ariz.

In last month's issue you indicated that President Morris N. Schneider of District No. 4, assisted by his Grand Orator, Rabbi Friedland of Oakland, will make an incursion into new territory for the purpose of establishing a new outpost of the Order. The result of his trip was as yet problematical. Today the good news may be reported that Tucson Lodge No. 763 is an accomplished fact, brought about by the efforts of these two brethren, greatly facilitated by the energetic Rabbi Brother Martin Zeilonka of El Paso, Texas. Brother Schneider being a total stranger in that region invited the Rabbi to join him and at a moments notice the latter was on the field eloquently setting forth the claims of our beloved Order and giving our people of Tucson a picture of the magnificent achievements of the B'nai B'rith. President Schneider, acting under authority of the General Committee, immediately organized our Tucson friends, Sunday, Nov. 15th, and granted them a charter. It is to be hoped that the lodge will not lack the necessary stimulant to grow and keep apace with the progress and advancement of the State of Arizona. It will all depend upon the lodge itself and upon a proper conception on the part of its members of the ideals and purposes of the order and the obligation to which they have subscribed.

Bakersfield, Cal.

On their return trip they made a stop at Bakersfield, a thriving town on the San Francisco, Los Angeles Railroad. It is the metropolis of the California oil district and its citizens are enjoying considerable prosperity by reason of the great oil developments that have taken place in that vicinity the last few years. There was really no reason why our Order should not have had a foot-hold in that town long ago, especially since its sister city, Fresno, had enlisted within the last two years. But be the explanation what it may, Bakersfield is now in line and there is every reason to believe that the lodge will be among our Southern strongholds. When Brothers Schneider and Friedlander arrived at Bakersfield on the morning of Tuesday, Nov. 17th, they were met by a committee and told that they will receive a warm handshake from every one of our people and that even a collation had been ordered at the principle hotel. But that the organizing of a B'nai B'rith Lodge must not be mooted even. Brother Schneider replied that he will gladly participate of their hospitality and allow the lodge to take care of itself. And so it did. They came, assembled around the table as free independent Israelites and rose as pledgees to the B'nai B'rith. Every mother's son had attached his name to the petition for a charter before the dessert was served. That night Bakersfield Lodge was duly organized under a charter granted by President Schneider.

Berkeley, Cal.

This is the Athens of the Pacific Coast. The seat of the University of California, a place where the atmosphere is heavily laden with culture and higher education. Brother Manuel J. Jacobs, an erstwhile student of the University of Illinois and holder of a number of degrees from various institutions of learning, has for a long time harbored the pet idea of organizing the Jewish students into the kind of a B'nai B'rith Lodge, which should supply them with the intellectual food of the Menorah Society in addition to the advantages that may accrue to them from belonging to a universal organization such as ours. He finally succeeded in seeing that pet idea materialize. The lodge was organized last Sunday, Nov. 22, upon a petition signed by thirty-six applicants, more than half of whom are students. This is merely a wedge which we hope will broaden as time goes on. Brother Jacobs, the president, is at the head of the Mathematical Department of the Public Schools of Berkeley, an idealist of the purest type and a lover of his people. So we may confidently leave the lodge under his influence. Brothers Lucius L. Solomons, Edmund Tauzsky, President Schneider, Secretary Aschheim and Past President Sidney Kahn attended to the ceremonial part of the institution of the lodge.

This makes the ninth lodge organized under the administration of President Schneider, an admirable record for one who pretends to no more than the title of a plain business man.

THE SERVANT OF THE LORD

By Dr. MAX L. MARGOLIS
Written for the B'nai B'rith News.

In the book of Isaiah, in the second part thereof, a group of poems may be readily differentiated from the rest both by the diction employed therein and the subject-matter. A whole literature has of late grown up around these poems and it cannot be said that a solution has been reached which is universally acceptable. The very question as to whether those poems must be segregated from their surroundings is still being mooted. Nor is there unanimity as regards the personality of the Lord's Servant whose glorification is the subject of the poet's noble effort.

As a purely literary question the matter would be of interest to scholars solely. The problem of authorship is indeed of subordinate importance. Yet even the layman may have his curiosity aroused when he is told how far apart the guesses of the students have been. In olden times no question of authorship was raised. Not only was there no suspicion that the poems might be foreign to the context, but the whole book of Isaiah was ascribed to the prophet who witnessed Sennacherib's campaign, and Ben Sira has no difficulty in speaking of him as the one who comforted the mourners of Zion. It was believed that a prophet had the gift of vision to see and announce the things that were to happen centuries ahead even to the point of calling Babylon's conqueror, Cyrus the Persian, by name. In the Middle Ages Jewish scholars cautiously advanced the theory that the second part was the work of a nameless prophet who lived during the stirring times when the fall of Babylon was imminent. Since then the two parts have by the common consent of Bible students been dissociated and the second part vindicated for the Great Unknown. Yet the question remains how the latter part came to be united with the older. It would seem as if the play of accident would have to be ruled out of consideration. If then a matter of design, the opinion may be ventured that the author himself appended his prophecy to Isaiah's book. The careful reader will observe throughout the appended prophecy a singular insistence in the thought that the advent of Cyrus was predicted of old. We are reminded of the legend to the effect that when Alexander the Great appeared before the gates of Jerusalem he was shown by the Jewish notables the visions of Daniel wherein his coming was prophesied. Never mind the fact that Daniel was written much later. It is the spirit of the legend that is of moment. It is quite conceivable that the Jewish notables of Babylonia foreseeing the destruction of the proud city hastened to present themselves before Cyrus and produced a prophecy which they induced a gifted literary genius to join to Isaiah for the purpose of showing that the conqueror's advent had long been foreseen and that he was the agent chosen by the God of Heaven for the subjugation of the Babylonian empire and the liberation of the Jews.

For the central figure in this prophecy on the political side is Cyrus. Jeremiah had counseled the exiles to pray for the welfare of the city to which they had been taken. He had at the same time predicted that after a period of seventy years Babylon was doomed to destruction and that the Jews would be liberated. When the youthful hero from the eastern mountains loomed up on the horizon of the captives, their hope was centered in him. I am free to confess that the impression one receives from perusing the Great Unknown's prophecy is that his views of what the epoch-making events meant were not shared by the majority of his people. As a matter of fact he calls his fellow-exiles a blind people, far from capable of understanding the things that were happening before their eyes, far from perceiving that in and through the great catastrophe that was being enacted God was working out the destiny of His people. Imagine for a moment that with the stupendous conflict of nations now absorbing the world's attention a great prophet were to arise among us and deliver his impassioned oration having for its theme the release of Palestine that it might be restored to the Jew. Who would believe him? Who would not laugh him to scorn for the audacious view that the fortunes of a small people were worth a catastrophe engulfing great and proud nations? Yet such was the contention of the Prophet of the Exile. In an address unparalleled he bestows on the foreign liberator of the Jews the [illegible] in the vocabulary of the Jew. He calls Cyrus the Messiah. Thorough believer in God's incomparable Unity and Holiness that the great prophet is, he cannot conceive of a great world-transforming event occurring without God's will and command. God orders the destinies of the world through His appointed agents. Asshur had been the rod in God's hands to punish the Jew for his sins. Now that Jerusalem had paid off her debt, had expiated her sin, Cyrus was sent to proclaim liberty to Zion and to rebuild God's Temple.

Cyrus, the Messiah, and Israel, the Lord's Servant—such is the double message of the prophet, the glad tidings he bears to the exiled nation. If on the political side Cyrus occupies the center, on the spiritual side undoubtedly Israel is the pivot for history to turn about. If we leave the disputed poems out of consideration, the residue of the book makes it clear beyond the shadow of a doubt that for the prophet Israel is the Lord's Servant, the elect of God. What otherwise might be overweening conceit, under the pen of the Great Unknown becomes the loftiest ideal beyond the immediate interest of a small nation for the world at large. This man has the boldness to proclaim that God calls His anointed agent, Cyrus, to redeem His enslaved people, but withal it is a redemption of mankind. Israel, so the prophet announces, has a task to perform, a vocation, a mission. But to accomplish its task the people must be set free, restored to the land of the fathers. The idea of the mission is by no means confined to the disputed poems. It is clear that we must discard that theory according to which those poems are later than the residue of the book and were placed on the margin of the manuscript just because there was room for it. Others claim that the poems are older than the remainder. Still others say that the prophet of the exile found these poems and used them as themes upon which he developed his own thoughts. It is quite true that a calmer tone pervades those poems. It is also true that the general impression is justified that the Servant of those poems appears to be an individual or at least a person other than Israel. Yet in one passage at least Israel is addressed by name. For fear of being technical I must refrain from discussing the difficulty in all of its phases. It seems to me possible, however, to hold that poems and remainder are from the same pen. The prophet operates as it were with a double personality, a dual Israel. On the one hand he thinks of the people and on the other of the people's genius. But the two are merged into a unit in his mind. The double mission of that personality is given unmistakable expression in the post-scripts to the poems. It is a mission within and without. Within it means the gathering of the dispersed, the assembling of the scattered remnants of the people from the farthest isles. For without a home of its own Israel will not be capable of becoming mankind's teacher. An older prophecy foretold in the end of the days humanity's pilgrimage to the sanctuary on Zion's hills whence was to come forth the law. And without it meant the conviction that Israel's teaching of the truth would become the common possession of mankind. Great world-events are shaping themselves. Who but the One God has ordered them? If Cyrus is the moving factor in those stirring events, he is God's agent, God's anointed, the Messiah. But for whose sake has Cyrus been sent? For the sake of God's chosen people. Israel shall be liberated and Jerusalem rebuilt. The dispersed shall be gathered. But for what purpose? That Israel may become the teacher of mankind, the missionary of the truth, the bringer of the glad tidings of universal peace. And as a true missionary and prophet, it has pleased God to crush Israel to the depths of misery that he may take upon himself the woes of mankind and atone by his own sufferings for the sins of the world. From the grave of the exile he shall be rescued, risen to new life that through him God's world purpose may be accomplished. For God is One, the nations and the kingdoms His agents, and Israel His appointed teacher, Servant.

The Great Unknown's prophecy became immediately true to a partial extent. The Jews were liberated by Cyrus, Jerusalem was restored and Zion rebuilt. But only a small number returned. The bulk of Jewry remained abroad. Israel joyous in the achievements of a Nehemiah knew that the greater glories were still outstanding. The Jews in Jerusalem continued to pray for the gathering of the dispersed. Read the Psalms and Ben Sira. The Jews held fast to the hope that they would accomplish some day the conversion of the world to the Jewish truth. The Temple fell a second time. All Israel was exiled, dispersed. But the old prophecies served as an inspiration in the gloomiest periods. When the Jew bled to death through all the vicissitudes of the sufferer's career, he clung to the book and the hope it contained and across the centuries he prayed that God's word might at last become true. The ancient prophecies still inspire us. For we are without a prophet in our midst to interpret for us the meaning of the events which now stir us to our depths. But we cling to the undying conviction that God is One, that it is He who leads hosts to the battle, that His ways are past understanding, that much suffering is in store for His people, but that as certain as it is that God's word cannot prove false the redemption of the Jew is nigh at hand and that Israel will be set free to assume his role of Servantship in all earnestness and lead mankind to the truth and to an abiding peace.

NEWS FROM LONDON

BY OUR CORRESPONDENT DR. M. EPSTEIN

London, November 20, 1914.

On the face of it war is an evil. Nobody will deny that. A thousand reasons would be easily forthcoming in proof. But one obvious one would in all probability be overlooked. The thoughtless lose their heads in war. Read an English newspaper, or a French or a German; the same impression is conveyed by each of them. They appear to have lost their balance. Sane judgment seems to have been flung to the wind. Every stranger is a spy. Every foreign tongue is the language of the enemy. A factory with a flat roof suggests secret preparations by enemy agents, and strong foundations for machines concrete platforms for heavy guns. Myths are started, and like shadows on a wall, grow to enormous size. It requires a major-general, writing to our foremost paper, to assure us that the concrete platform ghost is of such stuff as dreams are made of, and that the fabled 6 feet of thickness were in reality only six inches.

After all, these are comparatively harmless illusions, and all thoughtless minds are subject to them. But often they manifest themselves in quarters whence springs much evil, possibly not intended at first. Thus, the same disease which taints the outlook is responsible for certain of our newspapers gently insinuating that Jews are responsible for all manner of things. The Poles allege that the spies that helped the German armies are Jews. The Times alleges that the Turkish attitude has been influenced by—not Jews—but Crypto-Jews. What does the average reader know of the difference? The sting remains. The paper speaks of Crypto-Jews, in the clubs the first half of the compound is omitted. All this is bad enough; it is much worse that Jews should be regarded as strangers. All this crankiness, expected as it might be in time of war, is only intensified by lack of knowledge of the Jew. Despite the Bible, despite lectures and pamphlets, newspaper articles and dramas of all kinds and qualities, the Jew is still, it would seem, an unknown quantity to the average citizen of Western Europe.

Now there are thoughtless people apparently among Jews also. They likewise appear to lose their balance in face of war; and their conduct becomes ludicrous. Thus we are credibly informed that Sir Francis Montefiore is severing his connection with all Jewish societies and organizations which include aliens among their members. And yet the mother of Sir Francis was born in Germany! Or take another case. The Maccabaeans had a motion down for discussion at a meeting held yesterday, moved by one of their most prominent members, in these terms: "To propose that no aliens shall in future be eligible for election as an ordinary member of the Society." Of course, the motion may not have been adopted; its proposal, however, is significant. One other example will suffice. Recently in one of our synagogues the minister in a sermon, preached that the sufferings of the Belgians were only the just retribution for the atrocities committed in the Congo.

In normal times the perpetrators of such eccentricities—they are nothing else—would themselves be amused. Now that we are under the shadow of war they take them seriously. It is fortunate that there are still a goodly number of folk whose senses work as heretofore and who, while realizing to the full the horrors of it, while understanding the attitude of each side, are yet sane enough to appreciate that clear thinking is the prime necessity in this ghastly conflict. Noncombatants also have their work to do, especially in the face of so many problems, chief of which is that of the refugee. For still they come, though the stream is thinner now than it was at first. The number grows nevertheless, and it is calculated that some six thousand Jewish refugees, mostly from Belgian towns, are in our midst. These represent the destitute. There are others who may be termed semi-destitute, whose resources, slender though they be, allow of their independence for a little while. The Poor Jews' Temporary Shelter has proved itself magnificent in handling the problem. Some of its more devoted workers have actually lived on the premises for days together, working from early morn until late at night.

But the buildings of the Shelter have become too small to be anything more than a clearing house. When it was found that it was impossible to board out any more guests in the already overcrowded East End, the Government stepped forward and handed over to the Shelter a disused poorhouse and a large city hotel, which was about to be demolished. Both buildings were furnished and set in working order in an incredibly short space of time. The former houses over 1,000 of the poorest, while the latter with private rooms for each family, has a list of nearly 500 visitors. The upkeep of this large number, together with the hundreds still living near the Shelter itself, naturally runs into a biggish sum. The community has been appealed to and has responded nobly to the call for funds, although the demands on the purse at this time of stress are as a matter of course, never-ending. Be it remembered that the private hostels of which we wrote last month are also increasing. It is curious to see how congregational life has been quickened in connection with these hostels. First in the field was, we believe, the hostel of the First Lodge of England. It was quickly adopted as a model and numerous others sprung up, organized by different synagogues, until today every congregation in London that can afford it has a hostel under its wing, is planning one, is arranging for private hospitality or placing the refugees in self-contained flats. Never before has work of this sort been done congregationally. Each synagogue had its sewing guild, its committee for decorating the synagogue Sukkah, and that is about all. In America, as we know, congregational activities are manifold. Here in England the lack of social activities on a congregational basis shows only a simmering congregational life. All the more striking therefore is the outburst of congregational concern for the Jewish refugees. No doubt a certain amount of healthy emulation has been operative. Hampstead Synagogue lead the way; before long they had three hostels. Other synagogues therefore became busy likewise. Bayswater collected money; St. John's Wood carved out a new method. Its leading spirits said they disapproved of hostels. Accordingly small self-contained flats were hired, each for a family, and there refugees will be placed, with a grant of so much per week. Last in the field is the Liberal Synagogue, and thus another hostel is to be established. North London boasts two; North-west London has altogether five. The sum total of it all is that a warm welcome has been provided for the refugees.

One or two pleasing facts stand out in connection with the relief work. Everybody is keen about it. Ladies who before appeared to have no other interest in life but bridge have developed a marvelous capacity for organizing and running these hostels. Dames whose boast it used to be that they never put their nose inside their own kitchen now pray for the privilege of being allowed to cook a meal for about thirty refugees. And very well they do it too. We have heard of one hostel entirely for Roman Catholic refugees which is run wholly by Jews and Jewesses. All this only goes to prove that there is an immense fund of energy available in the Jewish community, if ony it is tapped in the right way. Surely herein lies one lesson which the war has brought home to us. If we can utilize this energy now, why not afterwards? If, despite high taxation, fairly large sums have been forthcoming for unselfish ends, why should not this be the case after the war too? Finally, London's need was the Provincial congregations' opportunity. Large and small towns with Jewish inhabitants have undertaken to look after as many refugees as their means would allow, thus lightening the burden of London. This spirit of co-operation is good to see.

But we are not as united on all questions as we are when charity is concerned. A clean line of cleavage has been effected by the suggestion that a Jewish battalion should be raised. A Welsh battalion, an Irish battalion have been formed. Why not a Jewish unit? At once the cry went up that a Jewish battalion would stamp its members as aliens, would be a sort of foreign legion. Others protested against this view, laying stress on their nationalist sentiments. Arguments are futile in face of differences of opinion of this sort; they are fundamental. But it is interesting to note this palpable fact. Twenty years ago a suggestion such as that of a Jewish battalion would have found little favor with the majority of Jews; today the community is divided fairly evenly upon the proposal. Look at it as one may, the fact remains that the national sentiment is on the increase. Perhaps it may be called upon to decide vital issues before it knows.

Within the last month Turkey has entered the sphere of hostilities. Palestine at once springs to the mind. Things there have been economically bad ever since August when the war began. Now the horrors of war have been brought to the very doors of the Holy Land. What will become of the Jewish colonists? A very large number are Russians, and Russians in Turkish territory will not be in an enviable position. Besides, the work of many generations will come to a standstill. The Anglo-Jewish Association will be cut off from its schools and the schools from their subventions. What the patient efforts of many years have gradually built up, that the exigencies of war will pull down in a short breathing space. Bad enough anywhere, it seems specially bad in Palestine. Belgium may be compared to a mighty tree. Its branches have indeed been cut down. But its trunk is firm, its roots are deep down in the rich soil. Belgium can hope to live, to re-establish itself. But Palestine is a tender plant scarcely deep rooted as yet; the storms and whirlwinds of war will break it down and root it up, and none shall deliver.

The ordinary run of things will produce this now. But what of the future? Some people are hastily dividing up the bear's skin before they have caught the bear. Palestine would certainly be welcome to a goodly number of Jews. A thousand diplomatic reasons are forthcoming why it should be handed over to its ancient inhabitants and owners. But calculations of this sort are a little too previous. The war is not yet over; Turkey is not yet completely defeated. In saying this we do not suggest that the probability of Turkey's defeat is not great. But prudence is good—especially in war-time. If Turkey is defeated, if the Allies carry the fruits of the victory, most men, we should imagine, would not find it difficult to agree that the days of the Turkish Empire are numbered. It is obvious that Turkey would be driven from Europe. But would she be driven from Asia? Who can foretell that now? Prudence in carving out Palestine is called for. Prudence in allotting it its future. The re-adjustment of boundaries, the setting-up of kingdoms is not like mending a clock. Deliberation and prudence are both called for. And what if Turkey in some unforeseen way should be able to hold its own? My good sirs, let us cease disposing of the old land of Israel; let us not forget by the way that wishes are not horses.

Our policy is clear. We must think out all that is to be said for Jewish liberation everywhere. Our case is good, our cause is just; our demands will be treated as reasonable. The sooner the better then; our plan must be got ready. Jews have been unfairly treated in the past. This is the first occasion in the world's history when elementary justice will demand that their case should be considered squarely. The Order will no doubt be ready when the peace-bells are ringing. Trust in God and keep your powder dry. Was not that the famous order? Trust in God and keep your arguments fresh, might be ours modelled on it. But above all else, and in heaven's name, let us work together. The interests of Jews in all lands are the same. They demand justice and full citizenship. The results of the war have brought communities more closely together. Political parties have ceased to be; united nations have taken their place. And are Jews the world over going to demonstrate their political ineptitude by being a camp divided within itself? Now more than ever the Order's motto is a real living need. We must have harmony. We must present a united front to the world. Everywhere we are doing our duty, and doing it nobly. Who shall despise the day of small nationalities? It is too early yet to see clearly. The horizon is enveloped in smoke. But the end must come, and when it comes Jews must demand and obtain complete citizenship. Some will want it in Palestine. Be it so. Others will want it in the lands of the Diaspora. Be it so likewise. But let us get it—full, untrammelled, ungrudging citizenship.

Three distinguished English citizens deserve a word of mention this month. Lord Rothschild has just completed the fourth year over and above psalmist's span of threescore and ten. His brother, Mr. Leopold de Rothschild, has just entered on the seventy. And the third we would name is the late Arthur Cohen who shed lustre on the community by his great distinction without. One of England's foremost lawyers, the Rt. Honorable Arthur Cohen, K.C., died in a good old age, full of honor and recognition. Another of the old generation departed with his disappearance from the stage of life, and one can measure the changes of the last quarter of a century in Anglo-Jewry by considering his life, his activities and his standpoint as a Jew. We have also to chronicle the death of another old man, the Rev. Isaac Samuel, whose career was crowned with universal popularity. A man greatly beloved, might fittingly be his motto. To these two losses must be added a third: a Jew of Germany this time. Prof. Jacob Barth is dead. Those who knew him best assert that he died of a broken heart at the news of his son's death on the battlefield. Be that as it may, his loss to Jewry is heavy. A great scholar, one of the first Semitic scholars in the world, Barth was also a great Jew. Had he not been a Jew he would easily have occupied an important university position in Germany. But the land of Treitschke and of Wagner appears to lack the sense of justice where Jews are concerned, even though it deprives itself of the services of some of the best of its sons. But in these days we have some cold comfort: it utilizes their services on the field of battle. Perhaps now that the blood of German Jews has commingled with that of German gentiles, the future may have better things in store.

With the approach of December the London Lodge is thinking of its officers for the coming session. In many ways there will be much to be done. When peace dawns the lodge will realize better than it ever did before that it forms a link in a big chain and that its activities matter. The office holders for the next session will have a difficult task. But they will face it with determination and the resolve to give of their best. Those who have guided the destinies of the lodge hitherto have set a fine example in this respect. They may be sure that it will be followed. The choice of the lodge will not be made until the December meeting. In our next we may be able to announce it.

JEWISH CHAUTAUQUA SOCIETY.

A large enthusiastic meeting of the Board of Directors of the Jewish Chautauqua Society was held recently and many matters of vital importance were considered, among them the program of the Assembly which will be held at Rochester, Dec. 25-31. The Annual Conference of Chautauquans already promises to be largely attended by delegates from all parts of the country, many of whom are Religious School Teachers, and by means of subjects to be treated and discussed, will yield much valuable information.

The Dean, Dr. Rosenau, reported that the correspondence school had, during the last month, added an additional enrollment of nine students, making at present 121 in all. From many sections rabbis write that they will in the near future have their existing teaching staffs and prospective Religious School instructors avail themselves of the education offered by the Chautauqua Society with regard to material and methods.

The Dean also reported that the course now being prepared on the Prophets by Rabbi Isaac Landman, is under way and will be ready to be given to students by the beginning of January. The publication of another Course on Social Service in connection with Religious Schools to be prepared by Rabbi Sidney Goldstein, is also in the process of work and the first lessons of the course will be ready for distribution by the beginning of next month.

Thoughts and Tidings---A Review of Passing Events

By H. Eliassof

The Jew As a Patriot.

Ever since the Jews were scattered among the nations the world has pointed the finger of suspicion and mistrust at the Jew and his adversaries openly avowed that the Jew can never be a true patriot. Many centuries passed before the Jew was permitted to serve as a soldier in the armies of Europe, Asia or Africa, and to share in the duty of defending the flag of the land of his birth. And even when one country after the other had admitted the Jew into their military ranks and he had proven his prowess as a fighting man and his fidelity to the flag of his country on many battle fields, the disparaging voices of his many enemies were not silenced. They still continued to accuse the Jew of cowardice and of lacking the feeling of true patriotism. In their opinion the Jew was always first a Jew, thinking first of his own individual interest and of the interests of his fellow Jews before he ever considered his duty to the flag of the country of his birth. The Jew, they said, is by experience and training a cosmopolitan, a citizen of the wide world, and he can not rise to the height of the patriotism of the non-Jew, who places his own country above all other lands, and his countrymen above of all other inhabitants of the earth. The Jew, they further said, knows nothing of this intense patriotic attachment of the non-Jew to his native soil, to his people and to his king, and he therefore can never be trusted with all the rights of full citizenship. It made no difference that for the sake of his country the Jew was always ready to suffer untold agonies; that when his country demanded it he willingly sacrificed all he possessed in the world upon the altar of patriotism and in case of war he resolutely plunged his near and dear ones into the abyss of poverty and starvation in order to help to swell the war funds of his country. It was of no avail that he heroically gave his life for the glory of his king and the defense of his fatherland. The world was never convinced of his sincerity as a patriot and the more he tried to clear himself of the suspicion of the world the more he was charged with treachery and disloyalty. His patriotism was never recognized anu his sacrifices were never acknowledged. In case his country suffered defeat he was often made to shoulder a great part of the blame, but he was never permitted to share in the benefits of victory.

A number of reasons can be advanced for the existence of this persistent and wide-spread prejudice against the Jew. In the first place the Jew was, and to a great extent he still is, a wanderer on the face of the earth and in his constant migrations from land to land he learned to know the good and the bad sides of many different nations, their virtues and their vices, their different ideas and ideals. He soon learned to judge all men rationally and without being blinded by egotism and prejudice, and he easily adjusted himself to the different conditions of the different countries. While he could love the country of his birth with all the fervor of a true patriot, he could not work up an artificial and unjust hatred in his heart for any other country. This is just wherein his patriotism differed from the patriotism of the non-Jew. The patriotism of the non-Jewish world was a double-headed eagle and each head was turned in an opposite direction. To the non-Jew patriotism meant not only the love of his native land but it also meant the hatred of all other countries outside of his own. In the event when economic or political differences between countries threatened to precipitate war, the leaders of each country involved at once started to fan the flames of hatred in the hearts of their countrymen to fever heat. Insinuations and false accusations were made use of in order to create a vehement dislike of one country against the other in order to establish a "casus belli," a plausible reason for war and to inspire the warriors with a fierce fighting spirit.

The political dogmas of exclusion of the ancient Greeks and Romans were to a great extent transplanted into the political life of the modern nations. The Greeks and Romans called all outsiders barbarians and looked upon the stranger as an enemy. This idea became an essential part of modern patriotism and gave birth to such sentiments as: "My [illegible] right or wrong, my country," [illegible] approved of egotism and injustice. For these reasons the philosophers [illegible] evils in patriotism. Voltaire, the French philosopher, said that patriotism is made up of self love and prejudice and merely makes us the enemies of our fellowmen. It was an Englishman who said that love of country often means the love of more country and the German poet, Lessing, declared that the praise of being an ardent patriot is the very last thing he should covet. The best and noblest thinkers were of the opinion that our love of country should not override the justice, the fair play and the consideration to which other countries are entitled. The Jew, who is an ardent lover of justice, could only practice a patriotism based upon love, right and justice; he could never approve of the general patriotism of the world of which hate and injustice were integral parts. His own culture taught the Jew the lessons of the brotherhood of man and of universal peace. The Mosaic code enjoined him to love the stranger, for it is plainly written in the Torah: "Va-ahavtem es haggair," ye shall love the stranger, and as a Jew he could never follow the political doctrine of the Greeks and Romans to hate the stranger, which doctrine was admitted by the modern nations into their conception of patriotism. The Jewish idea of patriotism was in reality the only conception possible in the light of modern civilization, but it seems that even civilization was powerless to influence the world to eliminate hatred and injustice from the ideas of patriotism.

The world could not understand the Jewish conception of patriotism and it therefore declared the Jew to be incapable of the true feeling of patriotism.

The nations were always willing to accept the help, the offerings and the sacrifices of the Jew, but he was always looked upon and treated as an alien. In times of war, when his money and his shooting strength were needed, the kings and emperors praised him highly and promised him much, but the praise did not cost anything and the promises were easily forgotten. In the present great European war the Jew is to be found on every battle field in the front ranks of the armies of all the belligerent nations. His loyalty to his native land is evident everywhere, his heroism is conspicuous and his patriotism cannot be questioned. Even Russia is forced to acknowledge the valor and the value of the Jewish soldier. But the questions still remain: What will be the fate of the Jews after the war is over? Will the world then acknowledge that the Jew is as good a patriot as the non-Jew, or has the Jew again spilled his blood in vain, to be again hated and hounded, persecuted and pestered, downtrodden and degraded by German anti-Semitism, French chauvinism and Russian brutality? Will Russia learn from her more enlightened allies to be more humane and more just, or will the allies become more contaminated with Russian inhumanity, Russian cruelty and Russian bestiality? Robert Herrick has said in his article on patriotism, published in a recent number of the Chicago Sunday Tribune, that the crop of hates and the exhaustion that will result from this terrible war, however settled, must postpone for a generation or more the accomplishment of many high ideals. Let us hope that the ideal of justice to the Jew will not be among the postponed ones. Let us also hope that after this war is over the Jew will not be tempted to say, like the wounded soldier of Weed's cartoon in the New York Tribune, who, when he was left alone and forgotten on the battlefield, maimed and mutilated, said: "I love my country, but I'll be hanged if I ever love another."

The Jew Coming to the Front.

The vastness of the present war is naturally agitating the world in all its phases of life and activities. Much has already been written and said by all kinds of moulders of public opinion about what this war will accomplish for the different peoples, the belligerents as well as the neutral nations. Gradually the gigantic war octopus is stretching out its titanic tentacles to drag down more and more of the nations of the world into the seething sea of bloody carnage. The Sultan in Asia and the Khedive in Egypt have already joined in the desperate struggles of the European nations, the Portugal Republic stands ready with drawn sword to fly to the fray and who knows how many more nations will yet become involved in the war before this horrible holocaust has spent its fury? It seems that the whole world has gone war mad and that nearly all nations, the little as well as the big, are determined to destroy the old order of things and to create new standards of life, new geographical boundaries, new economic conditions and new political doctrines. It seems that a reshaping of religion, of ethics and of social cohesion has already begun. The Jew is everywhere actively engaged in the very midst of the master builders who are now preparing the building material for the new social and economic structures and there are many signs on the trestle-boards to indicate that the Jew is coming to the front. The Jew has already become a factor in the achievements of the nations, which will have to be reckoned with in the reshaping of the political and economic fabrics of the world. The world knew long ago of the financial sagacity and the commercial acumen of the Jew and it is now forced also to acknowledge his patriotism, his usefulness and his help as a citizen of every commonwealth. England, Germany and even Russia are making special efforts to gain the sympathy and the aid of the Jew in the present war. The king, the emperor and the czar are praising the loyalty of their Jewish subjects and are readily rewarding the bravery of their Jewish soldiers. In the world of science and letters recognition is also no longer withheld from the Jew. As high standing a savant as the celebrated Sir William Ramsay recently declared that the Jews occupy a superior position in scientific research and achievement and he hopes and trusts that they will persist in vitality and in intellectual activity.

It is being generally acknowledged that when the proper time comes for the opening of peace negotiations with the warring nations the government of the United States will be the proper medium to start the deliberations. It is very probable that some of the American Jewish leaders, men like Oscar Straus, Jacob Schiff or others will be called upon to help in the councils of the peace envoys and they will surely not forget their duties to their Jewish brethren.

OUR PLAIN DUTY.

tions, is there any doubt as to where our sympathy and our support would go? Is there any doubt as to our allegiance to the stars and stripes? I would not debate the question for a moment; it would be an insult to even doubt my loyalty. Just so positive am I that it is a plain duty for us to respond to the call of our brethren, our coreligionists in Europe in this their hour of peril and need. May we all give according to our means, and let none wait until called upon to give."

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE.

The eighth annual meeting of the American Jewish Committee was held at the Hotel Astor, New York City, on Sunday, November 8, 1914. Mr. Louis Marshall, president, presided.

Various committees were appointed, whereupon the report of the executive committee was read and Dr. Cyrus Adler of Philadelphia, president of the Jewish community of that city, and Dr. J. L. Magnes, chairman of the executive committee of the New York Jewish community, presented reports of the activities of their respective organizations, which are constituencies of the American Jewish Committee.

The Committee discussed the situation of the Jews in the war zone and the means for coming to their assistance. Mr. Marshall on behalf of the executive committee announced that it had been decided to appropriate $100,000 from the Kishineff fund for the relief of the war sufferers.

The election of officers resulted as follows: President, Louis Marshall; vice-presidents, Julian W. Mack, Jacob H. Hollander; treasurer, Isaac W. Bernheim; members of the Executive Committee, to serve for three years from January 1, 1915: Isaac W. Bernheim, Samuel Dorf, Julius Rosenwald, Oscar S. Straus, Cyrus L. Sulzberger and Mayer Sulzberger. The following were elected members for a term of five years: Maurice Stern, New Orleans; Morris M. Cohn, Little Rock; Nathan Eckstein, Seattle; Henry M. Butzel, Detroit; Victor Rosewater, Omaha; Edwin G. Foreman and Joseph Stolz, Chicago; David Philipson, Cincinnati; Louis E. Levy, Philadelphia; Charles Van Leer, Seaford; Fulton Brylawski, Washington; Joseph Goetz, Newark, and A. Leo Weil, Pittsburgh.

NEWSPAPERS IN THE LONDON GHETTO.

The "Vorwaerts" publishes the following:

London is after New York, the largest Jewish city in the world. An idea can be formed of the number of Jews living in London when one hears that that city possesses four Jewish daily papers which are published in the international Yiddish idiom. The youngest of these papers is only fourteen days old. It is an evening paper, and has already gained a firm hold. The oldest Jewish paper of London is the "Daily Jewish Express," which has an edition of 5,500 copies. The largest edition is claimed by the "Jewish Journal," which has been in existence for about eight years. Until six months ago these two papers were the only moulders of public opinion in the Ghetto. Then an enterprising Roumanian Jew started the "Jewish Times," which found favor quickly and the same man established the first Jewish evening paper in Yiddish, the "Jewish Evening News." There is also a Jewish weekly paper called "The Arbeiterfreund." As the name indicates it is an anarchistic organ. The articles in these papers are all written in Yiddish and only in the advertising part one finds here and there an English word.

RELIEF FOR PALESTINE.

The provisional executive committee for general zionist affairs has recently forwarded to Palestine another $35,000 in addition to approximately $66,000 previously sent to Palestine by it.

The provisional executive committee is again in position to forward additional $25,000 to Palestine. Those desiring to avail themselves of the services of this committee to send money to Palestine, whether for philanthropic, educational, Zionist or general relief purposes, or to individuals, should send their remittance to Mr. E. W. Lewin-Epstein, treasurer, care of Nathan Strauss, 33 W. 42nd St., New York. There is no charge for this service.

ANTI-SEMITE RECANTS.

A German anti-Semite has written to the anti-Jewish paper, the Volkserzieher, stating that having witnessed the conduct of the German Jews in the battlefield he became completely cured of his anti-Semitism.

The Novoe Vremya of Petrograd has printed the following appreciation of services of Jews in the field: "The Jewish soldiers are highly praised; there are many volunteers among them and no deserters. They are all fine fellows."

Madam Eleanor Kopp, a prominent French Jewish lady doctor, has been attached for several weeks to the Red Cross Hospital established at Toulouse, France.

B'NAI B'RITH DAY CELEBRATIONS

LOUISVILLE, KY.

On Sunday, Nov. 29th, Louisville Lodge No. 14, of Louisville, Kentucky celebrated B'nai B'rith day in a way that demonstrated the fact that its members are actively interested in the Lodge and in the welfare of the Order.

In the afternoon a class of seven candidates was initiated by the new degree team which is composed of the following: Brothers Joseph L. Greencbaum, Joseph Lazarus, Dr. Abraham Nowak and Louis Grossman. The candidates were: Messers. H. Forman, Moses H. Speevack, Moses W. Schulman, Benj. Lesler, Herman Rosenblum, Samuel Lipnick and Louis Waxman.

The meeting was well attended, considering the inclemency of the weather. More than sixty members were present and it was the consensus of opinion that the work of initiation was conducted in the most impressive and delightful manner. The "charge to the new members" delivered by the Monitor, Dr. Abraham Nowak, was the feature of the meeting.

Each of the new members made short addresses and expressed their interest in the Fraternity.

Brother I. W. Bernheim, who has been a worthy member of the Order for forty years, addressed the lodge informally and his message was greatly appreciated.

Louisville Lodge feels proud in having "done things" this year. Results have been accomplished. Fifty new members have been added to our honored list, and enthusiasm, which has been lacking during recent years, has been revived. The pulse of the lodge has begun to beat as it should.

The afternoon meeting was only the matinee, however. In the evening, at eight-thirty o'clock, the lodge room, which is in the assembly hall of Temple Adath Israel, was completely filled by members, their wives, children and friends—and sweethearts. The weather was damp and uninviting, but the call of love was compelling. For the principal speaker and guest of honor was an old Louisville boy, fondly loved by his boyhood friends. It was sufficient to announce that Dr. Samuel Sale of St. Louis, Mo. was to be the speaker and guest of honor and his hosts of admiring friends grasped the opportunity to hear him deliver a wonderful address on the subject: "A Double Standard in Public and Private Life."

Brother Sidney J. Meyers was Chairman of the meeting. After delivering a few words of welcome, Dr. Meyers announced the program, which included the following musical numbers: Cello Solo, by Mr. M. C. Zahn; Baritone Solo, by Mr. Norman Simon, and a Flute Solo, by Mr. Walter Kuersteiner. Mr. James Wood was the piano accompanist.

After the meeting there was given an informal reception in honor of Dr. Sale. Delightful refreshments were served.

The success of this celebration and the organization of the degree team were largely due to the untiring efforts of Brother President Joseph L. Greenebaum.

CHICAGO, ILL.

Under the auspices of the Central B'nai B'rith Council, representing the Chicago lodges, arrangements have been perfected for the observance of B'nai B'rith Day on Saturday evening, December 26, 1914, at the Hotel La Salle. The Louis XIV ball room and the adjoining red room have been reserved for this purpose.

The program will be ushered in with a banquet, at which the guests of honor and speakers will be Hon. Lawrence Y. Sherman, United States Senator from Illinois, and Dr. Schmarja Levin of Berlin. The banquet will be followed by a class initiation conducted by the special degree team of the council and it is expected that a class of 200 candidates will be initiated. The evening's program will be brought to a close with a reception and ball.

The committee on arrangements has made a rule that only members and their ladies and elected candidates and their ladies may attend this affair, and admission will be strictly by card only.

WILMINGTON, DEL.

More than 600 members and friends of Maimonides Lodge No. 682 and Wilmington Lodge No. 470 attended the exercises held at the Adas Kodesch Synagogue on Sunday afternoon, November 29, 1914, to observe the anniversary of B'nai B'rith Day.

Mr. Morris Levy opened the exercises, welcoming the audience, and Mr. Nathan Miller presided. The speaker of the day was State Senator Jos. W. Salus, of Atlantic City, a Past President of District Grand Lodge No. 3, and prominent in Jewish civic affairs.

In his introductory remarks Mr. Salus paid a glowing tribute to the B'nai B'rith which he termed the most potential factor in the uplift of the Hebrews of the world. He referred to the B'nai B'rith as a standing army of Jewish people, who already have done much to alleviate some of the sufferings in the war-plagued countries. Mr. Salus went back to the Civil War times in his address and told of the trials and hardships gone through by the Hebrew on his arrival in this country. He led up to the present-day Jews who, realizing the opportunities of the United States, have come here and made good. The outcome of the taking of these opportunities, said Mr. Salus, is that among the foremost leaders of the world and the ablest professional men can be found a great number of Hebrews. One example of this, he said, could be found in the newspapers on commencement day among the names of the honor pupils. This, he said, was a wonderful tribute to so grand an achievement.

PITTSBURGH, PA.

Saturday, Nov. 28, 1914, was observed as B'nai B'rith day throughout District No. 3 and in nearly every Temple and Synagogue in the District addresses were delivered with reference to the work of the Order. In Pittsburgh, Dr. J. Leonard Levy preached at the Rodef Sholem Temple at the special service for the B'nai B'rith. On Sunday evening, Nov. 29th, Dr. Rudolph I. Coffee, rabbi of the Tree of Life Synagogue, held services and delivered an address on the subject. "The Work of the B'nai B'rith."

Dr. Coffee said the Synagogue must be the first tie to bind the race, often persecuted, into a common brotherhood. The home he said was made by the Synagogue rather than the home making the Synagogue. Dr. Coffee said that Judaism was never intended for bachelors. "It seeks not the life of a celibate, but rather a life partner who will help to make a home, and children are wanted and needed in every real home." The Order of B'nai B'rith, he said, was founded in America in 1843 and was intended as a happy medium for those Jews who, not being orthodox, cannot subscribe to the rigid interpretation of the faith.

WHEELING, W. VA.

Wheeling Lodge No. 615, of Wheeling, W. Va., celebrated B'nai B'rith Day on Sunday, November 29, 1914, at the Eoff Street Temple. The meeting was public and was largely attended. The following program was carried out:

"Our duty is for each to help according to his ability and to bring a feeling of harmony and peace to co-religionists."

Dr. Samuel Sale declared that there should not be one law for the individual and another for the nation. "Religion should not be used either in politics or business as a mask for ugly deeds," he said.

One of the most successful benefit performances, both from an artistic as well as from a financial standpoint, was held by Los Angeles Lodge No. 487, Sunday afternoon, November 29, 1914, at the Majestic Theater. The affair was largely attended by the best people of the community and the program was one of unusual excellence.

Grand President Morris N. Schneider and Grand Orator Dr. M. Friedlander of District No. 4, paid an official visit to Lasker Lodge No. 370 of San Diego, Cal., on Nov 10, 1914. They addressed a large audience at the San Diego Club in the evening and created much enthusiasm. A musical program was rendered and was followed by a dance.

SAN FRANCISCO PREPARES TO ENTERTAIN DELEGATES TO CONSTITUTION GRAND LODGE CONVENTION.

Elaborate plans to entertain the delegates to the Constition Grand Lodge Convention, in San Francisco next May, are being formulated by a special committee appointed by Morris N. Schneider, president of District Grand Lodge No. 4.

The meeting of the Constitution Grand Lodge, bringing to San Francisco leading Jews during the progress of the Panama-Pacific Exposition, is expected to be one of the most important events in Jewry of the coming year.

Subjects of paramount interest to the Jewish people will be considered at that meeting. The attending delegates, coming from every part of the country, will include the most prominent and successful Israelites in every field of human endeavor.

On account of the importance of the session, a special day has been given the Independent Order B'nai B'rith at the Exposition. This has been set aside as May 5, "B'nai B'rith Day."

The 1915 arrangements committee, headed by Otto Irving Wise, as chairman, is busy planning a round of brilliant social functions in honor of the distinguished delegates. Plans so far are tentative but it is planned to enliven the convention period with a series of social affairs. Sub-committees of the main committee are busy arranging for the accommodation of the visitors at the hotels, railroad facilities, and the like.

Members of the 1915 committee are: Otto Irving Wise (chairman), I. M. Golden, Frank Sperling, E. I. Wolfe, H. Gutstadt, M. H. Waseerwitz, Henry Schwartz, H. Newburgh, M. Kollman, M. N. Schneider, Albert Elkus, Martin P. Stein, Sig Sichel, George N. Black, Alex. J. Hart, Rev. Dr. Jacob Nieto, Louis Levin, Alfred Lazarus, Henry A. Zekind, J. T. Pechner, Harry K. Wolff, Max Wirtshafter, Samuel E. Welfield, Harry Gottesfeld, Milton Meyer and E. Block.

WINNIPEG LODGE, WINNIPEG, CANADA.

On Thursday, October 1st, the Social Committee having in mind the grave and stern Yom Kippur day, provided opportunity for giving freer vent to the feelings of the members by arranging an enjoyable evening in the shape of a smoker and debate, on subjects which the members themselves suggested during the evening, and in which quite a number of those present took part extemporaneously. The subjects were humorous as well as serious. The subject "In what manner will the condition of the Jews throughout the world be affected by the war?" received by far the better attention.

The prevailing opinion was that the Jews as well as the rest of the civilized world will benefit in the end by reason of the fact that a more extensive application of democratic principles will necessarily follow.

The meeting of October 15, which was well attended, was almost wholly devoted to consideration of the various appeals made for assisting the Jewish war sufferers. Owing to the peculiar position in which the members of the Winnipeg Lodge found themselves as British subjects, the question was raised as to whether the unconditional contribution to the large fund of the order which would go towards assisting all the Jewish sufferers, would not leave us open to the charge of being disloyal to our country. The debate on this subject, which lasted until past the midnight hour, resulted in the view prevailing that the Canadian Jews could not and ought not, by reason of their citizenship, assist others than Jews residing in the countries of the Allies.

To counteract the effect of the previous meeting, the Social Committee provided again for November 5 a combination meeting of business and pleasure in the shape of a debate on the subject "If Palestine were today an independent Jewish state, what position would she take in the present war?" This subject, being based on a hypothesis, left room for much speculation and flights of imagination in which the debaters indulged to the amusement of the members present, and the ladies of the Auxiliary who were invited to participate in the debate.

DINNER AND DEBATE BY J. HOUSEMAN LODGE OF GRAND RAPIDS, MICH.

On the evening of Sunday, November 29, Julius Houseman Lodge, No. 238, in conjunction with the Ladies' Auxiliary of the Temple, presented a dinner-debate on the proposition:

> Resolved: that Germany and Austria should be held accountable for the present European conflict, and that the defeat of these countries would be to the best interests of civilization.

More than a hundred and fifty people attended the affair and it was enthusiastically pronounced a success by all present. The affirmative of the question was upheld by Brothers Ben. Simon and Erwin M. Treusch, while Germany found her champions in the persons of Brothers S. Clarence Weil and Charles S. Jandorf. The debate was lively and well presented and the speeches proved to be finished arguments, at times bordering dangerously near the verge of oratory. At the close of a thoroughly exciting time, the Judges, Brothers Meyer S. May, Gustave A. Wolf and Adolph Friedman, basing their decision entirely on the merits of the debate, so as to observe the strictest neutrality in the gathering, rendered judgment for the affirmative.

The debate was arranged in conformity with the policy of the Lodge to give a certain number of social events in the course of each season, and the results proved highly satisfactory and gratifying to the Committee who had charge of the arrangements. This was true particularly because the Lodge had received but a few days before, a request from the Chairman of the Intellectual Advancement Committee that the Lodges evidence more activity in this particular line, and suggesting that the present war be utilized in different ways to provide syllabi for debate.

Julius Houseman Lodge is setting a decided pace, and the invariable success which greets their efforts shows that this is not the idle boast of an enthusiastic Committee.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.

The joint committee of the New Orleans lodges held a meeting on October 27, 1914, in the directors' room of the Y. M. H. A. A large number of the members were in attendance and among the matters discussed was the raising of funds for the sufferers from the war in Europe. It was finally resolved that a joint appeal be made by the B'nai B'rith, the American Jewish Committee, and the Zionist organization, and a committee was appointed for the purpose of discussing arrangements for a joint appeal.

The Committee on Intellectual Culture reported a plan of meetings to which prominent speakers from other cities are to be invited and who are to make addresses on subjects pertaining to Jewish questions.

The next meeting of the joint committee of the New Orleans lodges was held on November 2, 1914, at which the special committee appointed to devise ways and means for the collection of funds submitted report. After an extended discussion it was agreed that a joint canvass be made instead of each organization making collections for its account solely. It was further agreed that the sums collected should be divided among the Zionist organization, the American Jewish Committee and the B'nai B'rith Order for distribution among the distressed in the European war zone. A committee was also appointed to make a personal canvass and prepare a letter of appeal to such as cannot be conveniently reached by personal visits.

MEMPHIS, TENN.

At the regular meeting of Memphis Lodge No. 35 of Memphis, Tenn., held on Sunday, Nov. 22, 1914, the special order of business was the report of the committee appointed to raise funds for the war sufferers. Report was submitted showing almost $700 had been contributed by the members of the lodge, to which was added the sum of $200 donated by the Federation of Jewish Charities. The committee announced that the collection will be further augmented considerably by contributions before the next meeting of the lodge.

JOINT MEETING OF WASHINGTON AND MACABBEE LODGES.

The meeting of these lodges, held on November 5, 1914, under the auspices of the Macabbee Lodge, was one that will long be remembered by those who were fortunate to be present. Every feature of the evening was an enjoyable one, and the fraternal feeling so long ago existing between the two bodies was further cemented.

The features of the meeting were the exemplification of the ritual by the Washington Lodge degree team, assisted by the Washington Lodge orchestra, and a lecture on "The Poetry of the Bible" by the Rev. Ludwig Roeder of Brunswick, N. J., a member of the Macabbee Lodge. The work of the team was admirable and was ably supplemented by the orchestra. The lecture was replete with lore and fact, and was a fine example of a learned discourse by a learned rabbi; a more interesting subject could not have been selected, and all were enthusiastic in their praises.

The speakers were Bro. Henry Meyers, Bro. Jacob Davidson, Bro. J. I. Lipsitch, the chairman of the Intellectual Advancement of District No. 1, Bro. Pres. M. M. Stark, and Bro. Harry C. Adams of the Washington Lodge, and the following members of the Macabbee Lodge: Pres. Samuel Roeder, M. Enselman, and the Hon. Irving J. Joseph, State Senator.

HOREB LODGE, NEW HAVEN, CONN.

A meeting of unusual importance to Horeb Lodge No. 25, of New Haven, Conn., was held on November 22, 1914, at which nominations of officers for the ensuing year and of delegates to the convention of the District Grand Lodge to be held at Worcester, Mass., were made.

Horeb Lodge, by virtue of the number of its delegates and primarily on account of the character of the men which it usually sends as its representatives, has for a great many years occupied a commanding position in the deliberations of the convention.

A feature of the meeting was the initiation of a large class of candidates by the new degree team of the lodge, which has devoted a great deal of time to perfecting its work, and which acquitted itself creditably.

Vice-President Robt. E. Hyman was appointed by the president to act as chairman of the annual charity ball to be given by the lodge, which usually takes place shortly after the beginning of the new year. The proceeds of this affair are to be turned in to the charity fund maintained by the lodge for the support of charitable institutions.

The lodge was honored by a visit from Bro. Bellin of Providence, R. I., president of Haggai Lodge of that city, who in his remarks expressed deep satisfaction with the work of the degree team and the general work of the lodge.

President Witz addressed the members upon the position of the Jews in the warring countries. A general discussion followed in which Bros. Jos. H. Ullman, B. Goldman and others took part. Mr. H. C. Bretzfelder, chairman of the committee appointed to raise funds for the war sufferers, reported that the committee is meeting with much success in its efforts to bring the contribution of the lodge to the $5,000 mark.

ABRAHAM LIPPMAN LODGE, PITTSBURGH, PA.

Abraham Lippman Lodge No. 672, of Pittsburgh, Pa., is very much gratified over the success achieved with the last two monthly socials. In September a corn roast party and in October a card party and entertainment were held. The entertainment consisted of vocal selections, a humorous dialogue and musical numbers. After the entertainment refreshments were served.

The November social meeting consisted of an old-fashioned dancing party, which was held on the evening of November 26, and which was restricted, as far as attendance was concerned, to the members of the lodge and to members of the Ladies' Auxiliary. Arrangements were made with a well-known dancing master of the city to give an exposition of the proper way of dancing the latest dances.

What Our Lodges Are Doing

SAN FRANCISCO LODGES ENTERTAIN INMATES OF OLD PEOPLES' HOME.

On Sunday afternoon, November 22, 1914, the Committee of Fifty, B'nai B'rith Lodges of San Francisco, gave an automobile outing to the aged inmates of the two Hebrew Homes located in San Francisco. Over fifty machines responded to the call and the old people were taken sightseeing around the downtown section of the city, through the Golden Gate Park, along the Ocean Beach Boulevard and all around the United States Government reservation at the Presidio. Grand Trustee Milton Meyer, accompanied by some of the city officials, acted as the marshal of the automobile procession.

Through the courtesy of President Chas. C. Moore of the Panama-Pacific International Exposition, the committee was extended the privilege of touring about the nearly completed exposition buildings and grounds. The committee looked forward with considerable pleasure to escorting their guests through the Exposition grounds, having in mind that by reason of their advanced age, many of the elders would not have the opportunity and pleasure of witnessing the completion and operation of the great fair, the greatest, possibly, in the history of the world.

After the ride, the old folks became the guests of the Ladies' Committee of the B'nai B'rith at the B'nai B'rith Building, where an elaborate repast was served and souvenirs of the occasion presented to each of them.

The old people were then taken to their respective homes, where, we understand, the automobile ride has been the topic of conversation for the past two weeks. On account of the success of this initial venture, it is hoped to make the ride an annual occasion. The details this time were placed in the hands of a special committee of arrangements with Milton Meyer as its chairman.

ERIE LODGE, ERIE, PA.

Erie Lodge No. 620 of Erie, Pa., celebrated B'nai B'rith Day on Sunday evening, Nov. 29, 1914, at the W. 8th St. Temple. The exercises consisted of an address by Brother Samuel J. Kornhauser of Cleveland, Ohio, First Vice-President of District Grand Lodge No. 2, and was followed by a short musical program. Rabbi Max C. Currick introduced the speaker with a few well chosen remarks. At the close of the exercises Brother Theo. Landsberg on behalf of the lodge presented to Mr. Morris Schaffner a beautiful loving cup in recognition of his services to the lodge.

CALUMET LODGE.

Calumet Lodge No. 502 of Houghton, Mich., held a well attended meeting on Sunday, Dec. 6, on which occasion the officers for the ensuing term were elected. The installation of the officers will be held at the regular meeting in January, on which occasion it is planned to have some Grand Lodge officer pay the lodge an official visit and deliver an address. Reports of the officers submitted at this meeting indicate that the lodge is in a flourishing condition and there is good reason to believe that the coming year will be a prosperous one for the lodge.

Following the election the ladies of the Temple of Jacob held a social in the parlors of the Temple, which was a most successful affair. There was a good attendance and the social proved one of the most pleasant affairs arranged by the ladies.

JORDAN LODGE, NEW YORK.

Under the auspices of the entertainment committee of this Lodge, a dance was given recently at the Hotel Marseilles, in this City, which was the means of bringing together the members and their friends and was a most successful social affair.

At a recent meeting of the Lodge held in November, six candidates were initiated and a very interesting address was delivered by a Brother of the Lodge, Rev. Dr. H. Pereira Mendes, in which he mentioned the terrible affliction that has come over the countries of Europe, and spoke of the services that should be rendered, in the interests of peace, by the Ministers of all denominations.

THE I. O. B. B. EDUCATIONAL BOARD OF ALLEGHENY COUNTY.

The I. O. B. B. Educational Board of Allegheny County, at its regular November meeting held at the home of its president at Homestead, Pa., received reports from the various corrective institutions in which this Board has extended the work of educating along moral and religious lines the inmates of these institutions. The Educational Board is looking after the Jewish boys in three institutions—the Allegheny County Industrial and Training School for Boys at Warrendale, the Industrial Home at Oakdale, and the Industrial Home at Morganze.

MOBILE, ALA.

Beth Zur Lodge No. 84, I. O. B. B., held a largely attended meeting in the B'nai B'rith Hall on Sunday morning, November 8, 1914, the special matter of interest being the call for funds for the sufferers from the war in Europe and for those in Palestine. The lodge voted unanimously that Mobile should do its duty and a committee headed by Sidney B. Simon, the president of Beth Zur Lodge, Past Grand President Leon Schwarz, Rabbi Alfred G. Moses and Henry Hess, the President of Congregation Shaarai Shomayim, will make a canvass and the funds raised will be sent to the headquarters of the B'nai B'rith for the War Sufferers' Fund.

SOCIAL SERVICE WORK BY B'NAI B'RITH.

A Jewish congregation, perhaps one of the smallest religious congregations in the world, was addressed on Sunday, November 29, 1914, by Mr. Jacob Billikopf of Kansas City at the Ohio Penitentiary, located at Columbus, Ohio. Mr. Billikopf visited the institution at the request of Mr. Simon Lazarus of Columbus, and was introduced to the congregation by Mr. Jacob Myers, and delivered his address after religious services had been concluded by Mr. Jashenosky. His address was confined principally to social service work, in which he takes great interest, being the chairman of the committee of the B'nai B'rith on Social Service Work covering several states and nearly 100 correctional and charitable institutions. Mr. Billikopf spoke of two particular instances where men had with the help of the B'nai B'rith taken a new lease of life and made good. He pledged his aid to the members of the small congregation when they leave the institution and emphasized the all-important fact that it is the future that should count with men who have gone astray.

B'NAI B'RITH BUILDING, PORTLAND, ORE.

The new B'nai B'rith building of the B'nai B'rith lodges of Portland, is being equipped at the present time, the furniture being put in as it is specially manufactured.

A part of the gymnasium apparatus is now en route and some of it already has been installed. It will comprise a complete Spaulding equipment.

Classes have been formed and new names are being taken for both the men's and the women's classes, also for the juvenile classes. Special swimming facilities will be provided at the club building.

On Nov. 18, 1914, a meeting was held at the gymnasium where the younger men indulged in athletic exercises.

All the important Jewish organizations of Portland have arranged to meet regularly in the B'nai B'rith building and thus it is becoming a Jewish center.

As soon as the building is fully equipped it is proposed to hold a formal dedication ball.

JERICHO LODGE, PITTSBURGH.

Under the auspices of Jericho Lodge No. 44 of Pittsburgh, Pa., a well attended meeting was held on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 22, 1914. UNITY LODGE, SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

On Monday evening, November 23, Unity Lodge No. 273, I. O. B. B., of San Francisco, was attended by one of the largest gatherings recorded in the history of the lodge, over 100 members being present. The main event of the evening was an address by Past Grand President Otto Irving Wise on the subject, "The Jew in Europe now and when peace shall be declared and our duty toward and responsibility for these of our people."

The address was a very able one and the members were exhorted to build our order up to the point where the great voice of the Jew in America would be raised to protect our fellow Jew in Europe, as one man, and that by this unison of effort we could and would eventually emancipate the Jew in every corner of the universe.

With the distributing of Thanksgiving cheer to the members present the enjoyable and elevating meeting was closed.

SOCIAL SERVICE WORK BY RAINIER LODGE OF SEATTLE.

Rainier Lodge No. 627, of Seattle, Wash., has been gathering data in connection with the inmates of the Jewish faith in the state and federal institutions in the state with a view of extending assistance along practical lines when necessary.

A "State Institutions Committee" has been appointed to keep in active touch with the conditions. Bro. Albert A. Pillar is chairman, with Bros. Sol Friedenthal and Otto Guthman as other members.

CLARKSDALE LODGE, CLARKSDALE, MISS.

At the beginning of the year Clarksdale Lodge, which was formerly known as Max Kaufman Lodge, was reorganized and assumed its new name of Clarksdale Lodge. The lodge has progressed very much and at the present time its membership consists of 57. Initiations have been held at almost every meeting. The attendance at the meetings is good, ranging from 30 to 40 at each meeting, out of a membership of less than 60. This large attendance is remarkable in view of the fact that more than half of the membership of the lodge lives in surrounding small communities.

CONDITIONS IN RUSSIAN POLAND.

I suppose that the Polanders will maintain against this appeal to them, that I, whom the Ruthenians could never bring to any reproach or attack on them, that I am now because of my descent speaking in favor of a matter which is very ill heard by them. My personal descent has so little influenced my proceedings and way of thinking that during the whole of my public life I have been subject to continual attacks in national Jewish periodicals and newspapers as the man who denied community of descent and supposed community of faith.

Even this spring, during my stay in America, I was continually attacked in the American Jewish papers as the callous denier of the Jews. It was nonsense as most of that which appears in print, but it proves at least, that it is not on behalf of my blood but on behalf of my mind, that I speak on this occasion. My sympathy is not with the Jews as Jews but as the oppressed and ill-treated.

I am the man who a generation ago wrote: "We love Poland not in the same way as we love Germany, or France, or England but as we love liberty. For what is to love Poland but to love liberty, to feel a deep sympathy with the misfortune and to admire the courage and the combative enthusiasm. Poland as the symbol of all that which the supreme among mankind have loved and for which they have fought."

These were my words and hitherto I have stuck to them.

Shall I have to feel ashamed of having written them now Poland's future is being decided?

UNION OF AMERICAN HEBREW CONGREGATIONS.

Twenty-fourth Council of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations.

On Tuesday, January 19, 1915, the twenty-fourth council of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations will convene at Chicago. Two hundred and twenty-five congregations, representing about 30,000 households in Israel, or an aggregate of over 150,000 souls, will partake in the deliberations.

This meeting promises to be one of the most interesting and important in the history of the Union. Among the important issues to be presented for decisive action will be questions relating to the perpetuation of scholarship and learning in America, encroachments upon the civil rights of citizens by sectarian institutions, constructive and religious work among the scattered remnants of Israel.

THE B'NAI B'RITH'S OPPORTUNITY

An Address in the Rodef Shalom Temple, Pittsburgh, Sunday, November 9, 1914

By Rev. Dr. J. Leonard Levy

In the experiences of Jeremiah we find a resume of the tribulations of the people to whom the prophet belonged. As he says of himself in the first chapter of his book, the Lord had designed him to a holy purpose in life. "Before thou camest forth out of the womb I sanctified thee; I have appointed thee a prophet unto the nations."

Israel's Experience Like Jeremiah's.

When he reached maturity he saw his people bent upon taking the road that leads to destruction. When he reached old age he saw his country conquered by the Babylonians, his people removed into captivity, and every hope of his life apparently frustrated. When he observed the evil passions of his people in Palestine, he warned them concerning the necessary results that must follow. When they came and asked him to prophesy smooth things unto them, when they urged him to speak flattery instead of truth, this consecrated man could tell them only what he believed to be the will of God. The people treated Jeremiah abominally. They took him, a fearless, God-fearing man, lowered him into a filthy pit and left him there to starve to death. Had it not been that the prophet had, in spite of his honest candor, made a few friends, the probabilities are that he would have died in that pit into which he had been dropped by the hate of his own brethren. Some friends saved him and forced him to accompany them to Egypt, where, tradition says, by the hand of one of his own brethren he was murdered.

The Prophet Cannot Lie.

These are a few facts from the life of one of our great prophets, whose crime in the eyes of men, had been that he had urged his brethren to observe the words of the covenant made with them at Horeb; who had insisted that God is a God of justice, that He will visit upon every man the fruit of his own doings. Men hated Jeremiah because he told them the truth; and they warned him saying, "If you prophesy thus in the name of the Lord we shall not be responsible for the consequences!" They threatened him, they tried to close his mouth, they employed every expedient to overthrow his influence. Their efforts were vain. Jeremiah believed that he had been designed before birth for a great end, and that, though men could make him die, they could not make him lie; and that, though they might destroy him, he would still be a prophet unto the nations, while his foes were moldering in the dust and their names unknown.

The Suffering Servant of God.

I repeat that the life of the great Jeremiah is in many respects a summary of the life of Israel. Of him may be said what the New Testament writer says, "The prophet is not without honor save it be in his own country." The great Biblical scholars of international repute now tell us that the fifty-third chapter of the Book of Isaiah, which has so long and often been interpreted by various commentators as a reference to Jesus, has now come to be understood as a tribute offered by the second Isaiah to his famous predecessor, Jeremiah, the man who was "despised and rejected of men," the man "who had no comeliness that he should be desired," the "man of sorrows" who was sent to his death among the poor and who made his grave with the lowly. This "suffering servant of God" described in the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah, which orthodox Christians say is a forecast of the man of Nazareth, is to-day by the world's liberal scholars believed to be a tribute to, or an eulogy, a funeral oration, over the great Jeremiah.

The Prophets' Sorrows.

We of the Reform School of Israel do not deny the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah may have been a tribute to the memory of Jeremiah; but we find in it a description not of one prophet, but of every prophet; not of Jeremiah alone, but of the chosen among mankind and of Isreal who have striven, who have fought, who have bled, who have died, for the truth. The position that Israel has occupied among men is that occupied by Jeremiah among his people. The prophet is not understood to have been a prophet until he has long been dead. After his death the people, who raised their fists against him in his lifetime, raise monuments to him now that he is dead; the people who set fire to the fagots beneath his feet now kindle perpetual lights, or burn candles in churches, in memory of him whom they destroyed. Heinrich Heine was probably right when he said that if all Jews, with the exception of one, disappeared over night the whole world would travel to look upon this lonely miracle. They would reverently come to hold converse with the one man who unites the past with the present. They would come to touch the hem of the garment of him who was the lineal descendant of Moses and the prophets. Yet that very man walks the streets to-day, and in every part of the world he is the dishonored, and the hated, and the misunderstod of all people.

Israel's the Prophet's Fate.

The fate of Israel is the fate of the prophet in all ages. You cannot name a person who has played the prophet's role but unto him has been given the poison cup, when upon his head should have been placed the crown of honor; unto him have been given obloquy and misery, when every distinction and recognition should have been conferred upon him. But the people of Israel may lay the consolation to their hearts that, though the world does not understand, they who seek intercourse with the great teachers and leaders of the people of Israel comprehend the purpose of the sons of the covenant. Though we be unknown to others, though we be little understood by others, we who study the principles of Jewish faith and practice, we who keep in touch with the words of our masters and leaders of old, we who still nourish our soul upon the spiritual food provided by philosopher, and sage, and rabbi, of antiquity; we still know that Israel's hopes have not yet been realized, that Israel's function has been misrepresented, that Israel's purpose is not yet understood, that Israel's visions have not yet been fulfilled. We understand that the people of Israel, who are called B'nai B'rith, the Sons of the Covenant, yet have a mission to fulfill on earth, a mission which is of the prophetic type.

The Forward-Looking Prophet.

We understand why a prophet has no honor in his own country; whey he is not revered until after he is dead. We understand why the prophet has ever been regarded as one temporarily bereft of his senses. We know why it is that the Hebrew word for prophet, "Nabi," as all who are etymologists also know, suggests the idea of lunacy; why Amos the prophet when he was attacked in Bethel replied, "I am not a prophet, nor the son of a prophet, but the Lord took me from following the flock and said, Go prophesy unto my people Israel." We understand why every prophet is called a theorist, an unpractical man. The prophet is so often under the divine compulsion of teaching what the people do not wish to know. The prophet stands physically in the present, but his soul has leaped out into the distant future; while in the flesh he lives in his land as others live; but his mind is months, years, centuries, ahead of them.

The prophet was not one who foretold the future; he was the forward-looking man. He was always looking forward. Unsatisfied with prevailing conditions, he always planned for something better. When people said that the limit had been reached, he would argue that the tomorrow would be better than to-day. Thus the prophet became the exponent of the optimistic outlook for humanity which we in Israel call the Messiah, which to us means an era on earth in which such conditions would prevail that the best to-day would not be comparable with the worst to-morrow, for there should be no more war, nor poverty, nor want, nor ignorance. If you urge that this is a dream of dreams, a shadow of a shadow, I still hold that the prophet was ever the sane man in an insane age; he saw when others were blind; he felt when others' hearts were stones.

Opposed to the Status Quo.

The prophet in Israel told the needed but hated truths. The people were satisfied with things as they were, for the tendency of most men is to maintain the status quo—a fact especially true of those who are prosperous. For, they have their magnificent homes, their comforts, their assured incomes; their business goes as they wish; their bank accounts are safe; what, then, care they for the conditions prevailing outside of their own little, narrow circle? The successful man in every age has usually been the conservative man, and the conservative man has almost always striven to maintain the status quo, whether it was just or unjust, fair or unfair, equitable or inequitable. "We are satisfied," they have said, "what do you fellows want? We have all we desire, what are you looking for?"

Now, it was the function of the prophet to make men discontented with existing conditions; for they knew that, at no time, had man reached the inheritance unto which he had been designed by God. So long as in any country "the needy are sold for a pair of shoes," to use the words of Amos; so long as "the righteous are sold for silver," further to quote his words; so long as "everyone neighs after his neighbors wife," to cite Jeremiah's arraignment; so long as prostitution prevails; so long as there are ever-growing chasms between those who have much and those who have little; so long as such conditions prevailed or prevail, and so long as we see former general equality of social conditions changing to greatly unequal conditions—so long the prophet is needed to remind us that such a status quo is not the expression of the will of a just and merciful God.

I do not pretend, or wish to be understood to mean, that every person who calls himself, or is called, a Jew, or is a member of a Jewish congregation, or has Hebrew blood in his veins, assumes the position of the prophet; but I do mean that it is the Jew's function to take that position. I verily believe that, wherever we find a real son or daughter of the faith, loyal and devoted to the principles of Judaism, there we find a forward-looking person, there we find one who is dissatisfied with the status quo, not from a selfish standpoint, but because the status quo is wrong while ours is a world in which right ought to prevail.

Israels Reason for Wandering.

Hence it is that these people have been the hated, the misunderstood of the nations. They have been dropped into the filthy pits of public contempt and have been hung over the slow fires of public hate, everywhere, in every land, in every age, among every people, here as elsewhere, now as in the past. To me as a Jew this is the mark of the world's approval of my position. When the world flatters we need fear it; when the world holds us at arm's length and demands that we prove our worth, then the world is seeking to be fair. When the world unknowingly and unthinkingly hates we may feel assured that we are right and the world is wrong. This is my interpretation of Israel's suffering. This is the result of my investigation into the world's attitude toward Israel. They have said to Israel as the people said to Jeremiah, "If you prophesy thus in the name of the Lord, we will destroy you." They have tried to destroy us in every way, and they have failed, as they must fail, so long as the truth is with Israel, so long as he consciously feels that, as his prophet said, "Around about thee are the everlasting arms of God," and "though I make an end of all the peoples, I will never make a full end of thee."

The Sons of the Covenant In America.

It is because the world has either misunderstood, or does not know, the Jew as he is, that he has been made the tribe of the wandering feet. Hence, in course of time, he came over here to America, and as the years passed he continued to come hither, until there are in this land nearly two million Jews. Many of them came from Germany. Between 1840 and 1850 hundreds, thousands, of families emigrated from the land of their fathers during the social revolution which offered them little but suffering. The ancestors of the earliest Jewish congregations were among these immigrants. They were not, as a whole, a learned people. They came hither to escape tyranny, and to seek liberty. Arriving here they found themselves in a land which was foreign not only from the standpoint of residence but also of language. They came here as came Carl Schurz and men of his type—and many were the Jews of that type—because America offered them the opportunities which Germany denied them. By the early sixties about fifty thousand Jews had distributed themselves all over the United States.

The I. O. B. B. Founded.

Wherever they went, these men and women, though very humble in life, set about maintaining their households, establishing themselves, almost altogether unaided, in some form of occupation by means of which they might earn a livelihood. They had no cohesive center. There was little or no synagogue life at that time. They then had practically no great teachers to express the ideals of the people. They had no college wherein to train men to interpret Israel unto his own and others. They were loose, disjointed members of a family, scattered all over the country; and it was only when a few men in the East conceived the idea of forming a society which would enable these men to meet outside the synagogue and unite upon the common principles of Jewish faith and practice, that some semblance of cohesion began to appear among our people.

Misunderstood everywhere, they were forced to make friends among persons of their own faith, among their own people. In this way Jews of German birth and others united to form what is known as the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, the Independent Order of the Sons of the Covenant, the object of which was to afford a refuge and a protection to the newcomer, and to provide a meeting place wherein, on neutral lines, the coming leaders might express their hopes and beliefs, and also discuss plans for the future.

The I. O. B. B.'s Services.

Through these lodge-rooms the men, who have since played a most improtant part in the development of Jewish life in this country, became known both to Jews and non-Jews. I need not rehearse in this presence the great service the Independent Order of B'Nai B'rith has done in the past. Nor need I speak of the orphans' asylums, of centers of light and leading, in which you have been interested and which you have developed. Nor need I speak to you at length of the great pleasure I derived at the end of last summer when I went to Erie for the dedication of one of the most excellently arranged orphan asylums I have ever seen. Nor need I speak of th splendid service done by the men identified with that work. Nor need I more than refer to the splendid work accomplished, when this order induced John Hay to send the now famous Roumanian note, or President Roosevelt to take exception to the manner in which Russia was treating her Jews. These and a host of other excellent accomplishments are well known to you and are thoroughly understood by you.

The Need for the I. O. B. B.

It is unnecessary for me to elaborate upon the present need of some such center as the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith which may afford Jews of every complexion of religious views to meet and discuss every pressing problem. In this temple, for instance, it is apparent that we worship after a manner unacceptable to many of our brethren, and we know that most Jews look upon the mode of worship conducted here, both on the Jewish Sabbath and on this civil day of rest, with great concern. You know that there are many of our own race or faith, or both, who think that we are only catering to Christians by our temple services. As long as we can employ our weekly meetings as a useful ministration for human good, and as long as this congregation permits its rabbi to speak the convictions of his heart, I do not care what they say of our kind of service. There are many Jews honestly opposed to reform Judaism. There are many Jews who, like myself, were reared by very pious orthodox parents. I am, as you know, also a graduate of a most orthodox training-school for Jewish ministers, and I was, for several years, an orthodox minister. There are many like myself who can never go back to orthodoxy. The hundreds of thousands of Israel are still attached to orthodoxy, We ought, therefore, find some place where Jews of varying complexions of belief can meet for mutual helpfulness; and the B'nai B'rith serves that purpose.

The Purpose of Religion.

We were discussing a moment ago the function of the prophet. We were saying that he was hated and misunderstood in his day, because he was opposed to the status quo. You can readily understand now the reason for the opposition. In this community, and in every other community, many believe that religion is a matter of church or temple or synagogue worship. Many feel that, if as they enter the church door they drop in a nickel in the plate, they have done their duty, and that it should be charged up to their spiritual account. There are those who believe that religion is a matter for Saturday or Sunday, that it is expressed through prayers between themselves and some kind of a Deity who has a fixed residence somewhere, and who through those prayers may cure them of diseases caused by neglect of the natural law, or confer other benefits on them. There are many who say, "I belong to a church or a temple; I do not steal, I do not commit murder; what more do you want?" The reason the prophet was hated was this: He pointed out the more that was needed. Every prophet of Israel made this very clear, and Isaiah, in some respects the greatest of them all, made it clearest.

He spoke very plainly when he said, "Your hands are covered with blood. The ox knoweth his owner, and the ass knoweth his master's crib; but Israel does not know, my people do not understand." No wonder men hated the prophet! He said to his people, "Why come ye to seek God in His courts? Who asked you to do this?" He told them that they must introduce into the religious life something more than prayer and sacrifice if they wished their prayers to be heard and their sacrifices to be accepted; and he told them, "Cease to do evil; learn to do well; seek justice; relieve the oppressed; judge the fatherless; plead for the widow."

Applied Judaism.

Friends of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, I feel that your order has sought, outside of the synagogue, to put into effect the principles espoused within the synagogue, when you have established your thrice-blessed works of mercy and necessity; and upon your past and further work in this respect I invoke now, as always, the blessing of God.

But is your work over, have you done all that is to be done? Are you, as sons of the covenant, positive and beneficent contributors to human society? Have you in your hearts the spirit of the ancient sons of the covenant? Do you see that America offers you a wonderful opportunity? Are you foolishly restricting your services to members of your [illegible] fraternity? Have you the broad [illegible] which will make the work you have undertaken a blessing to others as well as to yourself? Does not a great opportunity await you; for your own first, and then for others? Let us see!

Anti-Defamation League.

During the past year or so, a few men of the order have, for example, been very busy in forming the Anti-Defamation League. Large numbers of you will enjoy yourselves somewhere to-day; to-morrow you may be at the theater or elsewhere enjoying yourselves. You may go to your clubs for your game of cards; yet how few know or care that, while you are enjoying yourselves, some scoundrel is defaming you by displaying those films in which the Jew is placed before the community in a dreadfully unsavory light. You indulge in day and night dreams that all is well; but do you not understand that, while you are dreaming, some child has seen some moving-picture which has given it a conception of the Jew which, some day will shut your son or daughter out from life's best opportunities? Not only this; there are films being displayed in various places which not only defame the Jew but defame the poor negro, and the foreigner, which cover them with shame and disgrace. There are, likewise, films shown in the City of Pittsburgh, as I have been reliably informed, which not only breed race prejudices, but which unsettle and debase the morals of the community. Is it nothing to you that such evils prevail? Are you all so busy with your own affairs that you have no time to consider these matters, or to express a word of gratitude to those who are rendering you much valuable service?

To my knowledge eight defamatory films have been modified or removed by men who have brought great sacrifices to do a voluntary task which affects your happiness. Mr. A. L. Solomon and Mr. Louis Caplan, to be specific, only a couple of weeks ago, under the direction of the local chairman of the Anti-Defamation League, gave up a whole evening to the successful endeavor of removing a disgusting film which, had it been displayed, would have made you hang your heads in shame. But most of you go on with your pleasures just the same, boast of your successes just the same, and pride yourselves on your progress. To prosecute such work, to obtain the issue of injunctions, costs money, and means are lacking for the work. Here is a great opportunity for some Jew to help to allay race prejudices and to destroy the beginnings of a new form of anti-Semitism. Will someone embrace it?

Anti-Semitic Literature.

The same league has been active in endeavoring to remove such books as the "Merchant of Venice" from the curricula of the schools. We know that Shylock was "the only gentleman in the play," and that all he asked was justice; but innocent children of tender years who read the play do not know it, and I am quite sure that Shylock, as he is generally interpreted, does not signify what we feel he is and means. He is taken to be the gross and unscrupulous money lender; he is made to be the type of the Jew. I hate the habits and methods described by these interpreters, as I hate and abominate the Shylock business. I, therefore, ask, "Why should the Shyplock of the play be permitted to plant the suggestion that every Jew is a Shylock?"

I plead for myself just as much as I do for you. I am not a Shylock; I never lent a penny on interest in my life. Why should I be called a Shylock, speaking now from a purely personal standpoint; and what I say of myself I can say of the vast majority of all Jews! Why should we submit to this indignity, why should we not rise in our self-defense? Some day we shall secure the appointment of a board of censors before whom every picture will have to be displayed before it can be used in the cities of our land; some day a censor will demand, too, in the interest of justice, that books be not used in schools and colleges which produce race hatred and prejudice. To this end we require your help, and I hope that some man, who has abundant means, will allow us to call upon him for aid, so that we may bring such work to a successful issue.

Men's League for Social Service.

While the work of the past has been very successful, very inspiring, I should like to see you accept your great opportunity, men of the B'nai B'rith, which will convert your Order into a men's league for social service, so that you do for Israel and humanity, as men, what the Council of Jewish Women has done here and elsewhere. The council has become a woman's league for social service not only among Jews, but among non-Jews. In many directions among the people of Pittsburgh, a change toward the Jews has taken place, and it is in no small degree due to the Council of Jewish Women, which has entered upon the work of social service, and is now doing a most beneficent work in the City of Pittsburgh. What are our men doing? Some few are giving of their means and time; but the I. O. B. B. could, if it only had vision, reach thousands who are in need of such service as the Council of Jewish Women has been doing in its varied activities.

I have discussed this question with the leaders of the I. O. B. B. among us, and I have found them unusually responsive to this suggestion. What good might not be accomplished if the members organized to become guides and guardians to the young. If they were sponsors for, and supporters of, a Big Brother movement? What valuable helpfulness might not be extended to the unfortunates who leave the prisons and penitentiaries, if the members united to extend a genuinely helping hand to the men who sought to lead a life of virtue and honesty? What a glory would inhere in membership in this Order, if its men formed groups for the study of the adverse economic conditions of their brethren, to the end that steps be taken to modify or improve them? What a joy and satisfaction would be the lot of the brethren, if they resolutely determined to win for Judaism, of whatsoever form, those who are fast becoming lost to the faith or estranged from its discipline?

The past of the Order has been glorious; but the past is dead and gone, and we cannot live on or in the past. New conditions create new tasks and new duties; and if the Order is to live it will never survive except as it is engaged in a really useful service for which its fine machinery adapts it for Israel here and elsewhere, and for humanity at large. It may be urged that I should not prophesy thus in the name of the Lord; but we must work out or rust out, and the former is far more desirable.

I wish to add one further suggestion which should be of special interest to those who love this republic. If I had the money I would prosecute the idea; but some day, I hope the I. O. B. B. will serve in this way. One of the greatest dangers to Americanism is the slow, silent, but sure, introduction of sectarianism into our public institutions. I do not believe there is a greater danger to human good than the misunderstanding which exists in the minds of many people with regard to the functions of religion and the functions of creeds.

Many do not ask if a man is really serviceable to the community; they ask instead, what kind of a button he wears, and if, in Pittsburgh, it happens to be the Presbyterian button, they say "Pass on; we will vouch for you. I say this with all respect for the general community, and with all reverence for my Presbyterian friends who have greatly grown above this attitude. I am sure that, when I came to live in Pittsburgh thirteen years ago, a man had a better chance if he was a Presbyterian than the man who was not a Presbyterian. There is no more insidious foe to good morals, or one more dangerous to ethics, than to tolerate the idea that a man's creed is a passport to his character. It is not true. I know many men who know every word of the creed by heart; who pose as excellent persons, yet they do not know the first principles of religion. They are like a man who has lost the sense of sight and smell, gazing at a flower. He may know everything about the flower except what is most desirable in the flower. I know people who know all about articles of faith, but know nothing of religion. Creeds are a very different thing from deeds.

Now we see the spirit of sectarianism creeping into the public schools of our land, creeping into the army and navy, creeping inot our public institutions. Take the case of Girard College, Philadelphia, an institution from which all clergymen, according to the will of Stephen Girard, are excluded—no clergyman can ever enter the place, yet, I am told, they have, under the name of moral instructor, one who teaches the children a sectarian faith.

Sectarianism in the Public Schools.

There is no valid reason why, in the public school, for which you and I pay, our children should be insulted at Christmas and Easter every year. There is no good reason why, in the public school, above which flies the flag of the United States which stands for the separation of church and state, anything sectarian should be tolerated or permitted. There is no real reason why the reading of the Bible in the public school should have been made compulsory.

Last year I went to Harrisburg to protest against this law before the committee hearing. There were three to four hundred persons in the room! I alone, in the State of Pennsylvania, offered a public protest against the passage of the proposed law. It is now a law. We must now read the Bible in the public schools. I believe Pittsburgh's Board of Education has used excellent discretion in its attempt to obey the law, but Pittsburgh is not Pennsylvania, and even if it were, the reading of the Bible to children of various sects in the non-sectarian school is, to my way of thinking, an invasion of the right of the individual. To-day it is the Bible, next week something else.

A certain boy went the other day to a Presbyterian Church in this neighborhood and requested to be permitted to join the Boy Scouts; he was told—I know he was misinformed—that "no Jew or Catholic can be a member of the Boy Scouts." I am sure that the information given was incorrect, but he was told it nevertheless. Some few months ago one of the leading educators of this city asked me to deliver an address before a large number of educated men and women in Pittsburgh. I accepted the opportunity. He offered to pay me for my services, but I refused to be paid. He insisted, stating that the audience paid for admission and would not accpet my services on any other terms. I told him that I would, under the circumstances, accept the amount for one of my charities.

I delivered the address because I had promised to do so; but a few days before I gave the lecture, I received a note from him, very courteously worded, because he is a gentleman and would not hurt my feelings, in which he told me that some person had written to him "blaming him very much for having asked Rabbi Levy to speak, because he objects to the reading of the Bible in the public schools." I spoke just as I would have done had I not received the letter; but I do most earnestly wish you to see that to-day it is one thing, to-morrow it is another, and some day, you will wake up, men and women, and find that your boasted religious liberties in America are gone.

If I were a man less oppressed by the burden of duty, and if I could afford to hire the right kind of attorney, I would contest the validity of that law; not, forsooth, because my children would be affected, for they do not attend the public schools; but because I believe the law iniquitous and inequitable, and because my interests are not restricted to what may affect my own family, but how far these matters may affect the United States which I love. I am working in the United States for something which has no body, no arms, no legs, no stomach to feed. I am working, as you are, for something which we cannot feel or touch or taste. I am working for that intangible and invisible thing called the republic, and I say to you without fear of contradiction that the successful introduction and growth of sectarianism in our public institutions will mean the breaking down of the republic.

I am interested, as a man and a rabbi, in the reading of the Bible, but the public schools must be kept free from sectarian entanglements. My deppest interest is not how this will affect the Jewish people of America; but what effect it will have upon the future of America. That I respect the Bible, that I want it read, that I believe in it, goes without saying; otherwise we would not have it on our altar, we would not study it in our Sabbath and Sunday schools, we would not insist upon your children learning it. But that the Bible should be introduced into our public schools, that Christmas and Easter services should be observed in the public schools, that our children should be laid open to insult and told, in the presence of many others, "You killed Christ," when we know that it is a falsehood, that we should submit to this year after year, when you who are wise men and women know that in the schools the hateful prejudices begin to grow, is intolerable, and that you should not rise up and fight, for the Right is to me a source of great wonder.

It may be said of me as the men of Amathoth said of Jeremiah that I am deserving of death because I speak thus in the name of the Lord. Some may say to me that I should not thus proprhesy in the name of the Lord; but I say to you in the spirit of our prophets, the incarnation of whom should be found in the I. O. B. B., I say to you, in their name, "Thus saith the Lord, keep ye justice and do ye equity. Wash ye, make

XIII.

BY PROF. GOTTHARD DEUTSCH, Ph.D.

My readers shall be guided to historic ground and to a place which at present possesses great actuality. The city of Nikolsburg, which, according to latest reports, houses 6,000 Galician refugees, while its total population hardly exceeds 8,000 and its Jewish community numbers barely 700, has a place in Jewish history. There was a time when this small provincial town ranked in importance with the most prominent Jewish congregations of Europe, with Altoona, Fuerth, Frankfort on the Main, and Metz. It actually happened that the rabbi of Metz, Gabriel Eskeles, left his city to accept the pulpit of Nikolsburg, and one of his successors, Jonathan Eybeschuetz, about 1750, was ready to exchange Metz for Nikolsburg, had Empress Maria Theresa not vetoed his election. Nikolsburg, with 620 legally licensed families, and a Jewish population of 3,400, nearly half of the total population of the city, was in those days, when the large cities were entirely closed to the Jews, or at best open to a restricted number of settlers, one of the leading Jewish communities.

History does not record how this came about. We may, however, judge by analogy. Nikolsburg is situated on the southern border of the province of Moravia. This seems insignificant in an age when our geographical knowledge is constantly called upon to locate islands in the Pacific, or cities in Armenia, but it is significant from the point of view of Jewish history. Emperor Leopold I expelled the Jews from Vienna and the whole province of Lower Austria in 1670. A variety of causes had contributed to bring about this catastrophe, which was already somewhat out of date at the end of the seventeenth century. The first cause was religious bigotry. During the war of Thirty Years, 1618-1648, fanaticism, strange as it would seem, spared the Jews. The ruling Roman Catholic party needed all their supply of religious belligerency for the Protestants. In addition, during a time when taxable property had to be handled carefully, the Jews were treated with more consideration than usual. They naturally suffered along with others from the savagery of warfare, and perhaps a little more than others. Being compelled to earn a livelihood by traveling, they would also be exposed to the danger from marauders, and we have a number of instances of this kind recorded. With the end of the war Catholicism had more leisure for the persecution of the Jews. It is claimed that the empress, who was a Spanish princess, saw in the presence of the Jews in the capital, the cause of the death of a long-looked-for heir. This may be true or not. It is certain that there was a strong clerical current against the Jews, and that the regular business rivalry added fuel to the fire.

A few thousand Jews were made homeless. Not one of them bartered his religion for the right to remain in the city. The words "of the Vienna exiles," added to a name were like a title of honor, or an academic degree. One solid block of fifty families was received in Berlin, where the Great Elector had shown himself a protector of Protestants expelled for the sake of their religion. The others scattered in all directions.

It is an old historic law that people compelled to move do not go farther than they have to. We, in the United States, can see it best in the crowded seaports of the eastern cities. A personal experience, not without typical meaning, will corroborate it. Traveling in Russian Poland in 1905, I had to wait at a small railroad station, not far from the German border, for a train. A pretty Jewish girl looked at me with more interest than I could ascribe to my personal attractiveness, and finally asked me where I was from. She knew from the shape of my shoes that I was "kein Poilischer nischt." When I satisfied her curiosity and told her that I was from America, she replied, "Is this also in New York? I have a 'Chussen' in New York."

From the same economic viewpoint we have to consider that settlement in Nikolsburg, and it is for this reason that I was so careful to state that Nikolsburg is on the southern border of Moravia. The Jews, expelled from the neighboring province of Lower Austria, merely had to cross into another jurisdiction. It is quite likely that the place was already then a fair sized Jewish settlement, dating from 1420, when a consecrated host was pierced in Ems and the Jews had to bleed. Such expulsions from Lower Austria occurred periodically. Sometimes they were merely threatened, at other times they were actually carried out temporarily, and in each case, some Jews whose right of residence was based merely on toleration, bought from a corrupt official, or others who would not take any chances, left the unfriendly city or the hostile province for safer quarters. Usually there was in such conditions a personal element, which now, owing to the lack of sources, we cannot understand. In all probability the house of Lichtenstein, which had large estates in that section, was friendly to the Jews, and this policy was certainly followed by the Counts of Dietrichstein, who succeeded the Lichtensteins towards the end of the sixteenth century. The poor Jew who searched for a new home, looked for some kind "Serore" (Lord), who would allow him to settle on his estate. To such a landed proprietor this settlement was welcome. It assured him of regular rent for otherwise worthless ground, and proved a financial benefit through the variuos fees which he had a right to levy. They are of a various nature, sometimes consisting of fattened geese on St. Martin's Day, sometimes of so and so many pairs of gloves to be furnished, when a female member of the family married. Had Count Dietrichstein already two hundred Jewish families on his estate, he might just as well have another two hundred. So in the course of time the settlement grew to such abnormal size, and it remained so until 1849, when the Jews had sufficiently recovered from the Revolution, and the subsequent reaction, to believe in the glad tidings of unrestricted right of residence, and began to move in ever increasing numbers to Vienna, where a great many of them had business interests before, and which is only sixty miles distant. Others moved to Bruenn, the capital of the province, which is only thirty miles distant, and a considerable number scattered over the nearer small towns, or settled in the villages, where they had built up a trade as peddlers before.

This was twenty years before I saw this historic place. I arrived there in 1868, on a fall day, between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur. It was toward evening, and the main street of the ghetto was thronged with people coming from the synagogue. I had never seen the like of it before. In fact, I had never seen a place with more than one synagogue, and Nikolsburg had ten. To me it was, to use Goethe's term, "a little Paris," in the Jewish sense of the word. From the point of view of municipal improvements an American tourist would have thought differently. The city is dominated by the old historic castle of the Dietrichsteins, now extinct in the male line, and continued by Count Mensdorff, the son-in-law of the last Prince Dietrichstein, whose tribe seems to be connected with critical moments in Austria's history. The Count Mensdorff, who owned the estate at my time, was in 1866 at the head of the foreign department, and his son was for nearly twenty years Austria's ambassador in London, little dreaming that he would ever be given his passports. The castle, which is an immense structure and which is the place where a peace treaty was signed in the seventeenth century, and then again the preliminaries in 1866, has various historic rooms. Napoleon stopped there during the campaign of 1809, and King Wilhelm of Prussia made this castle his headquarters when his army prepared a siege of Vienna. The castle is situated on the crest of a hill, sloping both east and west. On the western slope the ghetto is clustered, alongside the wall of the park, which surrounds the castle. On the other side is the "Christian" city. The small, rickety houses leaning against the wall impress the observer like so many chickens seeking the protection of the hen, when they see a hawk swooping down. The ghetto, however, was not one street. It had its Fifth avenue, its middle class residence section and its slum district. The main street was built in the form of a rectangle. It was the "Gass." A hypothenuse of this rectangle was formed by the "Klangaessel," where, as the name accidentally indicates, the small middle class lived. Back of the "Millionaires' Row" was a cluster of houses called the "Gaertel." What gave to this heap of hovels this endearing beautiful name, I cannot imagine. Maybe that at one time the place, now occupied by hovels, built up in such an irregular way that the little houses formed any number of blind allies, in which one was bound to get lost, was actually at one time a park. They adjoined, indeed, an open field still called "Juedengarten." It may have been destined, if not for a park, so for an open space, adjoining the ghetto. In my days it was merely used for the raising of vegetables, and was owned by Countess Mensdorff, having been, so I was told, given to her father in settlement of arrears in taxes. Perhaps it may be necessary in order to throw light on the supposed wealth of the Jews, to point out that in addition to the taxes which they had to pay to the state, they paid also on the ground of the long obsolete feudal system, "Dominikalsteuern," to the lord of manor. This continued up to 1848, although the protection of the lord was for centuries only nominal. Adding to these taxes those that the Jews had to pay in order to maintain their own communal organization, we can easily understand that the congregation found it often impossible to meet the demands, and in this way considerable arrears accumulated. When in 1848 the anomaly of taxing the poor for the benefit of the immensely wealthy finally ceased, the Jewish community of Nikolsburg owed an immense amount of money to Prince Dietrichstein. They compromised on it, giving the prince, besides some money in cash, all the real estate they could spare, including the "Juedengarten." The prince built through it a private driveway, which saved him from driving through the city when he wished to leave town. The story was told in my time that Count Mensdorff, the minister of foreign affairs, was standing on one Sabbath in front of the little gate, leading from his park through a small section of the ghetto, when an old woman approached him with the request to open a letter for her that she had just received. In the typical ghetto fashion she told him all about her children, who were living in Vienna and, thank God, were doing quite well. They wrote her every week, seeing that she should get the letter by Sabbath, but—you know we Jews may not cut an envelope on Sabbath, and so please open this letter for me and tomorrow I will give you a Kreuzer—we must not handle any money on the Sabbath. His excellency smiled, and much to the astonishment of the woman, took from his pocket a mother of pearl knife, which was duly admired. When the letter was opened the woman wanted to know where that kind neighbor of hers lived, and was surprised to hear that he lived in the castle. When she further inquired what position he held there, she was told that he had a job in Vienna, which was given him by the Kaiser, and that he was bound to go back, and could not call for his Kreuzer, which he would collect next time he came to Nikolsburg.

The "Juedengarten," while used for farming, was in the fall the place of sport for the Jewish boys. On the side, adjoining the ghetto, it was marked by the Erub, consisting of poles connected with wire on top like a telegraph line, and marking the Sabbath boundary, beyond which it was unlawful to carry any object, including a handkerchief. Very strict Jews would not even walk beyond the Erub on Sabbath, so as to be sure that they should not accidentally forget something in their pockets, and in this way commit a mortal sin. On the other side the field was surrounded by a dilapidated stone wall. What this wall was intended for originally, I do not know. In my time it was used as the line dividing the Jewish and the Christian territory. There regular battles were fought, with the battle cry "Auf ueber die Schegetzlech!" The battle was fought with rocks, which the two armies hurled against each other, but occasionally ended in a hand to hand fight. The capture of the fortification on the part of the "Schegetzlech" or the driving back of the invading army beyond the fortification, decided the victory. Bleeding heads were of regular occurrence, and I really wonder, that at least within my recollection, no more serious accidents happened.

The adjoining "Gaertel" was a home of incredible misery. The slums of our large cities are luxurious apartments compared with these dwellings, consisting usually of one room, occupied here and there by two families, or by one family with roomers. Nor were the housing conditions in the "Klangaessel" and even in the aristocratic "Gass" ideal places of residence. Most of the houses were subdivided in an indescribable manner. They resembled irregular beehives, clustered in an irregular fashion. A dark hallway that was used by two or more parties divided the "apartments" of two rooms each, the upstairs apartments were owned by one, and the downstairs by another Back in the courtyard was again some other party living. Yards were quite rare, and privies existed only in high-class apartments. The houses on one side of the "Klangaessel" were leaning on the wall of the Schlosspark, and were incredibly damp, the water literally streaming down the walls in winter. It was actually a God-send that during a severe winter in the early seventies a heavy snowfall crushed a number of these hovels and gave the other inhabitants of the ghetto more breathing space. In those days the ghetto had been depleted, and the owners of some of these houses were only too glad to get rid of them. They lived in Vienna, and in order to be saved from all trouble, sold these so-called houses, occasionally for five dollars. The consequence was that the poorest class of non-Jewish laborers moved in, and about ten years ago, or so, the ghetto was inhabited largely by Christians, the Jewish school also having a majority of Christian pupils, so that according to the law a Christian was appointed as principal. In the schoolrooms, where still at my time Talmud was taught to a select class as part of the curriculum, a crucifix was placed. An interesting specimen of the complications, created by this housing system, is the following. The owner of an upper story, refused to make any repairs of the roof. The owner of the lower story offered to tear down the upper story and build a new roof. To this, however the neighbor objected, claiming that the air above the lower story was his, "Die Luft ist mein."

With the decrease of the population the synagogues were diminished. The ten synagogues had been reduced to five, when I was enrolled as a regular student at the Gymnasium in 1870. There was the imposing Altschul, a really fine structure, standing on a slight elevation, adjoining the wall of the Schlosspark. There were a few irregular steps leading to it, but entering the synagogue one had to go two steps down, an arrangement quite common in old synagogues, as a symbol of the words of the Psalmist: "Out of the depth I cry unto thee." The ceiling was divided into four domes, supported in the center by four marble pillars, which surrounded an elevation, the Almemor, popularly called "Lemmer." There were no pews, but benches, partly alongside the walls, partly in parallel rows, some east and west, and others north and south. The desks were movable, somewhat like our music stands, but in so far different as they had a place for books. On the Ninth of Ab, these "Staenders" were laid on the floor, and served as footstools. The whole arrangement would not tend towards the preservation of good order, but it must be said that there was a wonderful decorum, in my opinion only heightened by the fact that people prayed aloud, and the services did not show the apathy of a modern congregation. The women's synagogue was an annex on the south side, divided off by a glass partition in a slanting position, so that everything could be heard that was said in the men's room, while, except dim shadows, nothing could be seen. There was, however, also a gallery on one side of the building, very likely erected over an annex.

Less pretentious was the Neuschul. The name indicates that it was erected later, but as far as I am aware, the time when these buildings were erected, was not known. The Beth Hamidrash synagogue was the next largest. It was merely a hall, and not connected with the Beth Hamidrash proper, which was library and study room. It consisted of three divisions, the one reserved for the "common people," who went there to pray, or recite Psalms, or to read religious books in Yiddish, while the main room was the real rabbinic library, and lecture room for the Talmud Society. A small adjoining room contained Cabalistic literature. It was looked upon with awe, and hardly ever entered. There were two more synagogues, the one preserved on account of the distance, though the total ghetto might be traversed in less than ten minutes. It was called Reb Nochem Gloser Schul, very likely named for its founder, and was situated in the rear of a building, still occupied by a family named Glaser. Besides there was another hall, used for prayers, called "Hasidim Schul." It owed its origin to Rabbi Schmelke Hor-

Jews and Christian Science

By S. N. Deinard

Why This Essay Is Written.

This essay is not written for the purpose of attacking or criticising any religion, or sect, or church, to which large numbers of our fellow-citizens belong. Far be it from my mind. What reason could there be for doing it?

There are a large number and a great variety of churches and sects in our land, all differing more or less from one another; each one having its own doctrines, beliefs, and forms of worship; most of them minding their own business, and willing to let others do the same.

We are living in an age of freedom and toleration. My neighbor's belief and religious practice are his own business, even as my belief and practice are mine, as long as I do no harm thereby to others.

True, there is really nothing wrong in the criticism of ideas and beliefs, as long as it is done in a friendly and courteous manner; for only in that way is the knowledge of truth promoted. Even philosophers and scientists criticise each other's ideas and theories. Why should not members of different religious bodies be at liberty to do the same, as long as it is done without acrimony or hatred?

But we Jews feel a little more delicacy on this point than others may feel. We have suffered so much from the world's intolerance; we have been so ruthlessly harassed and persecuted on account of our different belief, that now that the civilized world is somewhat relenting towards us, we feel that it behooves us above all others to be tolerant, and to let others alone, even as we would be let alone. We take the saying of our great prophet Micah as a good doctrine for our guidance: "Let all the people walk every one in the name of his god, while we will walk in the name of the Lord our God for ever and ever."

If such is our attitude towards all sects and churches, it should be even more so towards the Christian Science church. Its membership, as a rule, consists of very amiable people, very pleasant to meet and to get acquainted with; kindly, affable, more or less democratic, and apparently very much in earnest about their beliefs and convictions; yet not obtrusive, though eager to make converts—altogether an agreeable class of people.

The very reasons that prompted them to join the new cult, namely, their former states of real or imaginary ill health, suffering, and restlessness, and their dissatisfaction with the teachings and practices of the churches with which they formerly affiliated—these reasons, and their present state of reconciliation with life and its consequent peace of mind, are factors in bringing out those traits of their character which are so praiseworthy.

I must, however, state, in passing, that their new faith develops one characteristic in them that is far from commendable. Christian Scientists are extremely individualistic. Each one is self-centered, living unto himself, and concerned about himself only. The great problems and movements of the present age in all fields of endeavor, scientific, philosophical, social and philathropic, do not seem to concern them. It is the natural effect of their peculiar doctrines, as will appear further on in these columns.

Modern progress in all departments of life is the result of the growing altruistic and humanitarian or socializing tendencies of the civilized world, the growing consciousness that society as a whole with all its arrangements and institutions, with all its present maladjustments, requires our attention as much as, if not more than, the individual with his little troubles. The extreme individualism of the Christian Scientist, therefore, is a discordant element in the modern world, and can not be considered a praiseworthy trait. But aside from that, Christian Scientists are good people and kind neighbors, and we should cultivate their friendship. It is, therefore, both ungracious and unpleasant, above all for the Jews to criticise their doctrines.

The reason for doing it, and for writing this essay, is that Jews, too, are being attracted to this new faith, and as a result are lost to us. These defections loyal Jews cannot contemplate with complacency and indifference. They should not occur.

It is for such misguided Jews and their friends that this essay is written, in the hope that it may appeal to their common sense, their reason, and their Jewish loyalty. Considering the efforts other religious bodies are making to win converts, to grow and to expand, we surely ought to put forth some effort to keep our own within the fold.

The Number of Jewish Conversions to Christian Science.

According to Christian Scientists the number of Jewish people who have been converted to their cult is very large. Their figures, however, must be greatly exaggerated. Judging by the number of converts in smaller communities with which I am acquainted, the number cannot be so very large, if the same proportions hold true all over the country.

There seems no reason why in large centers such as New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, and St. Louis, the proportion of Jewish converts should be larger than in smaller communities, say in Minneapolis or St. Paul. Christian Science has no more to offer in one city than in another; nor are the Jews of one city, on the average, any different from the Jews of other cities.

As to the number of Jews who have so far joined the Christian Science church, there is really no cause for alarm on our part. Nor is there any likelihood that the new cult will ever make any serious inroads in Jewry.

Other churches and other cults have tried the conversion of Jews before; have been trying it for the last twenty-one hundred years, beginning with Hellenism. They have used more powerful means than Christian Science commands. They have used all possible terrors to frighten the Jew into apostasy, and all possible blandishments to tempt him; they came with the sword in one hand, and with honors, emoluments, and other tempting gifts in the other; they have often succeeded in tearing away some Jewish souls from their ancestral faith, sometimes many souls. Yet Isreal has survived all such dangers.

At the present time, too, many a Jew is going astray from his fold; and it is not only the Christian Science church that attracts him. In Europe, especially in Germany, Austria, and Russia, it is the dominant church of each country that is winning Jewish converts by the hundreds; for to enter certain coveted spheres of worldly ambition they must pass through the portals of the church.

It is different, however, in this country. No economic or social pressure is brought to bear upon the Jew to barter his faith away. Those who apostatize do so from ignorance, or stupidity, or a climbing tendency characteristic of snobs, or, in the case of certain poor, shiftless, ne'er-do-well fellows, from a desire to make an easy living as missionaries to the Jews.

The Christian Science figures in regard to Jewish converts are undoubtedly exaggerated. But some Jewish people have been converted to the new faith, and have severed their relations with their former coreligionists. They in turn set the example to others, for each of them has some acquaintances and friends. This new apostasy is likely to spread more and more, for the instinct of the herd is very strong among human beings. Abraham or Isaac has turned Christian Scientist, and is now well, contented and happy, it is argued; therefore, there must be something to it. Let us give it a trial.

Still more misleading and pernicious is the example of a convert who is rightly or wrongly looked upon as a person of some education, or superior mentality. If such a bright light finds Christian Science in accord with reason and truth, some say, then it is surely all right. The reverse argument does not seem to suggest itself to them, namely, that since such a one has joined such a church, and subscribes to its doctrines, his cannot be such a clear and bright intellect after all; or, if it is, he may be prompted by some other motive than that of seeking religious truth.

The unthinking and unwary Jew is lured to the Christian Science cult by arguments that I shall discuss at greater length further on, but which I touch upon here to show that there is some danger, if the matter is neglected by us. The neophyte is told that he can be a Jew and a Christian Scientist at the same time. And he honestly and foolishly believes it. That is not fair dealing on the part of Christian Science. But what will not zealous religionists do to make converts?

It is pointed out to him that a Jew does not have to sacrifice any of his former convictions when joining the church, that he does not really become a Christian in the old sense of the word, for he does not have to believe in Jesus, or the Trinity, according to the usual Christian interpretation of those dogmas.

And so a Jew who would not think of joining any other Christian church has no hesitancy in becoming a Christian Scientist. Hence the danger of the spread of the new cult among our people, unless an effort is made by us to counteract such propaganda.

When and Why a Jew Turns to Christian Science.

Like most people who have become devotees of the new faith, the Jew is first attracted to it because of its pretended healing powers. He is ailing. He has consulted a regular physician, who is prescribing this, that, or the other thing, and is subjecting him to one or another treatment. But the patient sees no improvements in his condition; he is perhaps growing worse. He tries another physician, or a specialist, with the same result. He is advised to submit to an operation. But he is undecided; he is afraid of the knife.

In the meantime some friend or acquaintance, in his sympathy with the sufferer, suggests Christian Science. Why not give it a trial? It surely can do no harm. It is not quite as expensive as medical treatment and drugs, and is supposed to effect wonderful cures.

Or it may be that a Christian Scientist gets hold of our patient, and uses all his persuasive powers to induce him to consult a healer. He finally consents. What will not a person do to regain health and happiness?

After a few so-called treatments, lo, our patient actually begins to feel improved in health. His progress becomes perceptible, and after a while he finds himself cured, and all that without doctors, without tormenting treatments, without drugs, and at a comparatively much smaller expense. It is apparently the result of Christian Science healing.

It does not require much further argument to induce such a one to become an enthusiastic devotee of the new cult, and to join the church. He at the same time, and as a matter of course, breaks whatever affiliations he had with his former fellow-Jews.

How He Is Cured.

Is our patient really cured, and how has the cure been effected? This is the important question. There can be no doubt that of those who give up doctors and drugs, and receive Christian Science' cheerful message that they are not sick at all, because "there is no disease, sickness is only mortal error, the product of mortal mind," many are actually cured. The healer's treatments, which consist of repeated harping on this Christian Science formula and its variations, and the readings of so many pages of "Science and Health" have only added the element of "suggestion," which has great curative value in nervous disorders.

That in many cases where the disease is deep-seated, organic, and far advanced, no cure is effected, that, in spite of all healers, and all of Mrs. Eddy's inspired wisdom, the disease terminates fatally, while the treatment of a skilled, scientific, and honest physician might have saved the patient's life, is also true. In such cases Christian Science, in dissuading the patient from availing himself of the best knowledge and skill that medical science affords, is downright criminal.

We know that Christian Science devotees also die, although consistent Christian Scientists get out of the difficulty by declaring that there is no death. The patient simply "passed on."

Granting all that, the question still remains: How does Christian Science produce its many cures? Simply by keeping the patient from medical treatment, which is often, alas, quack treatment and charlatanism, and from drugs, which are often injurious to the system instead of beneficial, and by cheering him with the thought that there is nothing serious the matter with him, that he is on the road to rapid recovery, thus giving nature a chance to restore the lost energy, and to heal the irritated and diseased parts of the body.

Nature is the best healer. Man's skill, and his knowledge of nature's processes, may help nature's curative work along; while his ignorance, stupidity, negligence, and wickedness, may baffle and defeat her best efforts. So great is nature's power to heal and to repair, that often a patient recovers in spite of all that quacks may do. It is then that the quack or the healer claims credit for the cure.

Man can greatly further nature's healing processes by keeping the patient's mind free from fear and worry, by inspiring him with hope and cheer, thus increasing his vital energies and recuperative powers, and accelerating his recovery. The quack neglects to do that, or purposely avoids doing it; while Christian Science uses this method to perfection.

I do not hesitate to say that the spread of Christian Science is largely the fault of the medical fraternity. It harbors too many quacks, charlatans, and ignoramuses. Instead of quieting the patient's fear, and helping nature to do her best work, they often arouse his fear, and produce a diseased state of mind; give drugs unnecessarily, subject him to tormenting treatments, weaken him, and impair and exhaust his vital energy. Many a patient is thus driven to seek relief from a Christian Science healer.

How to Cure Ourselves.

It is certainly true that many of our ailments are mental and not bodily, spiritual and not physical. As soon as the least pain is experienced, we become frightened; we brood over it. True, the pain is a signal, an indication of some trouble. But our anxiety and fear only aggravate it.

The origin of many, if not most, of our troubles is also largely mental. Most of our physical derangements are the result of lust and excess, impure thoughts, impure desires, impure acts. Many of our troubles come from fear, worry, envy, jealousy, hate—all mental states, and all evil ones.

There is no doubt that if we could always compose and control ourselves, and banish impure thoughts and desires, fear and worry, from our minds, most of our bodily ills would disappear. If only we did not think so much about our precious selves! If we did not pay so much attention to every little ache, or pain, or discomfort! If we would only, by a mental effort, forget them, and go about our work as if nothing were the matter with us, how soon we should be well again!

Still better, if we did not think so much about ourselves, and thought more about others, thought more about our duty of being helpful to them, of bringing them a little joy and happiness! Or if we took a little more interest in the great problems that agitate modern society, and joined in the various movements for human betterment and uplift in which the best minds and hearts of our age are engaged! Would not that be a nobler method of seeking relief from our ailments than Christian Science that makes one self-centered, absorbed in his own precious self, his painless, diseaseless, sinless, matterless self?

What I have thus far tried to show is that it is not Christian Science that effects the cure, not Mrs. Eddy's book, not the healer's prayers and phrases, but that element in Christian Science which corresponds to common sense, the method that every honest and scientific physician ought to employ upon his patients, the method that every sensible human being ought to be able to use for himself, namely, the control of the body by the mind, the dispelling of fear and worry from the mind, and the instilling into it of hopeful and cheerful thoughts.

To this should be added the element of "suggestions," a species of hynotism which the skilled and clever Christian Science healer uses, though he stoutly denies it, and which many a physician trained in psycho-pathological methods also uses with considerable success. This is the real secret of the healing powers of Christian Science.

Christian Science a Religion.

If Christian Science were only a new method of healing, a new school of medicine, we as Jews should not care to engage in a controversy with it. We should leave it to the regular and irregular medical schools to fight their own battles.

Of course, the medical schools say that they can well afford to ignore it. Some of its preposterous ideas are unworthy of even serious attention from the medical point of view. Only a humorist like Mark Twain could do them justice. We recommend Mark Twains essay and book on Christian Science to all readers who are in need of a real tonic, both physical and intellectual.

Think of its claim that it can accomplish cures by absent treatment! How would a Christian Scientist, when hungry, like to be fed by absent treatment? Think of that other claim that the Christian Science method is just as effective when practiced on horses and other animals as on human beings!

The Leo M. Frank Case

Judge John Gibbons of Chicago Appeals to the Governor of Georgia in behalf of Frank

Circuit Court of Cook County.
Judge John Gibbons.
Chicago, December 25, 1914

To His Excellency, John M. Slayton,
Governor of Georgia, Atlanta, Ga.:

Dear Sir: I have watched the comments of the press and of legal and other publications respecting the trial and conviction of Leo M. Frank for the murder of Mary Phagan, and, based upon these and other sources of information, I must affirm that there is a growing and widespread feeling throughout the length of the land that Leo M. Frank is a victim of race prejudice—being a Jew, who, it is said, incurred the displeasure of the populace, because he hired girls at reduced wages. Having been actively engaged in the law for forty-five years, twenty-one of these being on the Circuit bench at Chicago, I say in all seriousness, it often happens that even under ordinary circumstances, in either a criminal or civil trial, where the liberty or property of a Jew is at stake, unless the presiding judge is on the alert the Jew is apt to get the worst of it. This should not be. Race prejudice is not of American origin. The true American tries to give every person a square deal, regardless of race, creed or color. For a lifetime I have known and mingled with the poorer and richer classes of the Jewish people, and I bear testimony to the fact that the Jews are among the best, most industrious, upright and law-abiding of the community. If, under ordinary circumstances, it is difficult for a Jew to get a fair trial, what must it have been under extraordinary conditions, such as transpired during the trial of Leo M. Frank, in respect to whose trial it has often been stated in the public press that a mob swarmed the courtroom and marched through the streets of Atlanta howling for Frank's conviction. This statement is made on hearsay, as I have no personal knowledge of its truth or falsity.

Under these circumstances, as an American citizen, I am not so much concerned in the question of whether Frank is innocent or guilty as I am in the question whether the cry is true, which has gone abroad, that Leo M. Frank is a victim of race prejudice. No person has asked me to write you or even suggested such a thing. I appeal to you simply in the interest of fair play and in the name of humanity, and humbly, but earnestly, request your excellency not to permit his execution, and if you feel that you should not pardon him, I beg of you to at least commute his sentence to life imprisonment. The people of Georgia may not now approve of your act of clemency, but in time they will vindicate you; and, after all, what are the honors of office or its emoluments or the plaudits of the world compared with the consciousness of having fearlessly performed a duty which you believed to be demanded by the dictates of right, justice and humanity?

If, in time, it shall appear that there is no question of his innocence, your excellency or your successor may restore him to liberty, while, on the other hand, if time demonstrates his absolute guilt, is it not sufficient punishment for him to live and die a felon?

It seems that all legal appeals have been exhausted, and that through executive clemency is the only means whereby Frank's life may be spared. In justice to the courts of Georgia it may be said that from the foundation of the state to the present hour they have stood among the first in the front rank of state tribunals. But we are all painfully cognizant of the fact that thousands of things transpire during a trial when public excitement runs riot which no trial judge can eliminate from the minds of the jurors and which no court of review can ever officially know.

The atmosphere which filled the air and which permeated the courtroom during the trial could not be brought vividly to the attention of a court of review, who only sees things as they are made to appear through the medium of printed abstracts and records. This is doubtless one of the strongest reasons why the people of every state in the Union have vested in the executive a power paramount to legislative enactments or judicial decrees—the power to grant reprieves and pardons and to commute sentences. It is said that Mr. Frank is a married man of unblemished character, and a graduate of Cornell College, and that his conviction was largely, if not exclusively, based on the evidence of a colored man, who is now serving a penitentiary sentence.

Kindly pardon my importunity, but I admonish your excellency to make haste slowly, and if you finally conclude that you should neither pardon him nor commute his sentence, then I beg of you by all means to grant him a reprieve for a year or two, so that the legislature or a court of equity may have an opportunity to consider not only the facts which were before the courts and your excellency, but any new evidence which may be discovered, and in its discretion order a new trial (Calder v. Bull, 3 Dallas 385), as I understand there is no prohibition in the Georgia constitution against such a course on the part of the legislature, and the courts of England and some American courts have interfered and granted new trials both in cases of acquittal and conviction (1 Bishop's Criminal Law, 4th Ed., Sections 841 to 851). The mere time of carrying out the sentence is by no means worth the sacrifice of running the risk of involving the fair name of the State of Georgia. The difference of January 22d, 1915, which I understand is the date fixed by the judgment of the court, and any later date which your excellency may fix one year or even ten years hence, which, to Leo M. Frank is everything, to the State of Georgia is nothing. Individuals pass like shadows, but the commonwealth endureth forever. I am, your excellency, very respectfully yours,

JOHN GIBBONS.

REPLY OF LEO M. FRANK TO ATTACK OF EX-GOVERNOR JOS. M. BROWN, OF GEORGIA.

Ex-Governor Jos. M. Brown in a letter published in the Augusta Chronicle urged the speedy execution of Leo. M. Frank. The fairness of Mr. Brown's position can easily be judged by his statement that the reason why so many people ask that a new trial be granted Frank is the fact that Frank is a Jew. Mr. Frank's reply to the Ex-Governor's attack is as follows:

I have read your remarkable attack upon me in The Augusta Chronicle. I use the word "remarkable" advisedly, for no ex-Governor of Georgia ever before used his influence in an effort to destroy the life of one of his fellow citizens. Indeed it is difficult to see how any brave man could be induced to take the position you have.

I am helpless and in desperate straits. My wife and father and mother are in the depths of despair.

Why any man should wantonly and ruthlessly attack me, and, through me, them, must amaze the fair men and women of this State.

When I read that tirade—unfair, cruel and untruthful—I remembered that, when Prometheus was bound to the rock it was the vulture, and not the eagle, that struck its beak into his vitals.

The execution of the confessed murderer excites sympathy. The Sheriff does his duty because the law demands it, but he does it with sorrow; it is reserved to an ex-Governor of Georgia to demand the execution of one who never harmed him, and who is pleading for further opportunity to show his innocence.

The excuse that you are defending the State cannot explain your letter. The State of Georgia needs no defense. Her people are as generous and just as those of other States.

Deplorable and regrettable things can happen, and have happened, in Georgia, just as they can happen and have happened in other States. There was a serious riot in Atlana some years ago. It was condemned everywhere without, as well as within the State, yet nobody raised the cry that Georgia was being slandered.

No sane man can praise the conduct of my trial. During it things happened that always will be condemned. The mob spirit was abroad. Passion and prejudice were daily manifested in the very presence of the court. Judge Roan was present and knew what took place, and himself certified, under his oath of office, to things that you yourself, when you know them, will unhesitatingly condemn.

When prejudice and passion and the spirit of the mob preside over a trial, such a trial will not likely meet the approval of the country, and the wrong of such a trial is not met by the demagogic or sectional cry that the State is slandered.

Many of the wisest and best men of the country feel that my trial was not a fair one. Many of the truest and best Georgians feel the same. Is it possible that such men must keep quiet and, by their silence, approve such a trial for fear that they will be called slanderers of the State? Surely a protest against such a trial, within or without the State, cannot excuse your thirst for blood, nor explain your fall from the dignity of an ex-Governor to the ranks of the head hunter.

Your tirade against me is a greater slander against the State than any possible criticism against my trial. What a spectacle! An ex-Governor joining, with unreserved approval, the mob who cry, Crucify, Crucify!

How can you know I am guilty? You did not attend a moment of the trial. Your opportunity to know the truth was not greater than that of any man in the United States who read the papers or the record. You certainly had no such opportunity as Judge Roan. He heard every word of the evidence and saw every witness. And, after thus seeing and hearing, he asserted that he was not convinced of my guilt. Yet you, who heard no evidence and saw no witness, assert my guilt and urge my execution with a recklessness that must shock the fair, right-thinking people of Georgia.

Few men would exhibit the self-confidence you show in your letter. Your dogmatism might be excused if the point at issue was the fate of a stray dog that was worrying the village, but how can any fair man excuse it when a human life is involved—when the heart strings of an innocent wife, father, and mother are to be snapped?

You not only conclude beyond cavil the question of my guilt, but from the same reckless certainty, fix my guilt from the evidence other than that of Conley. If you had any fair knowledge of the case you would know that some of the ablest lawyers of Georgia and elsewhere have studied the record of my case, and not one, after such study, has believed me guilty. I do not believe there is an able, fair lawyer in Georgia who would give it as his opinion that, apart from Conley, there was enough evidence to convict me.

It must be that when you so callously and brutally urged my immediate execution you were moved by other motives than that of State defender.

Prejudice, passion, and personal ambition have been known factors in my undoing. Your article is proof conclusive how great were these factors and to what extent you subscribe to them. Before this it has been strongly suspected that politics had played an important part. Since your remarkable letter there can be no longer any doubt of it.

It is wrong that you should seek, at the expense of my life, to pay back your political debts. It is a greater wrong, if that can be, that you should hope, by my destruction and through the disgrace of my loved ones, to gain back to your support that large class of voters that you have lately lost by violent abuse.

I have suffered much; some good men have condemned me, but they have done so in sorrow. It has been reserved to you voluntarily, ignorantly, in passion and prejudice, to kick me on toward the gallows that you may lessen your political debts and regain, if possible, some of the political ground you have lost.

Jan. 2, 1915. LEO M. FRANK.

THE CASE OF LEO FRANK.

Sentenced to be hanged on January 22 in Atlanta is Leo Frank, convicted without a fair trial. If he is guilty it has not been proven. Strong evidence indicating innocence has not been allowed to be presented to a judge and jury in a regular trial. In Collier's Weekly of December 19 and 26 is C. P. Connolly's account of this case. It is a story that will convict the State of Georgia of legal lynching should the governor fail to avert the execution. In spite of plain evidence of unfairness of the trial, and in spite of later evidence tending to show the innocence of the accused, the courts decline on technical grounds to interfere. The State Supreme Court held that it could not consider the merits of the case, but only technicalities. There were strong technical points in Frank's favor on which it was possible to obtain not merely a setting aside of the verdict but a dismissal of his case without a new trial. But wanting his name clear, as well as his freedom, he forbade his attorneys from presenting any point except those bearing on the merits of his application. He had such confidence in the fairness of the judges and the laws that he staked his life thereon. In the social class in which he moved, the sacrosanctity of courts and established institutions is accepted almost as a matter of course. In this class there is usually nothing but horror of the radical who would criticise a court, and strong opposition to the notion that judges are entitled to no more confidence than other men. Frank's mistake was such as would naturally have been made by one who unthinkingly accepts the views of political reactionaries. Certain it is that his blind and unreasonable confidence in the fairness of the court proved his undoing.

On rejection of his first appeal Frank allowed the technical matters to be presented in a new appeal. It was too late, with a court that holds red tape to be more sacred than justice. The court held that the technical points, not having been presented in the first appeal, could not be considered in a later one. The fact that there was at stake not only the life of a possibly innocent man, but the honor of the state, weighed less with the judges than hair-splitting. So, unless federal courts can help, only Governor John H. Slayton can save the state from disgrace.

The question is not one of Frank's guilt or innocence, but whether a man shall be hung without a fair trial. An absolutely innocent man would as surely have been convicted under the circumstances that Frank was, as an undeniably guilty one. Such things must not be allowed to occur. If one citizen can be so dealt with, so can another, and no one is safe from being judicially murdered. Unless the governor is convinced of Frank's innocence he should not grant him a full pardon; but even if he believes him guilty he should commute the sentence. That will save the state from the shame of a legal lynching, make it possible for the charge against Frank to be fairly considered on its merits, and if he should be fairly proven guilty to guard society from him in the future. This action should be urged upon Governor Slayton by all who see their way clear to write to him. There is involved therein a much bigger question than the life of Leo Frank.—S. D. in "The Public."

DEDICATION OF THE GRABFELDER MEDICAL BUILDING.

The Samuel Grabfelder Medical Building of the National Jewish Hospital for Consumptives will be dedicated Sunday afternoon, January 10, at 3 o'clock. Dr. Grabfelder will present the building to the hospital and the Rev. Dr. Wm. S. Friedman, Chairman of the Board of Managers, will accept it on behalf of the institution.

The Grabfelder Medical Building is a full three-story brick building, of fireproof construction, with handsome white terra cotta trimmings.

The first floor is devoted to the administrative offices of the Secretary and Superintendent, with reception hall in the center of the building. Nose and throat room, drug room, dental room, Assistant Superintendent's office, and waiting room for patients are also on this floor.

The second floor is devoted to clinical and research laboratory, several examination rooms, proctologic room, medical library, given over principally to the literature of tuberculosis; waiting room tor patients, with one wing for the living quarters of the house medical staff.

The third floor is given over to animal quarters for research work in the laboratory.

The basement is occupied by a very thoroughly equipped and complete X-ray department in all its phases. Here also is an Inhilarium, store rooms for medical supplies, and vault for valuable records, and janitor's quarters.

The building is 70 feet by 70, and represents the best and most scientific thought of construction for the medical and administration building of a tuberculosis sanitarium.

The equipment of the building is especially notable, as nothing has been omitted that could add to the equipment of the nose and throat room, the laboratories, and the X-ray department. The building has been designed along practical and economical lines, with reference to conserving space and efficiency.

The Samuel Grabfelder Building is the gift of Mr. Samuel Grabfelder, who has been President of the National Jewish Hospital for the entire fifteen years of its existence.

NATIONAL JEWISH HOSPITAL FOR CONSUMPTIVES.

The annual meeting of the Board of the National Jewish Hospital for Consumptives of Denver will be held in Chicago in the Oak room of the Congress Hotel on Sunday afternoon, January 17, 1915, at 2 o'clock.

ITEMS OF INTEREST IN CONNECTION WITH THE WAR —JEWISH GALLANTRY ON THE BATTLEFIELD

Jewish Heroes.

During the month of November many Jewish officers of the Austrian army were promoted to higher ranks for bravery. Most of the number of ensigns who were advanced to the rank of officers of the reserve are Jews.

The following Jewish majors were promoted to the rank of lieutenant-colonel: Moriz Steinfeld, Samuel Sandor.

Ensign Ludwig Loewy and Albert Bela Beregi, were made lieutenants.

Sub-Lieutenant Rudolf Tramer was advanced to first lieutenant.

Dr. Heim of Sopron, received the golden merit cross with crown.

The golden bravery medal was awarded to David Fuhrmann.

Sanitary Chief Dr. Gottlieb Arnstein received the war decoration and the iron crown order third class.

The military merit cross with the war decoration was awarded to Major Heinrich Misch, Lieutenant Rudolf Aronson, Lieutenant Maximilian Beck, Major Moriz Steinfeld, and First Lieutenant Rudolf Almoslino.

The other medal contains the inscription: "For the brave Volunteers."

Berlin papers report the following incident: The mayor and an alderman of Sennheim, Alsacia, were convicted of treason and were immediately shot. The German commander suspected that many more traitors were to be found in the place and wanted to apply the torch to the whole town. Rev. Bamberger, the seventy-five-year-old rabbi of the place, went to the commander and offered himself as hostage. He pleaded in the words of the patriarch, Abraham, who when God informed him of His intention to destroy Sodom, said: "If there are only ten righteous in the midst of the city, spare it." The German commander was touched by the offer of the venerable rabbi, abandoned his intention to destroy the place and declined to take him as hostage.

COMMUNICATED

Berlin, Nov. 20, 1914.

To the Executive Com., I. O. B. B., Chicago:

Esteemed Sirs and Dear Brethren—The B'nai B'rith News of October, 1914, publishes an article under the title of "Freedom for the Russian Jews," in which a report of the London Standard is reproduced containing the statement that the Jews in Russia will in the future be permitted to become officers of the army and navy. The article is probably written in the light of Zangwill's assertions. The information upon which this article is based lacks all confirmation. The manifesto of the Czar to the beloved Jews, which was given such wide publicity, was never issued, and since the beginning of the war the Jews in Russia are treated just as badly as before. The proper answer to be given to Zangwill may be found in an article written by our Brother Dr. Elbogen, which we have transmitted to you and to our American sister lodges. There is not a single Jew in the whole world who could think of believing Russia in anything, or of assisting in the attempt to make propaganda for Russia. We therefore request you to publish this letter, or to correct the statements of the B'nai B'rith News in a short article.

Trusting to receive your favorable reply at an early day, we beg you to accept our brotherly greetings in B. B. L. and H.

DISTRICT GRAND LODGE NO.

RESTRICTIVE MEASURES AGAINST THE JEWS STILL IN FORCE.

The Petrograd police have imprisoned ten Jews from the Pale for periods extending between a fortnight and a month for staying in the capital.

The petition of the municipality of Mariumpol, praying for the admission of Jewish children whose fathers are at the front, to all schools without restrictions, has been rejected.

The report of the Petrograd Advocates' Council states that the Ministry has rejected the recommendation of the council to promote twenty Jewish lawyers to the rank of advocate.

JEWS IN FIRING LINE.

Response to the Empire's Call.

British Jewry is justifiably proud of the response made by its members to the call to arms, says a writer in a recent issue of the London Times. On the outbreak of war there were about 500 Jews in His Majesty's forces. Today, the Rev. Michael Adler, the Jewish chaplain to the forces, is in possession of the names of over 5,000 of his flock, and other names are pouring in. No fewer than 450 Jews are holding commissions in the army and navy. These figures are striking as, allowing for the large number of Jews whose alien birth debars them from service, the total quota which Jewry should supply is about 3,200.

There was some talk at the beginning of the war of forming special Jewish battalions. The better opinion was opposed to the idea, and the Jews are serving side by side with their comrades of other religions. There is scarcely a unit in the army or navy which does not include a Jewish member. The first nine names in the chaplain's alphabetical list represent eight corps—1st King's, 72d R. F. A., A. S. C., 2d Lancs. Fusiliers, 2d R. I. F., 2d Border, R. A. M. C., and Royal Scots. There are 200 Jews among the Canadians at Salisbury Plain, many of them men who emigrated from Roumania and Russia to Canada, and have taken up arms for the Empire of their adoption. From Australia come the names of seven officers and a large number of men, many of whom took part in the operations in New Guinea and Samoa. In South Africa the regiments are full of Jewish soldiers.

With the Expeditionary Force in France at least 1,000 Jews are serving, of whom more than 100 are in the H. A. C. In the A. S. C. Jewish members of a well-known catering firm are giving their special knowledge.

The response to the call has not been confined to any section of the Jewish community. Fully half of the volunteers are sons of alien parents. On the other hand the great Jewish families of England have contributed their quota. Every eligible member of the Rothschild family, the lay heads of the community, is with the colors, while the sons of the Jewish clergy have enlisted almost to a man. In the Jewish Lads' Brigade—an organization akin to the Church Lads' Brigade—there were fifty officers at the outbreak of war. Forty-seven are wearing the King's uniform. The Jewish lads' clubs have responded well. The Stepney Jewish Lads' Club has 107 officers and men from among its members. Nearly 300 old boys of the Jews' Free School are in the army or navy—a record which will compare well with that of any elementary school in the Kingdom.

Naturally the Jewish community is proud of the fact that three Jewish officers and one man have been mentioned in dispatches—Lieutenant Marix, one of England's most brilliant airmen, is also of Jewish origin.

Honor is not won without scars, and against many a name on the chaplain's list there appears the letters K., W., or M.—killed, wounded, missing. Early in the war Alexis de Gunzburg, a member of a family widely known and honored, gave his life for England while serving as an interpreter attached to the Royal Horse Guards. In the heroic fight of L Battery a Jewish driver fell. One of the first naval victims of the war was a Jewish stoker on the Pathfinder. In one engagement six Jews in the ranks of the 4th Middlesex Regiment were killed and three are among the missing.

Arrangements are being made for the Rev. Michael Adler to go to the front. This will be the first time in history that a Jewish chaplain has accompanied British troops in the field.

THE GREEK PREMIER'S PROTEST AGAINST ANTI-SEMITISM.

In the Parliament of Greece there was recently heard a strong protest against the anti-Semitic persecutions to which the Jews of Salonika have been subjected ever since that town became a Greek possession. The Greek Premier delivered an address in which he attacked most vigorously the attempt of the Greek press in Salonika to sow seeds of discord among the various elements of the city. The Jews, he said, are a most valuable factor in the promotion of Greek industries in Salonika, and their loyalty to Greece cannot be doubted. He appealed to all elements of the population in the newly acquired territories to deal with Jews on friendly terms and to promote peace among the hostile camps.

OPTIMISM AND WAR TIMES

By Brother Dr. Felix Goldman-Oppeln

Translated from German Grand Lodge Report

It remains an incontrovertible fact, that the Jewish world conception is based upon foundations that are thoroughly optimistic. As Judaism differs in this particular direction materially from all the other principal religions, such firm, unshakable optimism may be considered the characteristic trait of the Jewish religious tenets. It is in no way the purpose of this article to reiterate the correctness of this contention nor to establish it on a firmer basis by the introduction of new additional proof. No further testimony and proof is needed for those who are familiar with the teachings of the Jewish religion and who are acquainted with its literature. They find ample proof for their optimism from the very beginning of creation, which in the eyes of the Creator was good and perfect, throughout the Jewish conception of life and God and in the joys and enjoyment of life, in the unshaken faith in God and the hope of the final dawning of the Messianic times. They dispise all sorts of religious asceticism. For them it is a matter of course, that Judaism is the religion of optimism, the faith in the complete realization of justice at some future time.

It is an old and almost trite truth, and even old truths do not lose their import, that one-sided partial efforts do not create permanent values, and that such, no matter in what direction they be applied, do not lead to outward success nor furnish thorough and absolute satisfaction. Not even the most sublime virtues, such as love for the neighbor or readiness for self-sacrifice, can in a one-sided application produce such perfect results and complete satisfaction as might be expected from them. They, like all other things, require the proper counterbalance in order to make them effective and from this old rule the Jewish optimism is not excepted. It is quite true, that this maxim, like so many other wise rules of conduct, has often been proclaimed by Judaism, but it rarely has been lived up to in actual and practical affairs of the daily life. The consistent and persistent one-sidedness in which our fathers permitted themselves to be led by their optimism has caused them to experience the utmost happiness of their lives, but it also has produced the greatest misfortunes in their existence.

It remains incontrovertible, that this optimistic tendency has at all times enabled Judaism to withstand the bitterest and severest attacks and to come forth unscorched from these trials. The activities of the earliest Prophets must be judged from this very standpoint. They would be impossible without the hope for a Messianic time in the future and in them, as well as in the later medieval writings, the strength of optimism is shown by the fact, that the description of the glorious future time became more sublime and brighter as the actual prevailing conditions grew worse and more despairing. Notwithstanding this undying optimism, that overcame all obstacles, always entailed new and bitter sufferings, the counterpoise, that should have furnished the proper balance, was lacking. The deepest tragedy in the Jewish history can be traced to the fact, that the greatest happiness and the most abject sorrow and misery are traceable to the same identical source.

It is of the greatest importance to establish the proper counterweights. Should they be overloaded they might readily endanger correct balance and jeopardize the activities of the most excellent qualities or even to turn such into the very contrary. It seems quite clear what has to be applied to the optimism in order to restore the proper balance. The optimistic moral of the future requires for its strength and support the morals of the past and of the present; the first is called caution, the latter determination.

To call caution a virtue might readily lead to misunderstandings. It need not, however, degenerate into the commercial ideal, that carefully takes one short step after the other, never undertaking anything unless the outcome is carefully calculated and fully assured. Enterprise and daring are the distinguishing marks of Jewish nature and Jewish teachings and they should so remain. Caution as the moral of the past is different; such caution is based on memory.

It is the memory of the burnt child that dreads the fire. If that memory be lacking, danger threatens and whoever disregards it need not complain of his fate. The moth, that continually forgets and in its unjustifiable optimism repeatedly flies into the burning light, deserves its fate as does the farmer, whose home has been destroyed over and over again by a volcano, when he insists upon re-erecting his home at the foot of that very volcano.

Judaism, more particularly the Judaism of the Middle Ages, has some of the attributes of that farmer. No matter how badly it may have been treated in any one country, how severely it was persecuted, robbed, pillaged and how ruthlessly exiled, it always returned full of confidence and in the optimistic hope, that this had been the last time when such cruelties were to be permitted. It did not take long for a new blow to fall and to destroy all these pleasant day dreams. Whenever an apparently friendly hand had been held out to our fathers, they never stopped to examine whether Jewish blood had been shed by that very hand and still adhered to it nor to inquire whether crafty shrewdness or dire need had turned an implacable enemy for the moment into an apparent friend. Such optimism elevated the Jews to the clouds, so that they left the solid footing of actuality far beyond reach and when the inevitable reaction took place, they fell from unmeasurable space to the bottom of the abyss and the shock proved so much more severe. This undignified and foolish drama has been repeated hundreds of times. For the hundredth time the Jews have suffered the same misfortunes through their optimism, because the moral of the past, the caution, did not aid and assist them with good counsel.

The second of the counterweights is the moral of the present day, the determination. In this connection it would not be ideal to eliminate from our lives what we call otherwise according to our education or the individual inclination: the accident, the wonder, the fortune or misfortune. Life would be dull and empty indeed, if we could only attain that which we earn and work for, and thus are capable of gauging in advance. We should be thankful that our fate is not always decided by our own inclinations and deeds. At the same time even the most incorrigible day dreamers do not rely entirely upon the lucky accident or the stroke of good fortune, which is more or less the hope and desire of mankind for the regulation of their lives and their affairs. The hard world of actualities is capable of awakening our determination even against our own desires.

Judaism, it is to be regretted, has most of the time been such an incorrigible day dreamer. It hoped for and anticipated the kingdom of God, the universal peace and justice, peace and happiness for the Jews and it expected all these blessings to come of their own accord and without contributing to their realization. Our forefathers relied upon many and important things, such as the justice of their cause, upon the world recognizing their merit, upon good and influential friends, but they failed to depend upon the important factor, their own strength and determination. That much-vaunted tenacity and stubbornness of Judaism, after all, was only the instinctive defense for self-preservation and the resistance it offered to annihilation, but never the conscious, active determination to accomplish its objects by deed. This is the reason why it has fared badly at all times. When distress overtook Judaism it stood alone and without friends, as the larger world at all times was engaged in real political strife and had neither time nor patience to be influenced by love, justice, mercy and kindred sentiments. The Jew, dominated by his unlimited optimism regarding his future, forgot the urgent demands of the present and thus he himself has created the ridiculous and paradox figure, that might induce a smile were it not that our own fate is involved. These Jews, the banner bearers of the loftiest cultural ideals, the prophets of a wonderfully happy future, they themselves lived in the most penurious surroundings, the slaves of abject misery. Judaism always lived a life of future hope, but never devoted itself to present actualities.

The world history has once again reached one of those turning points that might prove to be the beginning of a new destiny for us Jews, provided we are prepared to understand the present time and also to comprehend the import of our own past history and the proper kind of optimism that might be warranted. One of the many paradoxes produced by the strange and gigantic upheavals of these exceptional times is, that it required the jealousy of nations and this fearful war among peoples to establish a peaceful, amicable rivalry in the smaller circles of our daily lives. This genuine peace, the great act of reconciliation, has been attained. The Emperor has solmenly declared, that he no longer recognized the dividing lines of party or religious affiliation. That solemn and irrevocable promise has been given us. The Emperor has proclaimed his willingness to remove all the barriers erected against us by ill will, jealousy and reprehensible tradition. We Jews now deem ourselves as suddenly delivered from all the petty annoyances and the moral misery that we had been subject to. The state is ready to employ its full power to subdue any sporadic demonstration of Jew baiting, all hands are held out to us to secure our co-operation and support, our strength is being appreciated in all circles and we are but too ready, perhaps blinded by the glamour, to accept the invitation.

To a much greater extent the change of conditions affects the Jews of Poland and Galicia. The poor devil of a Polish Jew, only yesterday whipped and maltreated by the Russians, boycotted by the Poles and disdained by the Germans, finds himself to have become over night a personage of distinction and merit. The blood-Czar in high sounding promises attempts to purchase the loyalty and adherence of his "dearly beloved Jews." Our own German Fatherland and its faithful ally Austria have addressed the Polish Jews in their own language and in return for their political adherence have promised them such extensive political rights and religious freedom, that we native Jews might almost become jealous thereof. It is easily understood, that such unprecedented glamour may blind the Jew and that he now, as so often before, sees the dawn of a new period and imagines that his yearning for freedom and light is about to be satisfied. In view of his peculiarly strongly developed Jewish optimism it is also easily understood, how he readily yields to the embraces held out to him and almost craves the pardon of his former prosecutors for having ever doubted the devotion, the love and the justice of the multitude that now of a sudden claims his friendship.

The old Jewish optimism is again celebrating its triumph in these days, but before our eyes pass as a reminder and warning the numerous episodes in our history, which, while differing materially in their details, all seem to portend to the same ultimate purpose. With tender sadness, not altogether void of a certain amount of self derision, we recall the thousands of times, when "the glorious rays of a new period had dawned," only to prove to be the glaring light of another cruel, destructive incendiary fire. We do not intend to denounce the optimism as such, nor to seek escape from it, but we wish to warn against blindly following the footsteps of our fathers, who aimed to erect the structure of the future without paying heed to the foundations laid in the past and in the present. We desire to fight shy of that kind of optimism, which lacks completion through the absence of caution and determination.

Caution results from memory. It is in no way our intention to doubt or twist the meaning of the words of the Emperor. We appreciate the noblehearted-ness of our beloved ruler too well, to question his honest intentions or not to recognize how earnestly he will strive for the redemption of his Imperial promises. But we remember, that once before a German Emperor had condemned Jew-hatred and Jew-baiting in uncompromising language, and denounced it as the "shame of the century" without thereby being able to in any way influence or change the sentiments prevailing among the ruling classes in Germany. How often have the Russian Czars in times of danger appealed to the loyalty of their Jewish subjects, solemnly promised them liberty and justice, only to oppress and persecute them more severely after the crisis had passed? We do not desire to be misunderstood. Our patriotic sentiments, our German-National aspirations, that in the hour of danger found unanimous expression in all the circles of German Jewry, our willingness to sacrifice life and treasure upon the altar of the Fatherland, our devotion to the country and the Emperor, are not objects of barter or trade, through the exchange whereof we intend to obtain in the future rights now denied to us. These sentiments are but the natural expression of our innermost feelings of loyalty to our Fatherland. In other directions, however, caution seems advisable.

Not before peace is re-established will it be possible to decide whether a permanent and satisfactory change of our conditions has been reflected. While we all hope for this end, we should not deceive ourselves. No doubt, we shall at first experience many bitter disappointments and should a reaction set in we must at least be prepared to meet it. During many years of earnest and laborious work we have succeeded in organizing a large number of societies and institutions, devoted to the maintenance of Judaism, the development of its sciences, the unification of its interests and the securing of its rights. These alone have secured what we now may claim as our own. They are the weapons of modern Judaism, which we cannot relinquish or permit ourselves to release even through the most honeyed words. We must not permit ourselves to be influenced by the voices from our own camp, that yesterday only made timid demands, but may rise into a loud chorus by tomorrow and which insist, that the strong fortress with its armament is no longer required. Not a single stone must be removed from that fortress. Not one of our numerous protective organizations must be permitted to be weakened or fall into decay, be they, like our beloved order, trying to attain their Jewish aim through the brotherhood and unity of its members, or intended to promote the knowledge and understanding of Jewish history and sciences, or simply meant to fight for our rights in honest and open strife. Everything depends upon preparedness. When peace is re-established on earth and when disappointments may embitter us anew, then we would be compelled to reconstruct from the very bottom and with enormous labor the perfect organizations, which an unwarranted and pernicious optimism may now consider as antiquated and superfluous. Caution is memory. We shall and must examine with the utmost care. Many a hand, now holding itself out to us in the friendliest manner, may again be raised up against us as soon as the times shall have returned to normal conditions. If during the period when the Fatherland demands all of our strength and power, we are unable to increase such spiritual possessions, it is our duty to firmly maintain all those we have created.

If our innate optimism be not permitted to become fatal, it will require, besides caution, a strong revival of the moral of the present, the determination. The emperor's word, which gave the character of a conscious union to the unity which was only instinctive in hours of danger, was a great and splendid victory, not merely of our own cause, but of justice and love. It is not sufficient, however, to gain victories. In these times, when the strategic science is so popular and universal, it is hardly necessary to recall, that victories must be fully exploited. The struggle for our future is in no way ended by the declaration of the Emperor. When the guns are silenced and peace shall have returned to the peoples, we shall be compelled anew to meet the attacks aiming at persecution and annihilation. We shall have to drive many enemies, malice, ignorance and the fallacious traditions from the thousands of loopholes wherein they stubbornly will try to hide. Our dreams of a bright future will never materialize without tenacious determination, without the work of the present day and without the unhindered and strengthened continuation of all those institutions and associations we have created and supported up to the present time.

With the re-establishment of peace among the nations hatred and dissension will not fail to promptly return to the small minds. In that event we cannot find aid through what we did formerly or are doing at this moment, but we must depend solely upon what we shall then accomplish and be doing. In that coming struggle it will not serve to recall the blood shed by us in defense of the Fatherland, the readiness for sacrifice or the patriotic enthusiasm of today. As before the war, we shall see the painful spectacle, that the world will decry and slander all the Jews have done. We shall only attain what the strong determination of the present will secure for us and we shall not be justified to surrender ourselves to optimism and the dreams of future better conditions, unless we are not satisfied with the assurances of friendship and peace given under the stress of war times, but when we have shown our earnest deter-

Twenty-five thousand Francs to Palestine,

A like sum for the purchase of food for Palestine,

One thousand dollars additional to London Lodge to aid the lodge in its relief work for refugees.

OUR OWN BELGIUM.

The fears and forebodings to which expressions have been given on this page belong at the time of this writing no longer to the realm of imagination. The press has begun to turn its attention away from the west to the east and, although the news is meager, enough has been permitted to filter through to fill with horror and dismay all Jews to whom the welfare of their brethren in less fortunate circumstances whether in time of peace or of war is ever a concern. We hear now of whole communities fleeing for their lives, leaving their small possessions behind them, so small that the invader disdains to loot them, only the torch is set to them; at the head of the fugitives the local rabbi or hasidic "saint" baring his body to the chilling frost that the scrolls of the law snatched in haste may be wrapped in the teacher's coat. Thus wandered the forefathers of these unfortunates in the dark ages whensoever the nations in whose midst they dwelt battled, when fierce passions were let loose and the softer sentiments trodden under foot. The Jew, of course, must expect, in common with his fellow-citizens, to bear ungrudgingly the hardships of warfare. And he does bear them. His sons march with the rest of the able-bodied youth whithersoever the commander's voice directs them to go; their deeds of valor elicit order and distinction; you see them wounded in the hospitals, and you hear of them dying in battlefield and trench with the expiring Jew's prayer on their lips. Loyal sons of the land in which their fathers dwelt for centuries, they are doing their duty nobly. But what aggravates their unenviable fate is in the first place the circumstance of the Jewish congestion in the eastern provinces, and in the second place, so far as Russian Poland is concerned, the hostile, nay fiendish attitude of the dominant race.

Congestion has been the evil of Jewish settlements in the dispersion. Not [illegible]xed evil in times of peace. For the preservation of Israel instinctively favored concentration. Safety was found to lie in the knowledge that your brother, ready to extend a helping hand in distress and danger, was nigh at hand. But for the most part the compelling force came from without. And that force was exercised brutally to the end that the unwelcome Jew might be kept out of the vast domains of the overlord, who, basking in prosperity, condemned the Jew to a life from hand to mouth, to a livelihood which was a mere pittance, to constant dread of ill-treatment and abuse. Poland, at one time a haven of refuge, bids fair to become the grave of the Jew. Poland, forgetful of the past when Pole and Jew fraternized in the vain attempt to shake off the foreign yoke, is now the Jew's worst enemy. Beyond is Holy Russia that shuts its door unmercifully to a harassed people shedding its blood for Muscovite aggrandizement. The Jew of Posen and East Prussia may flee to Berlin, the Jew of Galicia may betake himself to Vienna, but the Jew of Poland is banished from Petrograd and Moscow. Jewish communities are invaded, evacuated, reoccupied, now by the Prussian, now by the Russian. At the point of the bayonet he is forced to do the invader's bidding, only to be marched off in chain to Siberia for an offence which was not of his own choosing, a prey to suspicion and Polish calumny.

The cry of our afflicted brethren from a land far away is beginning to be heard, to be heard this side of the ocean. Are we going to shut our ears, to hold our hands tight? Are we going to hide ourselves from our own flesh? An international organization like our Order may be depended upon to be in possession of authentic news as it is also the agency best fitted for distributing the sums confided to its keeping. Indeed we know what is going on over there, we have been kept informed, we are alive to the situation. At the central office we are busy culling from European news agencies all the information touching the unfortunate conditions of Eastern Jewry. Letters reach us from responsible and authoritative Jewish organizations. And so we have set about to stir the charitable sentiments of our immediate constituencies as well as of all American Israel. We shall repeat our appeals to the generous until that sum is reached which all thoughtful must consider as only approximately adequate. We shall continue to publish in our columns the names of lodges and individuals who heed our appeal with contributions large or small. It is a list of honor for every Jewish man and woman and child to be enrolled on, to be of those who respond nobly, generously, whole-heartedly. The war zone is constantly spreading engulfing ever wider areas in the inevitable ruin and devastation. The western sufferers may be left to the mercy and capacity for offering assistance of continental and English Jewry. But what about the Orient? the Jews of Asia Minor and Palestine? With Jerusalem a camp of soldiers and the ports of Palestine blockaded and menaced, menaced from within and without, the misery of a population none too rich, none too prosperous, always dependent upon the charity of Europe and America, is too staggering for contemplation.

We have our own Belgium. That brave little nation has a just claim upon the pity and generosity of all mankind. We Jews have given freely to the Emergency Fund on their behalf. Let us not forget for a moment that the cry of the Jew goes out first and foremost to the Jew. We have reason to believe that when the plight of our brethren becomes fully and generally known America will be roused as one man irrespective of creed or race. But ours must be the initiative. And so we address ourselves to American Israel with our plea for the unfortunate Jew. We say, Give, give freely, give at once. We live in extraordinary times and extraordinary efforts must be put forth. Nay, if you have given once, give again. Every cent is needed, that starving babes may be fed, that the naked may be clothed, that the sick may be healed. We would be recreant to our sacred duty were we to look on idly. And we would be mistaking the heart of the Jew if for a moment we gave ourselves over to despair. For we are the merciful sons of merciful fathers. And we shall rise to the great responsibilities of the cruel moment.

A PLEA FOR TOLERANCE AMONG OURSELVES.

It seems a pity that we Jews who have been the sufferers from the intolerance and bigotry that comes from without should exercise no charity towards those among ourselves with whom we may find ourselves to differ in opinion. It is well that at the very outset of this plea for broad-mindedness we should unequivocally and unmistakeably put ourselves on record as holding no brief for the multitudinous vagaries to which human minds are prone and which in the estimate of all normal beings partake of that abnormality of reasoning which inhabits the twilight region where sanity and insanity touch each other. There are ever so many isms which will not stand the test of sound reasoning.

Nevertheless it is the mark of true culture to welcome difference of opinion. We cannot all expect to be moulded after the same pattern. Just as tastes differ so will opinions. In the first place there is ample ground that is debateable, and on the chart of progress new territories of mental vision are constantly being opened up. The stay-at-homes who are of the more cautious and sedate temperament will probably not pluck up their stakes in haste and exchange the safe homes and hearths for the unknown land though its soil may be rich in precious ore. The majority of mankind is conservative. What custom has hallowed is adhered to most tenaciously. The custom may go back to immemorial times or may be two or three generations old. The ingrained love of inertia takes possession of our minds and we shut our brains to all novelty. Those that vaunt themselves progressives have their own cherished traditions and it is human nature to cling to what we possess. Moreover, the old is always held by a large aggregate of mankind. The new must necessarily be the creation of an individual mind. And as the run of things goes, society is stronger than the individual.

Still progress would be impossible if we were to burn on the stake the man with a novel idea. Copernicus was a lonely thinker in his day, but the world has come round to his views. What was heresy then is now a truism taught to children. In the realm of religious ideas likewise much that is now old and time-honored was at one time the revolutionary idea of a gifted seer. Mankind has at last learned to be tolerant. We scorn the fanatic. Now fanaticism is simply the offspring of an overweening conceit, a blatant egoism. It means in the end that my doxy is orthodoxy. Conservatism is justifiable, but bigotry is not. We know of illustrious examples of men holding fast to tradition, yet broad-minded enough to open their ear to a new message, to a new thought. We ought to combat what we believe to be errors with all the power that is in us, but the experience of mankind has taught us the lesson that errors will not be crushed by making martyrs of their propagators, by simply not allowing ourselves to listen to another man's argument. Crush error by counter-argument, but do not silence it. Let the other side always be heard. Through debate truth is established.

True broad-mindedness counsels modesty. We ought never to believe so thoroughly in the right of a position held by us that there is no room for doubt, no possibility for an honest argument. After all opinions are only opinions. Truth is relative. It is human to err. God alone knows the truth. We can but strive after the truth. And this striving after the truth, it has been said, is far nobler than the possession of truth. We ought therefore to give a hearing to all those that differ with us. We ought to listen to them for the sake of the truth. We must remember that novel ideas are born of supreme originality of mind. Now the original thinker will in the nature of things overshoot the mark. But we should prefer to listen for a moment to an original mind propounding a theory which is probably wrong to being in the audience of sermonizers who year in, year out repeat the same phrases until they become a weariness of the flesh. The zest of originality certainly makes for the interest that comes from freshness.

The worst kind of bigotry is that narrow-mindedness which is bent upon shutting some other person's ear as well as your own. Schoolmasters and preachers above others are particularly apt to indoctrinate the minds of their hearers with their own pet ideas to the exclusion of all contrary opinions. In the wrong kind of a University certain economic doctrines are tabooed, in the wrong kind of a theological institution war is waged against heresy, not merely well-established heresies, but any and all opinions running counter to the particular bias of the denomination supporting the institution. But these intellectual policemen and censors of opinions err when they think that they can shut out of the minds of students or maturer lay audiences a knowledge of the other thought, the thought which because it is forbidden fascinates beyond its inherent merit. Be broad, all ye that believe to have the consciences of others in your keeping! For if an opinion be true, it will prevail against all your censorious vetoes: and if it be false, give it a hearing that it may be revealed in all its untruth. The business of a teacher in particular is to lay before young minds not ready-made opinions, but the facts, the facts that warrant opinions. Let the scholar learn to think for himself. Otherwise he becomes a machine, and machine-made piety is an abomination before the Lord. We all grope in the dark for a solution of the problems that beset us. Let light be shed on them from many a quarter. Welcome all honest expression of opinions. Combat the error with all the power that is in you, but give it a hearing. Otherwise you will be rightly classed with the fanatics of all ages and of all creeds. There is no room for popishness in Judaism. Let us learn to be tolerant among ourselves.

B'NAI B'RITH HOSPITAL TRAIN.

The lodges of District No. 8, Germany, have placed 75,000 marks at the disposal of the Grand Lodge for furnishing a hospital train for the wounded soldiers. This the lodges did in addition to their liberal contributions to their local aid organizations of all denominations. In this work the lodges are connected with the war ministry and the central committee of the Red Cross and hope that the hospital train which is to bear the name of "Hospital Train of the German B'nai B'rith Lodges," will soon be ready and will be turned over to the proper authorities to follow its lofty aim.

OFFICIAL.

Executive Committee, I. O. B. B.
Chicago, Jan. 8, 1915.

Several lodges have adopted resolutions favoring the postponement of the sessions of the District Grand Lodges for one year. One of the lodges petitioned the President of the Order to request such postponement, so that the money so saved may be used to further aid the war sufferers. Another lodge suggested that the meeting of the convention of the Order be postponed for the same reason. As it is probable that similar requests will come from other lodges, it is deemed proper to publish that, as each District Grand Lodge is sovereign in its affairs, subject only to the organic law of the Order, the President of the Order does not deem it proper to interfere in any manner, that to postpone the convention of the Order requires two-thirds affirmative votes of all the lodges, including those in countries now at war; that even if that was practical, he does not deem it advisable, for several reasons; one is, that that very convention will most likely provide ways and means to furnish further relief.

By order of the President,
A. B. SEELENFREUND,
Secretary.

EX-PRESIDENT TAFT AND SECRET SOCIETIES.

We publish herewith correspondence between Hon. Simon Wolf and Hon. William Howard Taft with reference to an address which Mr. Taft delivered before the Y. M. H. A. of New York, wherein, according to press reports, Mr. Taft deprecated the work of secret societies.

Washington, D. C., January 4, 1915.
Hon. William Howard Taft, New Haven, Conn.:

My Dear Friend—My attention has been called to an address which you delivered before the Young Men's Hebrew Association of New York. I am well aware that newspaper articles are not always reliable as to the full context. Therefore I write to you to know your exact meaning as to the criticism you made of secret societies.

I infer, without having your answer, that your opinion was leveled at religious societies who made use of their secrecy in the interest of politics, or to the injury of other religious bodies. You certainly could not have intended fraternal organizations, such as the Order of B'nai B'rith, whose medal of honor you so worthily wear, for that organization, secret as it is, works solely in the interest of humanity, its aims and objects being thoroughly American and patriotic, and at the same time, cosmopolitan. It was founded not in opposition to any other form of faith, but to strengthen the lines of brotherhood among all men, and to educate the incoming immigrants to a full realization of their civic duty. You will remember at the great meeting held in the city of New York, where you honored us by being one of the speakers, you heard in a feeble outline delivered by me, of the aims and objects of that great organization.

I fully concur with you that any attempt on the part of any secret religious society to undermine the superstructure of our form of government is criminal and dangerous, but associations such as I have described, and other kindred organizations are helpful and beneficial.

Wishing you a happy New Year, I am,
Sincerely,
Simon Wolf.

New Haven, Conn.
January 6, 1915.

My Dear Simon Wolf—I have yours of January 4. Of course, I had no intention of instituting a crusade against secret societies, for I belong to the Masons. I was a secret society man in college. Of course, my remarks are to be taken in the connection in which they were uttered. What I referred to was a secret society with political aims, engaged in pushing a bigoted prejudice into the election or rejection of candidates for public office.

Happy New Year.
Sincerely yours,
Wm. H. Taft.

Mr. Simon Wolf,

TURKISH JEWS IN FRANCE.

It is reported in the Nieuwe Rotterdamsche Courant," that the French Government has permitted all the Turks living in Paris to remain there, but has excluded the Turkish Jews, who number at least 1,600, from the privilege.

PROF. DR. S. EHRMANN CELEBRATES 60TH BIRTHDAY.

On Dec. 19th, Brother Professor Dr. S. Ehrmann, one of the most prominent leaders of the Jews in Vienna, celebrated his 60th birthday. After finishing his medical studies at the Vienna University, Prof. Dr. Ehrmann became the demonstrator of the Court Counsellor Brucke. In the year 1883 he entered the service of the General Hospital, first as assistant to Professors Jaeger and Kaposi, and later he was active as assistant in the clinic of Court Counsellor Neumann. From the year 1900 he was Professor extraordinary and from 1908 ordinary Professor of dermatology at the University of Vienna and President of the clinic of the General Hospital. The learned Professor has published a great number of medical works which have brought high honor to his name at home as well as in foreign countries. His recent book, "Comparative Diagnostic Atlas of Skin Diseases," is a work of very high order. Professor Dr. Ehrmann enjoys special recognition not only in medical circles but also in general society. He is Grand President of District No. 10, Austria, President of the Jewish congregation of Vienna and fills many posts of honor in a number of associations which are devoted to works of humanity. On the occasion of his birthday celebration the learned Professor received many congratulations from his wide circle of friends as well as from his colleagues.

Although Professor Dr. Ehrmann and his family sought to prevent the public announcement of his sixtieth birthday, several circles became cognizant of it and his admirers would not be deprived of the opportunity to offer him some tokens of reverence and gratitude.

During the forenoon the Professor was congratulated by the physicians of his division, the assistants Dr. Perutz and Dr. Hirsch of Cracow, by those of his former pupils who are not at the front with the army, and by the steady and substitute nurses.

It was very touching to see a deputation of the wounded soldiers, who are receiving medical treatment in his division. They delivered their addresses of congratulation and expressions of thanks in the German, Bohemian and Hungarian languages. Mrs. Ilana Taussig served as interpreter of the latter tongues. Some of the soldiers came hobbling on their crutches, others were covered with bandages and they made a deep impression when they tendered a laurel wreath tied with bows in the national colors and offered their well-wishes, coming from their thankful hearts to their beloved and indefatigable physician.

As Professor Ehrmann had personally tried to avoid all demonstrations he was the more deeply touched by this manifestation of gratitude and admiration.

At the house of Brother Professor Dr. Ehrmann, appeared to congratulate him in the name of the Order B'nai B'rith, Vice-President of District No. 10, Brother Dr. Edw. Kohn, and Grand Secretary Brother Dr. Hecht, in the name of Wien Lodge No. 449, President Rudolf Kohn, Vice-President Dr. Eisenstaedter and Richard Petschek; in the name of Eintracht Lodge No. 562, Dr. Samuely and Imperial Counsellor Dr. Arnold Ascher; in the name of Solidaritaet Lodge No. 427, of Cracow, Rabbi Dr. Thon, President, Dr. Landau and Dr. Steiner, and in the name of Leopolis Lodge No. 482, of Lemberg, Dr. Paras.

INTERCESSION SERVICE.

Saturday, January 2d, was observed in all the synagogues under the control of the chief rabbi of London as the Intercession Service. A like service was observed in the Sephardic synagogues on the following Sunday, January 3d, which date has been chosen for that purpose by the Haham of the Berkley Street Synagogue.

YEAR-BOOK OF THE CENTRAL CONFERENCE OF AMERICAN RABBIS, VOL. XXIV.

We have before us a volume containing a full report of the proceedings of the last annual convention of the Central Conference of American Rabbis, held at Detroit, Mich., last July. At this meeting the Rabbis celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the conference and this report also reflects the culmination of the strivings and achievements of the American Rabbis during the last quarter of a century for the benefit of the synagogue and the development of the influence of Judaism in America. The reader of this volume is impressed with the fact that the work of the American Rabbis has reached a high standard of usefulness. Such work as the revision of the prayer-book, the provision of a proper hymnal and the spreading of religious education by the distribution of tracts on Jewish subjects shows plainly that the Rabbis are earnestly endeavoring to elevate and strengthen the religious life of American Israel, that they are honestly aiming to arouse the interest of the Jewish reform congregations in public worship, which is an essential part of a religious life. The Rabbis can accomplish no greater good to Judaism than to stand in the watch towers, to be alive to the needs of the times and to strive to solve the many problems which modern life creates for the Jew in his endeavor to remain faithful to his spiritual inheritance. All these the Rabbis are doing faithfully, devotedly and energetically and we should not fail to hold up their hands and to encourage them in their blessed work.

SALONIKA JEWS IN CONSTANTINOPLE.

It will be remembered that in consequence of the taking of Salonika by the Greeks during the second Balkan war, a great many of the prominent Jews of Salonika left their old abode and removed to Constantinople. These Jews are so loyal to the Ottoman Empire that they prefered to leave the city of their ancestors rather than to become Greek citizens or to suffer for their unquenchable love for their fatherland under the dominion of strangers. These Jews of Salonika who now live in Constantinople arranged services for themselves during the last holidays and then the foundation was laid for a permanent union of these Jews. Advocate Moise Cohen, an influential politician of Salonika, who was a member of the Turkish parliament and of the Macedonian committee, addressed his assembled compatriots in a rousing speech which awakened much enthusiasm among them, so that they forgot the place and the occasion and shouted their approval of the words of the speaker. At this meeting the Salonika Jews vowed to assist the fatherland also in the present critical moment with all their means.

RUSSIAN JEWS IN PALESTINE WISH TO BECOME TURKISH SUBJECTS.

Five thousand Jewish colonists of Palestine who are subjects of Russia, have petitioned the Chief Rabbi of Turkey to make it possible for them to become Ottoman subjects. This request was communicated to the Turkish Government which declared that it is ready to admit the foreign Jews as Turkish subjects, if they will obligate themselves not to return to their old citizenship after the war is over.

GOVERNOR-ELECT ALEXANDER APPRECIATES CONGRATULATIONS FROM LOS ANGELES LODGE.

We publish herewith letter from Brother M. Alexander, Governor of the State of Idaho, in reply to congratulations received by him from Los Angeles Lodge:

Boise, Idaho, December 11, '14.
Mr. I. R. Rubin, 401 Citizens' National Bank Bldg., Los Angeles, Cal.:

Dear Sir—Convey to Los Angeles Lodge No. 487, I. O. B. B., my hearty thanks for the kind congratulations received through you from them.

Having been a member of St. Joseph Lodge No. 73 of St. Joseph, Mo., for nearly thirty-five years, I recognize the good wishes of this Brotherhood as coming from the bottom of their hearts, and I hope that my election may be personified in my duties and services to my people, who have honored me with about all that people can honor any one of its citizens. Let us congratulate the people of Idaho upon that spirit that they displayed in putting into real practice the words of the founders of our government, "that all men are born equal and entitled to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness." Very truly yours,

M. ALEXANDER.

A DISTINGUISHED SON OF A DISTINGUISED FATHER.

It is with pride and with pleasure that we record here the fact that Ernest Maretzki, son of our highly esteemed brother, Sanitary Councillor, Dr. Louis Maretzki, of Berlin, has been decorated with the iron cross for bravery on the battlefield. Brother Dr. Louis Maretzki is an ex-president of District No. 8, and is a strong pillar of our Order in Germany. He devotes his brilliant gifts of mind to the interests of the B'nai B'rith and his heart and soul are in his work for the realization of the B'nai B'rith ideals. He is the father of the B'nai B'rith movement for the suppression of the white slave traffic and his general work for the welfare of his people has always been inestimable. We heartily congratulate the distinguished father upon the distinction of his son.

SON OF THE "HAHAM" ENROLLED AS AN OFFICER.

The Jewish World of London, England, reports that the son of the Haham, Dr. Moses Gaster, figures as an officer in the English army. That the son of a chief rabbi is enrolled in the forces indicates the process by which the children of immigrants willingly tender their services to the country which hospitably opened its gates to their parents.

The B'nai B'rith News congratulates Dr. Gaster, past president of the First Lodge of England, London, for the spirit manifested by his son, feeling certain that as a son of his father he will reflect credit upon himself, his sires and his people.

BEN B'RITH ARRANGES BIG DINNER TO THE POOR.

Mr. Nate Fenton, prominent member and worker of Montefiore Lodge, No. 70, I. O. B. B., of Buffalo, N. Y., gave a dinner to the poor at the Broadway Auditorium in Buffalo on Christmas Day. More than 5,000 persons were served in ten sets. Special tables were reserved for women and for families. This was the tenth year that Mr. Fenton has given this holiday dinner to the poor.

THE JEWISH QUESTION IN ROUMANIA.

Roumanian papers report that the Union of Roumanian Jews has resolved to issue a long memorial document which will contain all the facts relative to the Jewish question in Roumania and which is to be a sort of a resume of the phases of this question at the time when King Ferdinand I. ascended the throne. The publication will be dedicated to this monarch.

It is hardly to be expected that the new King of Roumania will be induced by this friendly dedication of the work of the Union of Roumanian Jews to ameliorate the conditions of his Jewish subjects.

MENDEL BEILIS.

Mendel Beilis, the defendant in the ritual murder case of Kiev, who left Russia and settled in Jaffa, Palestine, has now become a citizen of the Ottoman State.

A PROPHETESS OF JEWISH NATIONALISM

By Dr. MAX L. MARGOLIS

Written for the B'nai B'rith News.

Long before Pinsker and Herzl, it was given to an English novelist to devote her pen to the vision of the Jewish nationalism which to-day is the creed of many Jews, just as it is bitterly opposed by others within our camp. It is, indeed, this division of opinion that she so vividly depicts. And the marvel of it all is that she was no Jewess. She was a Gentile. I could not call her a Christian, for she had left behind her all her early associations. She had emancipated herself from the Christianity that was taught in the Established Church. One would like to know how she managed to get hold of all her wonderful information about Jews and Judaism. Gifted observer that she was, she absorbed the life, and be it the life of an alien community, that stirred about her. But her knowledge must have been derived also from books. The man for whom she threw away the conventions was a Jew, but a Jew, it must be feared, of the lukewarm kind. But no matter how and through whom she gained access to the innermost thoughts of the Jew, she mastered them to an extent not shared by many a writer who stands within. The reader by this time has guessed that I am referring to George Eliot and her remarkable novel in three volumes, "Daniel Deronda."

The general reader finds much in this work to admire. The picture of English life she presents stamps it as a masterpiece. We obtain an insight into the mental makeup of high and middle-class society. The virtues and the foibles of the aristocracy, of the clerical household, of the humdrum family, of the nobleman and the artist, are revealed in lifelike portraiture. Nor is the human element lacking without which no work of fiction can acquire a lasting hold on the mind of generations of readers. For the spoiled child reared in luxury and forced into situations for which she was ill prepared may be found in any family, English or continental of to-day or of yesterday and to-morrow. Gwendolen Harleth at home or abroad, tyrannizing over an indulgent mother or bewitching strangers in a foreign resort, unconventional a bit yet a victim of convention in its most ruthless form, coldly calculating, yet surrendering to the unlovable wooer that her mother may be spared the pinch of poverty, she is a living character such as you may run up against in life. Nor is the moral wanting. The egotistical Grandcourt perishes. His wife, who knew of his antenuptial entanglements, proves false to her promise given the rejected woman and creates for herself a condition under which she succumbs. The vicious go-between triumphs over his master's spouse and works her undoing. That fine specimen of a romantic nobleman in the person of Sir Hugo offsets the unlovable nephew, just as his unsophisticated wife is a fine counterpart to the worldly-wise Gwendolen. All of which is charmingly told. But the Jewish reader will at times be impatient to get to that part of the narrative which concerns him.

The hero of the novel meets us at the ward of Sir Hugo. He is known to the world as the nobleman's nephew. Yet the knowing suspect that in truth he is Sir Hugo's natural son. The suspicion takes hold of the hero himself at an early period of his boyhood. The secret is not lifted till much later. For the time being the novelist throws out hints concerning the difference in temperament between the two. The reader feels that the dark-haired boy is different from the ordinary Englishman of the class of society he moves in. Daniel Deronda's first contact with the Jewish world takes on the form of an adventure. He chances upon a poor Jewess in a moment when driven to despair she attempts suicide by drowning. He foils her in this mad act and becomes her protector. He learns her story, the pathetic story of a vain search for mother and brother. He sets out on a search of his own. He invades the ghetto. He meets a Jewish family of pawnbrokers embodying all the unlovable traits of the ghetto trader. Yet even in that family, though the pettiness of the shopkeeper and the innate instinct for gain of the little Cohen repel, is revealed the beauty of Jewish homelife. George Eliot quotes Heine's well-known verses about the transformation which the Sabbath works in the life of the humblest ghetto Jew. But through the Cohens, Daniel meets Mordecai who later on will be revealed as the lost brother of the girl Deronda rescued. Mordecai, or rather Ezra Mordecai, is the type of the Jewish scholar and dreamer. A victim of the dread disease which cuts his life short at the moment when his sister and Daniel are wedded, he is given to a mysticism which illumines his face made hectic already by fever. This dreamer dreams the vision of Jewish nationalism, and the happiest consummation of his dream is that he succeeds in converting Daniel to discipleship. For Deronda, let it be anticipated, discovers that he is the son of Jewish parents, of a Jewish mother who proved renegade, grandson of a Jewish physician who forced his daughter into a marriage against her will, whose sole wish was that a son might be born who would carry on the Jewish traditions of the family. His mother it was who thought that she was conferring a favor upon her son by having him raised in an English nobleman's home, away from all contact with Judaism, in utter ignorance of his origin.

Chapters XL. and XLII., the latter headed by Zunz's classic introductory sentence to his master-work, should be read by every thinking Jew. And I am not addressing myself to Jewish nationalists, nor am I here making a plea for Jewish nationalism. I am simply taking it for granted that the movement is with us, that the idea has taken root, and that herefore a great novelist's prophetic presentation of the movement and the idea should arrest attention. Mordecai, English born, lives in a world of his own, the medieval world, "where there were men who made the ancient language live again in new psalms of exile"; he believes that one of the souls of those men who "had absorbed the philosophy of the Gentile into the faith of the Jew, and still yearned toward a center for our race," was born again within him. His enthusiasm comes from the old teachers, while "our chief teachers are misleading the hope of our race." Mordecai does not fear the taunt of unpracticability, of being told that he may be under an illusion. "The history of our people's trust has been full of illusion." But it is in that meeting in the "Hand and Banner," a sort of debating club, that all the arguments for and against nationalism are threshed out and the various living parties of Jewry are depicted in lifelike colors. There is Pash, the progressive Jew, the Jew of 1848, the international Jew. He laughs at the idea of nationalities as something outworn. Mordecai replies that nationality is a feeling. If you have that feeling, you are a nationalist; it cannot be argued into you. Mordecai believes in progress, but progress must proceed along national lines. "The life of a people grows, it is knit together and yet expanded, in joy and sorrow, in thought and action; it absorbs the thought of other nations into its own forms, and gives back the thought as new wealth to the world; it is a power and organ in the great body of nations." "Revive the organic center; let the unity of Israel, which has made the growth and form of its religion, be an outward reality. Looking toward a land and a polity, our dispersed people in all the ends of the earth may share the dignity of a national life which has a voice among the peoples of the East and the West." Mordecai expects that with the national life restored reform will take care of itself. "Superstition will vanish." And there is the "genial and rational" Gideon, who represents a type of Jew that is unmistakable. "The most learned and liberal men among us who are attached to our religion are for clearing our liturgy of all such notions as a literal fulfillment of the prophecies about restoration." "Prune it," he says, "of a few useless rites and literal interpretations of that sort, and our religion is the simplest of all religions, and makes no barrier, but a union, between us and the rest of the world." But Mordecai is undaunted. A new Judea, poised between East and West, will be a covenant of reconciliation. "The sons of Judah have to choose that God may again choose them. The Messianic time is the time when Israel shall will the planting of the national ensign." "Let us help to will our own better future and the better future of the world—not renounce our higher gift and say, 'Let us be as if we were not among the populations,' but choose our full heritage, claim the brotherhood of our nation, and carry into it a new brotherhood with the nations of the Gentiles. The vision is here; it will be fulfilled."

Had George Eliot been writing in our days, she would have added a fifth type of a Jew perhaps, the socialist Jew. Otherwise the picture is complete. What she says about nationality being a feeling and not subject to argument is eminently true. Where that feeling is atrophied, no arguments will avail. Surely the thoughts that are now agitating and dividing Jewry must have been fermenting in those days when George Eliot created the personality of Ezra Mordecai, the dreamer of the vision of Jewish nationalism. She who read Heine and Zunc penetrated into the innermost workshop of Jewish opinion and beheld the Jewish soul grappling with the momentous question, Shall the nation be killed or brought back to life again? Had she been one of our own, she might have ranked with the great prophet of the exile, with Nehemiah, with Judah the Maccabee, with Akiba. But the pious among the Gentiles are promised a share in the world to come. Should the future order of things come to pass of which she prophetically drew a picture, her name will be gratefully praised on the lips of the Jew who has come into his own. But even to-day, whether you are a friend or a foe of Jewish nationalism, her grasp of the subject must arouse admiration.

JEWS AND CHRISTIAN SCIENCE.

But all such claims are after all among the least of its pretensions. Christian Science is more than a method of healing. It is at the same time a religion, a philosophy, and a science, all in one, but especially a religion. Its name indicates that. Its numerous shrines and temples rear their proud towers alongside of other churches everywhere in the land.

Let us, then, examine its peculiar religious ideas and doctrines. Let us see how much logic there is in Christian Science religious or metaphysical reasoning. We can here only summarize its doctrines.

We are told that Christian Science is based on certain fundamental propositions defining the nature of God. Its text-book contains this definition of God: "God is incorporeal, divine, supreme, infinite Mind, Spirit, Soul, Principle, Life, Truth, Love" (Science and Health, p. 465).

To the unschooled person this string of words must appear beautiful, grand, sublime, the essence of divine wisdom. Yet it is nothing but a string of words, each one beautiful and impressive, but together giving little sense. For what sense is there in saying that "God" is "Divine"; or that He is "mind, spirit, soul," three words that generally convey the same idea; or that He is Principle, Life, Truth, Love? We could add a few more words to it without making much difference in the sense, one way or another. We could say, God is Law, Light, Justice, Pity, Mercy, Beauty, Essence, Source, Goal, Foundation, Father, Mother, Eternity, Infinity, etc., etc. There is no dearth of such beautiful words in our English tongue.

But let us accept this definition, and proceed. "The starting point of divine Science is that God, Spirit, is All-in-All, and that there is no other Might nor Mind—that God is Love, and therefore He is divine Principle" (Science and Health, p. 275). Again a string of words, meant to be very impressive and edifying. Yet let any intelligent person try to get some sense of out this: "God is Love, and therefore He is divine Principle." We might as well say: "Beauty is Joy, and therefore it is beautiful Principle."

Such being its illuminating definitions of God, let us see what its doctrines are about man. They are part of its metaphysics. "There is no life, truth, intelligence, nor substance in matter. All is infinite mind, and its infinite manifestation, for God is All-in-All. Spirit is immortal truth; matter is mortal error. Spirit is the real and eternal; matter is the unreal and temporal. Spirit is God, and man is His image and likeness. Therefore, man is not material; he is spiritual" (Science and Health, p. 468).

Of course, we have to take Mrs. Eddy's word for all this. If we apply some real test, we find that it is not at all as simple as it appears. Let someone drop down from the tenth story of a building to the stone pavement below, and he will soon learn whether there is no substance in matter.

Perhaps that is what is meant by "Matter is mortal error." It certainly would be an error to fall down from the tenth story; and it would be mortal, very mortal.

Or note the profound logic of this: "Matter is unreal and temporal," which means, it lasts for a time, but does not exist. It is, and it ain't.

Note in particular the last sentence: "Man is not material; he is spiritual." I suppose that is why he eats and drinks, and reproduces his species, and does a number of other things that only a spirit is in the habit of doing. I wonder what man would do if he were in part material.

But the essence of Christian Science is contained in the following: "The fundamental propositions of divine metaphysics are summarized in the four following, to me self-evident proposition:

"I. God is All-in-All.

"II. God is good—Good is Mind.

"III. God, Spirit, being all, nothing is matter.

"IV. Life, God, omnipotent good, deny death, evil, sin, disease.—Disease, sin, evil, death, deny good, omnipotent God, Life. Which of the denials in proposition four is true? Both are not, can not be true. According to the scripture, I find that God is true, 'but every (mortal) man a liar'" (Science and Health, p. 113).

Now, isn't that beautiful? Isn't that profound? Consider: "Good is Mind"; which means anything good: a good dinner, a good automobile, a good house, a good five-dollar bill. Then, "Nothing is Matter." I always thought that nothing meant the hole of a doughnut, or, as the Irishman put it: "If it's nothing that you want, you'll find it in the jug where the whisky was." "Every (mortal) man is a liar." Why add the word mortal? Why not leave it as David originally said it, "Every man is a liar"? It certainly is not fair to take such liberties with King David.

OPTIMISM AND WAR TIMES.

mination to have the guiding hand in the shaping of our position as Jews. cial condition, which is bound to come with the general reconstruction of social and political life in the Empire.

We really have reached the turning point in our history and with us are our coreligionists, who since many centuries have held the Eastern frontier against the attacks of the barbarian hordes. Our fate, however, is in our own hands and we have a shining example to lead us onward. We can learn from our German Fatherland how we ourselves are to shape the future of our Judaism.

Are not all who bear the name of German filled with an imperturbable optimism? Is there a single German not full of confidence in the future? That optimism is not based upon day dreams, but is founded upon knowledge and science. Germany possessed the proper caution. It took to heart the lessons learned in past days and it prepared itself for the coming fray with its entire strength and power. Its optimism is founded upon our unanimous determination to vanquish, before which all obstacles must vanish.

That picture should leave an indelible impression upon the hearts of all Jews. This lesson learned in a great time must lead all Jewry toward the realization of the great future it anticipates and prays for.

"FREEDOM FOR THE RUSSIAN JEW."

"The news that the Russian government had formally promised legislation to remove Jewish disabilities would be worth more to the Russian cause at this moment than a crushing victory over the German armies. It would alter at one stroke the whole European outlook. We do not mean merely that it would influence the thinking both of neutrals and of Russias' ally about her; it would do that, for the behavior of any Christian people toward its Jews is among the most searching tests of its civilzation. We are thinking rather of the effects upon Russia herself. * * * A touch of Jewish realism, less prone than the Slav temperament to comfortable delusions, less fecund in theory, and more apt at organization, is precisely what the Russian parties of progress lack—and that, indeed, is largely the reason why the reaction has repressed the Jews. * * * We do not know how far the Russian government values the intangible assets of the good opinion of its two liberal allies. * * * If in any degree the new Europe is relieved of the military problems which scourged the old sympathies will inevitably follow natural lines of political affinity. We hope with our whole mind that this question of the Jews may no longer stand in the way of an extension of official Russia of the cordial sympathy which links up to France."—The Nation, London.

NEWS FROM LONDON

BY OUR CORRESPONDENT DR. M. EPSTEIN

London, Dec. 22, 1914.

On the 16th of December the Bishop of London was responsible for day and night prayers of intercession in St. Paul's Cathedral. The services commenced at 8 o'clock in the morning and continued without a break until 8 o'clock the next morning. Directions for special prayers were issued and worshipers were asked to pray for the men on the battlefield, for the sailors on the deep sea, for all the sufferers in the war—the wounded, the sick, the missing and the prisoners, for the bereaved, the desolate, the impoverished, the refugees. All this was surely to be expected. But one paragraph of suggestions possibly came to some people as somewhat of a surprise. Its sentiment is fine; and it is the best answer to any hymns of hate or such like productions. Here are the very words: "Pray for our enemies, ask that they may be forgiven; that there may be no spirit of personal hatred in our hearts toward them; that the causes of bitter misunderstanding between us may be taken away; that they may be recompensed for acts of kindness shown by them to our wounded and prisoners; that we and our allies may be preserved from un-Christian acts of retaliation."

* * * * * * *

These services were purely local. But on January 3 a national service of intercession has been arranged for, and all religious bodies in the land will co-operate in the celebration. Jews are of the number, and no doubt many congregants will flock to them. From some points of view one cannot help feeling that God were best left out of this miserable business. On the other hand, if people utter noble prayers, surely good must follow, and the highest good for the world will ensue if after the war more idealism and less materialism enter into men's lives. We have been called the Machine Age. We have witnessed a transvaluation of values. Perhaps we shall call a halt and take stock of life. If the war brings more social justice, greater mutual understanding among nations as among individuals, more brotherly love and harmony—why we shall be comforted of our wounds.

* * * * * * *

On the political side the war will, of course, bring many changes and perhaps the greatest in the position of the Jews. For one thing, they will be able to demand more justice and the liberty that is their due as citizens and as men. If the great powers lead the way, the smaller powers will follow. If Russia does her duty to her Jews, Rumania will be able to do no less. In every army the Jews are doing their duty. Some 5,000 of them are serving in the British field force, to say nothing of those in the navy. Nor has the stream ceased. A movement is on foot for forming a Jewish battalion. The principle of filling each unit, so far as possible, with men of the same calling or district or training is being followed here, too. There is a public school and university battalion, a sportsman's battalion, a pals' battalion. The idea is to form a battalion of Jews. A Jewish recruiting committee, with its own offices, are at work and recruiting meetings have been planned. This Jewish battalion does not mean that all the Jewish soldiers will be in it. Just as not all public schoolmen are in the public school unit, or all sportsmen in the sportsman's unit, so all Jews will not necessarily be found in the Jewish unit. A good many Jews are opposed to the proposition. These will be received by other units. The instances of apparent anti-Jewish prejudice which have manifested themselves were really isolated and of no serious consequences. What with the 5,000 already in the ranks and the addition that will be contributed by the special Jewish battalion, there will be quite a host of Jewish soldiers in Lord Kitchener's army. Arrangements have been made for the Rev. Michael Adler to go to the front, and it will be the first time in history that a Jewish chaplain has accompanied British troops in the field.

* * * * * * *

The war has brought suffering in its train to a good many people In an age when the world is an economic entity any dislocation of the normal equilibrium is bound to affect all lands in every continent. No doubt you in America know this from experience. But of those who are suffering, two principal groups stand out. The first is composed of people whose homes have been ravaged. The Belgians have been badly hit, but Belgium has come into the limelight, so to say, and has found comforters. Incessant activity on behalf of the refugees is going on in England. Private houses dispense hospitality, and public places add thereto. Our colleges and schools open their doors to Belgian children and give them a sympathetic welcome. In the true meaning of the words, England is providing a refuge for the homeless. The Jews from Belgium, as readers of this page now know, have shared in the welcome, and their own brethren are giving their needs anxious care. Moreover, the Dutch are exercising neighborly virtues in rendering succor to those Belgians who fled to Holland.

* * * * * * *

But the Belgians are not alone in their suffering. In Poland and Galicia armies have swayed backwards and forwards, bringing devastation with them. And the irony of Fate would have it that Jews are in the majority in both these lands. The Galician Jews fled to Vienna. The lodges of the Order are helping all they can and heaven knows that endless assistance is called for. But the Jews in Russian Poland? The Germans may not help them even if they could; nor may their Austrian brethren. Their hope lies in neutral countries and in England. Denmark, no doubt, is doing what is possible, and the Copenhagen Lodge is, we know, to the fore. But the misery is so great, the damage so extensive, and poverty has been multiplied a thousandfold. The mind cannot realize it, words cannot give it expression. The worst of all is that Western Europe does not know. We hear precious little from the Russo-German campaign; how expect to hear, therefore, of the sufferings of the Jews? Something is being done in London. A fund has been opened of which Mr. Schiff is treasurer and the house of Rothschild have already contributed one thousand pounds (say five thousand dollars). London Lodge also has the matter under consideration. We doubt not but that assistance will be rendered, despite the many claims and appeals that re-echo on all sides.

* * * * * * *

One might imagine this exhausts the catalogue. But there is a voice from yet another quarter. The Jews of Servia have been ruined economically, and the Chief Rabbi of Servia has arrived in London to plead their cause. Servia in her treatment of the Jews has a record which larger states might well imitate. Servia gives full citizen rights to her Jewish population. What is the result? The Servian Jews are staunch Servians. Just to illustrate the tolerance of the Servians, it may be mentioned that during the recent High Holy-Days, while fighting between Austria and Servia was actually going on, the Jewish soldiers were excused from active duty in order that they might go to synagogue But more was done. Such Jews as were Austrian captives in the hands of Servia were liberated for the New Year and Day of Atonement to enable them to carry out their religious exercises.

* * * * * * *

War has now hung heavily on Servia for some three years. The present conflict has demolished all that was left from the Balkan war. The Jews, a thriving community, are thus penniless, and their appeal for help can only be made in one land—England. So Dr. Alkaly has come here to collect money. There is a general appeal for the Servians, to which, no doubt, Jews will listen. The appeal of Servian Jews must, however, come first. So the wail of misery goes up from homeless thousands. C'est la guerre.

* * * * * * *

The second group of sufferers are the subjects of enemy countries in the different lands that are at war. Englishmen in Germany and Germans in England are certainly in straits. It would seem that of the former all are interned in concentration camps; while as for the latter we know that a large number are so interned. Hard in any case, it is specially hard on Jews who are particular about Kashrus. Where a goodly number of Jews are together it is not impossible to provide Kosher food for them. But where they are scattered, a good deal of hardship is entailed. Much is being done to alleviate the lot of such prisoners, both in Germany and in England. Nor is suffering the lot of those only who are interned. Those aliens in England who are at large, if they are in need (and many certainly are) are undoubtedly to be pitied. The Society of Friends deserve special mention for their active sympathy in such cases, though other organizations are at work in this direction, too. Perhaps the hardest lot is that of men formerly in good positions who have lost their all. Beg they cannot; even loans they often refuse. They present a problem of peculiar difficulty and it is pleasing to report that the lodge is doing what it can for such cases. In this connection the work of Brothers Rubenstein and Benjamin, the Treasurer and Honorary Secretary of London Lodge, should be highly commended. They have been dispensing unostentatious charity on behalf of the lodge and we are very much indebted to them.

* * * * * * *

The last meeting of London Lodge was a memorable one. For the first time representatives of Manchester Lodge came officially to bring before us a plan for common action in regard to the general position of Jews after the war. Brother J. S. Cohen, President of Manchester Lodge, gave a most effective speech, quiet, dignified, and to the point, and the simple eloquence of his manner and matter moved everyone present to thought. He was seconded by Brother Sieff, of Manchester, and the upshot was that while London Lodge was giving consideration to the question, it will now do so in conjunction with Manchester Lodge. That is all for the good. Interchange of views between the lodges can only lead to useful results and should be cultivated. Before the lodge session the brethren partook of a house supper, at which the health of Brother Dr. Alkaly, Chief Rabbi of Belgrade and Servia, was proposed in Hebrew. The house suppers should become regular; and the suggestion is made to London brethren that definite action be taken to put them on a permanent basis. We might start with the special meeting in January and continue thereafter. The election of officers for 1915 will take place at the regular meeting of the month, on the third Sunday in January. The results we shall announce in our next.

QUEBEC LIBEL CASE ENDS IN JEWISH VICTORY.

The result of the Quebec Libel Case Appeal is a complete victory for the Jewish people. Plamondon and Leduc are condemned to pay damages and all the costs. The judgment of the court was unanimous.

The action was based on a lecture delivered by Plamondon and later published by Leduc in which the Jewish race was held up to ridicule and distrust. This lecture was entitled "The Jew." In it the Jewish religion was attacked and it was declared that they were enemies to the Roman Catholic religion and of the life, honor and welfare of the Christian people.

The lecturer said that the Talmud taught its followers that the doctrines contained in that work are to be preferred to the Mosaic law, and that among other teachings the Talmud enunciated that even the best among the Christians ought to be put to death; that the Jew who sheds the blood of a non-Jew offers up a sacrifice to God, and other charges equally as serious.

As a result of this lecture, it was stated, an anti-Semitic feeling was created in the Province of Quebec. The windows of a synagogue were broken by a mob and several Jews molested.

We herewith publish a few editorials of Canadian papers on the subject:

A Jewish Vindication.

(Quebec Daily Telegraph.)

"All right-minded citizens will rejoice at the judgment of the Court of Appeals in the case of Ortenberg vs. Plamondon and Leduc. The fanatical element here and elsewhere cannot be too soon made to understand that the slandering and stirring up of prejudice and strife against a race is as dangerous and as bad as the defamation of individuals. In this free country, under the protection of the British flag, the Jewish race have as much rights as any other race and so long as they conduct themselves as good citizens, which they undeniably are, no one is justified in decrying or injuring them in their persons, their business or their property, simply because they worship God differently from others, and they have customs and observances peculiar to themselves. One of their advantages over a good many other elements is that they do not figure in the dock of the Recorder's Court very often."

Libeling a People.

(Montreal Gazette.)

"The Court of King's Bench, sitting in appeal at Quebec, has reversed a decision of the local Superior Court, and given small damages to plaintiff in the case of Ortenberg vs. Plamondon and Leduc. The case is one of the most interesting arising out of the mixed character of this province's population that has attracted attention for many years. Events have developed a certain anti-Jewish sentiment among classes of the people, some of them educated. In the case that led to the litigation one of the defendants prepared and the other printed statements derogatory to the Jews as a people, re-stating the charges that recently in Kiev led to the trial of an innocent man on a charge of ritual murder, alleging certain modern libels to the effect that people of the Jewish race cannot get insurance on their property, and generally repeating the slanders that have been urged against the Jewish people in many countries for many years, indeed for many centuries. The effect of the circulation of such matter in a community would be varied. Men of strong and intelligent minds would refuse to be turned against men and women living quietly and lawfully today even if it could be shown that their forefathers in other lands and other countries had been guilty of grave crimes and followed gross superstitions. Many, however, who have not been trained to reason for themselves and who retain strong respect for the printed word, might accept the voice of prejudice as the word of wisdom, and the unlettered, hearing of what those more learned than themselves had declared, would be carried away into hatred. The case was interesting also from the nature of the evidence given, which dealt with the teachings of the Talmud and the older traditions of Judaism. The reading of some of the testimony was as instructive as the study of books on the matters to the fore. As has been said, the decision of the court of first instance was in favor of the defendants, partly on the ground that, as it is not possible to indict, it is not practicable to libel a whole people. There are, or there were at the time, in Quebec, however, only seventy-five Jewish residents. It seems to have been considered by the Court of Appeal that while a whole people could not be libeled, attacks of an unjustified character directed against a whole people might cause assessable injury to certain isolated sections of that people in a community liable to be influenced by what it might be told to to their disadvantage. On this ground damages totaling $75 were granted. The sum is insignificant. The principle embodied in the judgment is far-reaching. The lesson will probably be effective."

REPORTED PRIVILEGES FOR RUSSO-JEWISH SOLDIERS.

A report is current that the Ministry of the Interior is drafting a bill exempting all Jewish soldiers engaged in the present war from all anti-Jewish restrictions in force in Russia.

The military organ, the Russky Invalid, in commenting on the emancipation rumors, stated that the heroism, loyalty and generosity of the Jews have created a good impression. It, however, advised the Duma not to hurry on with any measures of emancipation of the Jews, but to consider them carefully, as any attempt to force such bills through the House would prejudice the nation against them.

IRON CROSSES FOR JEWS.

The well-known Jewish writer and economist, Dr. Felix Theilhaber, of Munich, was awarded the iron cross. Sally Goldschmidt, of Idastein, received the iron cross personally from the Kaiser. The following Jews of Koenigsberg have received the iron cross: Dr. S. Rosenbaum, Dr. W. Benningsohn, Dr. Harry Moses, Adolf Neumann, Alfred Arnstdorff and Prof. Theodore Cohn.

JEWS AT LVOV STARVING.

The latest report received from Lvov (Lemberg) states that many Jews there are literally starving. The poor have hardly any clothes to wear, and wander about the streets asking for bread. Many Jews have lost their reason.

Thoughts and Tidings---A Review of Passing Events

By H. Eliassof

War and Culture.

The present European war is surely the most perplexing one of all the wars of history. Before and during its sudden precipitation, during the period of mobilizations, war-declarations and the rushing of huge armies across the different borders no positive reason for the war was known. As the war progressed and the most cruel and atrocious tactics developed on all sides, the belligerent nations began to advance cultural reasons for the conflict. Each involved nation now claims to fight for the greatest culture of the world. In other words, each nation is fighting for its own culture, which it proclaims to be the culture of the greatest benefit to the world. In this way each fighting nation seeks to justify its course with an ethical, or cultural motive. The combat with sword, gun and cannon is being supplemented by a conflict with ink, pen and paper. The printing press has become almost as much a weapon for attack and counter attack as the monster Krupp cannons or the huge guns of the English dreadnaughts. To the war between the German Pickelhaube, the French red breeches, the English Tommy Atkins and the Russian Cossack is added a war of rhetoric by the professors and scholars, the poets and novelists of the different nations now engaged in war. Each one of these famous men argues eloquently and tries his utmost to prove that his own particular nation possesses the real culture, which is far superior to the culture of the enemy, and that this superior culture justifies the fight for its own perpetuation in the world.

It is this very attempt to advance cultural reasons for a war of aggression that lends a most perplexing aspect to this European war. In the first place, we all know that the influence of real culture never will justify an aggressive war. Are not the main functions of real culture to guard the moral life of the state, to teach the people to place the social life higher than the political life, and to restrain the rulers of the state from rushing into an aggressive conflict with other states? To give cultural reasons for war is, therefore, an obvious untruth, and when thinkers and learned men, the very leaders and teachers of civilization and culture undertake to justify the war with cultural reasons the temptation becomes great to say of all the belligerent nations what Bernhard Shaw says about the English nation. In his "Common Sense About the War," this great English thinker openly accuses the English government of hypocrisy in pretending that it acted from chivalrous motives and for cultural reasons.

The warring nations of antiquity were at least no hypocrites in their wars of aggression. They never tried to cover their unrestrained lust for conquest by the cloak of culture as an excuse for pillage and loot. They went to war against neighboring nations for the open purpose of grabbing more land by which to expand their own territory, and they made no secret of it. Alexander the Great openly expressed his fear that the many great victories of his father, Philip II of Macedonia, would leave no more countries to conquer. Culture will never justify war because war and culture are two diverging forces tending in diametrically opposite directions. War is a power of destruction and culture is a force of construction. The strongest impulses of war are for immorality, hate and cruelty, and the most vital inspirations of culture are for morality, love and mercy. War is an infliction and culture is a benediction. A culture that countenances and justifies war permits a poisonous snake to nestle in its bosom which is sure to strike it with its venomous fangs and cause it to perish. Directly war has always done more harm than good to humanity. For the few benefits which it may have indirectly given to the world, it made the world pay much too high a price. It exacted a fearful toll for it in the loss of human life, in the retrogression, decadence and degeneracy of the fighting masses and in the terrible misery and suffering of their dependents.

I know that there are enthusiastic defenders of war who claim that humanity is deeply indebted to the wars of history for the civilization of the world. These ambiguous reasoners point to the great modern cities and to the glorious temples of art, science and religion which the hands of modern man have reared in the world and declare that all these have risen upon the ruins which the great wars of the past have left in their wake. These old ruins, they claim, formed the foundations for many of the splendid new edifices of our times, and so by its destructive work war was beneficial to humanity. Such arguments are indeed mere sophistry. We might as well say that tremendous earthquakes are now of benefit to the civilization of humanity because in remote ages these upheavals of nature cleaved some of the gigantic glaciers of northern regions, carried their parts southward where the sun heat melted them and sent their molten substance from the higher altitudes to mingle with the waters of the ocean. It is true that by this process nature makes waste and frozen stretches of land inhabitable for man, where he gradually develops a civilization. But no man of rational mind will give credit to the upheavals of long ago for the civilization of later ages. The credit is surely not due to the upheavals but to the conditions of life which man gradually creates for himself during long years of observation and experience. Earthquakes in a city teeming with population are always fearful calamities and man finds only detriment and no benefit whatever in their visitations. War is even a greater calamity than these unavoidable catastrophies of nature. These destroy physical life and property only, they spare the souls of the survivors, while in addition to its ruination of physical life and property, war also injures the soul-life of those who escape its fearful ravages, for war destroys also the most vital force of civilization, its moral influence. War has indeed wrought numberless ruins but it never created civilization. It was peace and not war that has given man the golden opportunity and has made it possible for him to develop cultural conditions. If war has ever succeeded in bringing favorable conditions for the development of civilization, it soon swept them from the face of the earth by burying them under new ruins. Culture never did build cities and temples upon war ruins, on the contrary, it had to remove and clear away those ruins of olden times to level and make smooth the building places and to make them ready for man to lay new foundations for the edifices of peace and progress.

Of all the cultures of antiquity which made a deep impression upon the modern cultures there are only three, the Hebrew, the Greek, and the Roman. Each of the three prominent cultures of today, the Teutonic, the Celtic, and the Slavic has been influenced by these three ancient cultures. The Hebrew culture at one time wielded the strongest influence upon the so-called Christian civilization to which all the cultures of the belligerent nations belong. But with the growth of the power of the Christian church the Christian nations gradually drifted away from the influence of the monotheistic and spiritual Hebraic culture and held fast to the impressions of the Greek and Roman cultures with all their gross anthropomorphic conceptions. The Greek and Roman cultures perished because they countenanced and justified war. The Hebraic culture alone survived because it teaches peace and not war. The Mosaic dispensation contains the law of lo tirtsoch, thou shalt not kill; it also emphasizes the brotherhood of man, for it prohibits hate. Lo sisno es ochicho bilvovecho, thou shalt not hate thy brother in thy heart, is a strict command in the Torah. The claim of each belligerent nation that the war it is carrying on is justified by its own culture only demonstrates the fact that neither one of them possesses the real culture. The fact that neither one of their cultures wielded enough influence to restrain the ruler of the State from rushing into an aggressive war only proves that all their cultures are absolute failures. The signs of their dismal failures were not wanting even long before the war. Let us quote some of the significant words of Professors Guglielmo Ferrero, the distinguished historian, author of "The Greatness and Decline of Rome," regarding the Western culture: "What is this progress, the mystic word that rules us? Everybody speaks of it and nobody knows with precision what it is. It is a most bizarre thing that in this century of progress everybody complains of the decadence of everything. Workmen, employes, soldiers, students, children, fathers, mothers, servants—especially servants—are not as good, we are told, as those of other days. Good cooking is disappearing at the same time as good literature, good furniture, fine arts and good manners, and so on. How is it then, that so many things are deteriorating in the century of progress? Are we really progressing or are we not? Is the progress of which we are so proud, to which we sacrifice every day our rest, our tranquility, sometimes even our lives, only an illusion?"

Such were the symptoms which enabled this skillful specialist to make his diagnosis more than a year before the present world war. He pointed out the moral, political and economic disorders which have developed in the cultural fabric of old Europe and suggested remedies for them. But no heed was given to the prescriptions of this well-meaning expert and the European nations rushed their cultures to their doom. The end came when all the great powers leaped heedlessly into the yawning abyss of cruel war. All the European cultures are now dead. They were buried in the bloody trenches, in the ruins of Belgium and in the devastated cities and grain fields from which the best workers, the young and the strong men were dragged and driven to cut each others throats.

The European world is now bereft of all civilizing and cultural influences. Christian civilization is a pitiable failure. Teutonic and Celtic cultures have both been crushed and annihilated by the mailed fist of militarism and war madness. And what can be said of the Slavic culture, of which the Czar of Russia wishes to be the principal prophet, exponent and interpreter? Alas, the world knows that it has always been an empty sound and a dark shadow on the horizon of human liberty. The only living real culture now remaining in Europe is the Hebrew culture, and it seems that the European nations will all have to adopt this culture after the war is over. And why not? The Hebrew culture is distinguished by a vitality which is the very glow of life. Oldest in years the Jewish culture remains the youngest in its spiritual force, in its ethical vigor and its moral influence. The Hebrew prophets once dreamed of the golden age of everlasting peace. They painted the bliss and happiness of that golden age in the richest tints of the heavens, in the glowing colors of sunlight and starlight, and with the deepest feelings of heart joy and soul inspiration. The Hebrew culture, which for ever remains a culture of peace, is alone able to accomplish the full realization of these sweet prophetic dreams. Let the nations adopt the Hebrew culture and the steady progress of humanity towards the goal of universal brotherhood will be assured and then the world will know war no more.

State and Morality.

To modern man the State is no longer a divine institution. To us it is nothing but a human organization created for the purpose of securing law and order. It has also the duty to work for the highest development of the social and moral life as well as for the best sanitary conditions. In its true analysis the State is nothing more than a collective body founded by individuals who form a community of interests. Each individual member of the State who wishes to have his life and his labor, his health and his possessions protected against encroachment and injury by other individuals or other collective bodies, must not hinder the State in the exercise of its functions and must abide by its rules and regulations. When speaking of the State the individual must therefore never be lost sight of. The State belongs to the individual as much as the individual belongs to the State. Consequently the same moral code of ethics, the same fundamental moral principles and the same ideals of life which the teachers of religion and morality recommend to the individual as the proper guides through life, such as truth and righteousness, justice and mercy, forbearance and toleration, must also be adhered to by the State. It is as dangerous for the State to discard any of these moral principles as it is for the individual to swerve from the straight path of moral duty and to enter the crooked road of iniquity.

The greatest trouble with the European States is that they have completely repudiated the moral code of the individual and have adopted a so-called moral system of their own. They substituted diplomacy for truth, might for right, hate for justice, power for prudence and force for forbearance. Darwin was no benefactor of humanity when he taught the world the doctrine of the survival of the fittest. The English State which has adopted this merciless Darwinian theory as its main political principle will no doubt have to pay dearly for it some day. The English State has chosen to look upon itself as the fittest of all other States to master the commerce of the world. This commercial greed induced it to join hands with the Japanese, the children of an Asiatic race, and to overlook the fact that it thereby exposes the civilizations of Europe and America to the aggression of the newly-awakened spirit of the Asiatic races, which is bitterly antagonistic to all Occidental interests.

Treistschke, who taught the German State the lesson that the purposes of the State is power and that nothing can be more moral than this purpose, also inculcated into the German mind, the doctrine of anti-Semitism, which is a tenet of national and race hatred of the Jew, and now Germany herself is reaping the whirlwind harvest of national and racial hatred. It is now the most hated State in all Europe.

The true moral equilibrium of the State is the only safeguard of its strength, and the only pivot of its peace and prosperity. Without the restraint of the true moral influence it must, sooner or later, fail and fall.

THE B'NAI B'RITH'S OPPORTUNITY.

you clean, remove these evils from before my eyes. Learn to do well, plead for the widow, help the fatherless, seek justice." If you suffer for this, you suffer as suffered the prophets. If you ignore this, you will suffer anyhow, men and women of Israel, and it is better to suffer in a great cause and to have evil names hurled at you, knowing that you are prophets of a great movement, than that you should be made to suffer the unutterable disdain and the unspeakable contempt which is now the fate of so many of our brethren. It is better to suffer in the cause of truth than to live even in comfort surrounded by conditions now prevailing. Up and do your duty! Seize your opportunity! Strike for the right! Let who will hate; when one does that which is right, the smile of God's approval outweighs the frown of man's hate!

THE KEHILLAH.

owitz, who occupied the rabbinical see of Nikolsburg, 1773-1778. He had come from Poland, and introduced the Cabalistic practices, which were not congenial to the plain Jew of Moravia. Therefore he established a synagogue of his own, adjoining his house. The synagogue was endowed, a number of people receiving a stipend for regular attendance. The intention may have been to give in this way support to some poor scholars. In my time there may have been only two or three such, while the others were simply poor devils, mostly the "Traegler," poor fellows doing odd jobs, carrying burdens or going on errands. For a short time after my arrival some members of the opposition, who objected to closing the old synagogues, started another one, but it did not last. The other abandoned synagogue presented the sad sight of decaying glory. Some of them were undoubtedly founded by pious Jews in olden times, who thus wished to immortalize their names, as the Reb Guttmann Schul, others were probably a meeting place of the guilds existing in the ghetto, as the "Schuster Schul" and the "Kazowim" (butchers) schul. One may have served the aristocrats expelled from Vienna in 1670; it was called "Die Wiener Schul." When I visited Nikolsburg for the first time in 1868, the attendance at services on Saturday was general. Nobody missed it, unless prevented by illness. On week days, however, when most of the men were out of town, the smaller synagogues had their difficulty in finding the necessary Minyan. Twenty years ago, when I visited the old Jewish metropolis for the last time, the number of synagogues was reduced to two, the Altschul and the Neuschul, the latter only maintained for the benefit of the old Dajan, Joseph Knoepfmacher, who died in 1909, at the age of ninety-four. He was the last remnant of the old glory. At present, owing to the thousands of Galician refugees, Nikolsburg for the first time in sixty-six years may suffer from insufficient synagogue accommodation.

B'NAI B'RITH DAY CELEBRATIONS

CHICAGO, ILL.

Under the auspices of the Central B'nai B'rith Council representing the Chicago lodges, B'nai B'rith Day was celebrated at the Hotel La Salle on Saturday evening, December 26, 1914.

The celebration consisted of a banquet, at which more than seven hundred members of the Order and their ladies participated and during which addresses were delivered by U. S. Senator Lawrence Y. Sherman of Illinois on the subject, "The Commonplace and the Abnormal," and by Dr. Schmarja Levin of Berlin, who spoke on the subject, "The Promised Land in Our Recent History." Both addresses were received with much enthusiasm.

At the banquet, in addition to the President of the Order, Brother Adolf Kraus, the officers of District Grand Lodge No. 6 and the members of the General Committee were in attendance, including many out-of-town guests. Among them Messrs. Pevsner of Palestine and Strauss of Munich, Germany.

The banquet was followed by a class initiation, at which 110 candidates, mostly young men and recruited from professional ranks, was initiated by the degree team of the Council, composed of Brothers A. B. Seelenfreund, Edward Sonnenschein, Adolph D. Weiner and Hugo Sonnenschein.

The celebration was brought to a close with a ball, lasting until the early hours of the morning.

Mr. F. Feinberg, President of the Lodge, introduced the speaker of the evening, Mr. B. P. Brasely of Pittsburgh, who in an eloquent address, touched on the work of the Order in the present crisis caused by the war abroad; also the beneficent work it is doing in this country, referring especially to the Anti-Defamation League.

The meeting was brought to a close with prayers by the past President, S. D. Goodman of Fairmont, W. Va.

HOUSTON, TEXAS.

The annual celebration of B'nai B'rith Day by the Lodges of Houston, Texas, took place on Sunday evening, December 27, in the banquet hall of the City Auditorium. The meeting was presided over by Mr. Maurice Hirsch, who spoke in brief of the ideals of B'nai B'rithism and its many monuments, as evidenced by the different institutions which it has erected for the alleviation of human suffering.

A short program was arranged prior to the address of the evening, which consisted of two vocal solos by Miss Lena Mendelsohn. This number was followed by a piano solo by Miss Lois David. This program was followed by the speaker of the evening, Rabbi Leon Vollmer, of New Orleans.

Dr. Vollmer has been connected with the Orphans' Home at New Orleans for three years, and has built this institution up to a status of the highest efficiency. He is held in high esteem by the entire Jewish community of New Orleans as well as his many friends throughout the district, and is dearly loved by the many children of the institution, who look upon this big man as a father. An unusually large audience had the pleasure of hearing Dr. Vollmer on this occasion and his address was a rare treat. He drew a lurid picture of B'nai B'rithism, its ideals, its purposes, and its many achievements, and his address inspired pride in the local members in their participation in helping to bring about the great good that is being accomplished. He further demonstrated the close relationship between the Synagogue and the B'nai B'rith lodges, and told his interested listeners how B'nai B'rith is at all times the protagonist of Jewish rights. Dr. Vollmer's address was masterful and intensely interesting, and was thoroughly enjoyed by all. He has left a message which should and will result in communal good and inspire local Jewry to further action.

After adjournment a banquet was held at the Rice Hotel in honor of Dr. Vollmer. Before adjournment many interesting talks were made by those present. Mr. E. Goldberg acted as chairman. Short talks were also made by C. Mendelsohn, S. J. Westheimer, Arthur Lyons, M. P. Ostrow, John Mendlovitz of Bryan, B. Littovich, Maurice Hirsch, Sol Shoeneman and Dr. W. Wittner. One of the most interesting talks of the evening was made by Dr. Vollmer just before adjournment, everyone having spent a most delightful evening.

HOMESTEAD, PA.

Homestead Lodge No. 586 observed B'nai B'rith Day, November 27, in the beautiful new Synagogue recently erected. Brother A. C. Stein, and Rabbi Neches of B'nai Israel congregation of Pittsburgh, delivering timely discourses. The speakers dwelt upon the necessity of being UNITED, and informed the very large audience that the mission of this Order is "TO UNITE ISRAELITES," explaining that the Synagogue expounds our religion, whereas the B'nai B'rith carries out the teachings of Judaism; that the Synagogues differing in forms of worship, cannot bring about an unification of our people, while the B'nai B'rith, inviting all Jews, regardless of this or their nativity, is the only means of uniting for the common welfare .

Many current concrete occurrences were referred to that verified the necessity of every Jew affiliating with the only altruistic organization ever brought into existence. This occasion was one that will remain firm in the memory of all who had the privilege of being present, evidencing the wisdom of creating "B'nai B'rith Day."

GADSDEN, ALA.

Coosa Lodge No. 734 of Gadsden, Ala., celebrated B'nai B'rith Day at the Temple on Sunday evening, December 20, 1914, which was largely attended by the Jewish public. The program was a delightful one and included addresses by Rabbi Miller of Chattanooga and Judge John H. Disque of Gadsden. A special musical program was a delightful feature of the occasion.

Mr. J. Nadler presided over the services and introduced the speakers.

Rabbi Miller, in his address, made a plea for universal peace. He deplored the war in Europe and admonished his people not to show partiality toward one nation or the other engaged in the war. He declared that there is a great army in America fighting not to destroy life but to prolong it and to relieve suffering and he referred to the work of the B'nai B'rith in this direction.

Judge Disque, in his address, complimented the Jewish people. He said that while he is a gentile, he recognizes the covenant between God and Abraham as the greatest contract ever consummated on earth. He declared that it was due to this covenant that our present high state of civilization is enjoyed and he gave the Jewish people the credit for having maintained it down through the ages. He also paid a tribute to the Jews for having kept themselves racially pure and for their advancement in every direction. He deplored the depression that has been laid upon them, but said they are gaining power and influence.

Judge Disque said that in his study of the B'nai B'rith he had found that it is doing more than any other organization for the relief of those who are in want.

ST. LOUIS, MO.

A joint celebration of B'nai B'rith Day was held by Missouri Lodge No. 22 and Ebn Ezra Lodge No. 47 of St. Louis at the Temple Israel on Sunday evening, December 27, 1914. Rabbi Morris M. MONTEFIORE LODGE, BUFFALO, N. Y.

Montefiore Lodge, No. 70, of Buffalo, N. Y., held an old-fashioned smoker recently, at which there were present a very large gathering of members. An interesting feature of the evening was the various talks given by some of the members stating their experiences while in the war-ridden countries of Europe. A sumptuous banquet was served after the smoker.

The lodge is inaugurating a membership campaign and in the very near future they anticipate an increase of from seventy-five to one hundred members. This lodge has during the year increased its membership by over 50 per cent.

MACCABEE LODGE, NEW YORK.

At the meeting held on Tuesday evening, December 1st, Brother Ralph K. Guinzburg delivered a lecture on Palestine, and the work of the various Jewish colonizing societies in the Holy Land. Brother Guinzburg recently returned from Palestine and recounted a number of his experiences while traveling in the Orient.

The Ladies' Auxiliary Society, known as the "Daughters of the B'nai B'rith," recently elected its officers and, with the lodge, will have a joint installation of officers on January 19th, 1915. It was also decided to hold a bazaar in February for the benefit of the B'nai B'rith fund for the war sufferers in Europe.

SPOKANE, WASH.

Abraham Geiger Lodge, No. 423, of Spokane, Wash., held a well-attended meeting on December 17, 1914, at which the lodge resolved to forward $500 collected for the fund of the war sufferers to the Executive Committee. Election of officers was the special order of business, as well as of delegates to the convention of the District Grand Lodge.

The Ida Bloom Strauss Auxiliary of Abraham Geiger Lodge meets at the same time in an adjoining hall. Appropriation for the war fund was also made by the auxiliary. After the regular order of business was disposed of by both organizations, they joined forces and finished the evening with an entertainment and card party, and concluded with a dance, during which refreshments were served by the ladies.

RAINIER LODGE NO. 627, SEATTLE, WASH.

By Max A. Silver.

Rainier Lodge has just closed the most successful year of its history. We have had a year of work. We have had a glorious year. As members of this Lodge, we take pride in it. I feel I am doing no injustice, however, to the capable and faithful gentlemen who served in administrative capacities, when I say that it is not alone to the officers, nor to the trustees, nor to the committees that credit should be given for the splendid accomplishments of the year, but to them all, and to the membership at large included with them. There never was an opportunity for work but that brothers were there ready to do it; there never was a call for co-operation but that it was answered ten-fold. With such unity and harmony prevalent, our efforts inevitably resulted in a remarkable success. I wish time and space were granted to report to you in detail the message of the President of this Lodge for the year. I am sure it is a record that would serve as an inspiration to many other lodges throughout the country.

I will give you a few facts from it. For the rest I refer you to the December issue of our lodge organ, "Shmoos," which can be had by applying to our Secretary, Mr. Myer Cohen, 924 Pine street.

"Rainier Lodge has taken a keen interest in substantially helping several institutions and enterprises apart from its local interests, such as the Utah Immigration Colony, Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital, and Relief Fund for War Sufferers."

"Rainier Lodge recently took the initiative in organizing a movement for the practical assisting of Jewish inmates in state and federal institutions."

"The activities of this lodge in connection with the suppression and elimination of moving pictures in which the Jew is characterized in an objectionable and offensive way has been specially commended by the Anti-Defamation League."

"A large voluntary donation was subscribed toward the splendid work of the Settlement House."

"Rainier Lodge has given practical demonstration of its interest in religious matters through lodge attendance at Temple services and participation in Joint Memorial Services."

"In a social way, Rainier Lodge has been very active in bringing its members into closer social contact than ever before through various social affairs."

"The intellectual side of our work was given splendid recognition and our lodge talent was splendidly brought into action through a number of interesting debates, readings, discussions and addresses of a most instructive character."

"Rainier Lodge took prominent part in the installation of four new B'nai B'rith lodges."

So Rainier Lodge has indeed passed what can be considered its most successful year in point of practical, effective and constructive work. Rainier Lodge owes a debt of gratitude to the retiring President Schoenfeld, for the very able manner in which he acted as the executive officer of the lodge. Hampered by exceptionally large business responsibilities which seemed to force all the attention that one man could give into other directions, he has, through the three years as president, given in a bountiful measure of his time and business acumen to the various questions of the lodge, with the happy result, as he says, "of having witnessed the unfolding and development of my fondest hopes, my greatest B'nai B'rith ambition—that of Rainier Lodge coming into its rightful place and position as an agency for inestimable good for Jewry."

It is gratifying to know that President Schoenfeld's successor, Vice-President Irving C. Lewis, is a man of broad and varied experience, and that he is entirely familiar with the principles and purposes to which this lodge is committed. During Brother Lewis' three years' service as Vice-President he has made a fine record and he will come to his new duties fully equipped for carrying on the work of the Lodge and Order. We are confident that under his guidance there will be a continuance of the excellent work done by this organization.

Another nomination which virtually means "election" was that of Secretary Myer Cohen to succeed himself. Never was a declaration better sustained than this. A unanimous renomination was a compliment that he amply merited. We may congratulate ourselves on securing a continuance of his services in this capacity.

What Our Lodges Are Doing

SPRINGFIELD LODGE, SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

Springfield Lodge No. 684 enters upon another year of activity and usefulness under the direction of a group of officers well up to the standard of the past, and with a large and enthusiastic membership.

The installation of the newly elected officers will take place some time this month, and under the direction of Henry Lasker, Past President, and District Deputy. District Deputy Lasker is arranging a program of speaking and entertainment which is sure to surpass those of previous years.

On January 6 the members of the Degree Club met and elected the officers for the coming year.

The Degree Club members will make merry at their annual banquet in the Highland Hotel on the 24th of this month. Last year's banquet was a "howling success" and everyone expects this year's gathering will be just as successful. The Degree Club has grown and flourished during the past year and is now firmly established as an important auxiliary to the social and intellectual forces which characterize the work of Springfield Lodge.

The degree team of the Lodge has already won renown throughout District No. 1 and has been invited to exemplify the degree work at the Worcester convention. Last month the members of the team showed the lodges of Greater New York the caliber of their work, and favorable comments were heard on all sides. Twenty members of the team made the trip to New York at the urgent request of the New York lodges, which had been much impressed with the work of the team at the last District No. 1 convention held in the Springfield Municipal Auditorium.

During the year just past Springfield Lodge has proven itself a factor of no small importance in the community in furthering Jewish interests. At the present time a substantial sum is being raised to provide a fund for the benefit of the European Jews, who are suffering so greatly as a result of the European war.

Last year, largely through the efforts of the lodge, the public school authorities were induced to withdraw a somewhat strenuous objection to the absence of Jewish children from public school sessions on Jewish holidays. By a tactful and judicious handling of the situation the lodge managed to gain a complete victory without creating the least bit of ill feeling among the school authorities.

Late in December the lodge was instrumental in promoting the cause of Zionism by means of a monster mass meeting, at which Louis D. Brandeis and Schmarya Levine were the principal speakers, and at which a considerable sum of money was raised for the cause to help the suffering Jews in Palestine, more than $1,000 being collected.

Springfield Lodge was also represented on a special commission which has just finished deliberating on a new charter for the city of Springfield.

The officers and members of the lodge, with a record of fine achievement behind them, are looking forward to the coming year with every confidence that the prestige of Springfield Lodge will not be in the least diminished, and that the lodge will prove to be a greater factor than ever in promoting Judaism and Jewish ideals in Springfield and the nearby towns.

MEMPHIS, TENN.

Memphis Lodge, No. 35, held its regular meeting on Sunday morning, December 13th, 1914, at the Y. M. H. A. Many matters of vital importance were brought up and acted upon at this meeting.

Nominations for officers for the ensuing term was held.

A committee was appointed to arrange for the annual observance of B'nai B'rith Day.

Among other important matters which were acted upon was the introduction of a resolution asking the grand lodge officers of this district and other districts of the I. O. B. B. to eliminate their grand lodge conventions this year, and to use the money thus saved toward the alleviation of the war sufferers in Europe. The resolution met a unanimous approval of the members, and was adopted.

OFFICIAL VISITS OF PRESIDENT SCHNEIDER.

Mr. Morris N. Schneider of Oakland, Cal., president of District Grand Lodge, No. 4, accompanied by members of the General Committee and the Grand Orator, Rabbi Friedlander, will pay an official visit to the San Francisco and Oakland lodges as follows:

Monday evening, January 25th, he will meet all the San Francisco lodges in joint session in the assembly hall, B'nai B'rith building, where the principal address will be delivered by Rabbi Friedlander. Other members of the General Committee will speak as well.

Tuesday evening, January 26th, the president and General Committee will visit his home lodge, Oakland No. 252, and a special committee has already been appointed to make the necessary arrangements for a successful evening and a large attendance.

JOINT INITIATION BY THE LODGES OF NEW YORK.

A joint meeting of the B'nai B'rith lodges in the metropolitan district was held at Carlton Hall, New York City, Sunday evening, December 13th. The occasion that drew the lodges together was the Chanukah festival and the exemplification of the ceremony of initiation as conducted by the degree team of Springfield Lodge, No. 684, of Springfield, Mass.

Despite the inclement weather, there was not an empty seat to be found in the hall. The programme was opened by the lighting of the Menorah by Rev. Nathan Schlager, cantor of Temple Emanu-El. Then Rev. Samuel Abrahamson of the People's Synagogue sang "Jerusalem," the rendition of which was followed by all the lodges singing "Mo-os Zur."

The auditorium was then made ready for the Springfield Degree Team. Forty-two new candidates presented themselves for initiation. The team, which is doubtless the champion one of the United States, conducted the ceremonies in a most impressive manner. Never have the New York lodges beheld the ritual exemplified in a way that was so stirring to the Jweish heart. The team, which consisted of twenty-six members, under the presidency of Frederick Rabinovitz, has been in training for many months.

After the initiation was over, addresses were delivered by Dr. Joseph Silverman, president of District No. 1, and by Judge Louis D. Gibbs. A collation was then served. The celebration was held under the auspices of the Intellectual Advancement Committee, led primarily by Mr. I. Irving Lipsitch and Dr. M. M. Stark.

CHANUKAH ENTERTAINMENT IN GREEN BAY.

The children attending the Hebrew school of Green Bay, Wis., gave an entertainment on Sunday evening, December 20, 1914, at the synagogue. An historical sketch was presented of Hannah and her seven sons by the children of the school. Rabbi Daskal, who has recently been chosen rabbi of Green Bay, delivered a talk on Chanukah and its significance. Short talks were also delivered by Brothers Abrams and Roseman, members of the lodge.

VANCOUVER, B. C.

On Sunday, December 20, 1914, Samuel Lodge, No. 668, of Vancouver, B. C., jointly with Samuel Auxiliary, held a public installation of officers. District Deputy, Brother J. Lancaster, conducted the installation services of both organizations. Miss Bessie Grossman acted as mistress of ceremonies. After the installation a group photo was taken of the officers of both organizations. Following the ceremonies a dance was held. An elaborate midnight luncheon was served. The entire entertainmnt was well arranged, was largely attended and all agreed that it was the best affair the Jewish community of Vancouver ever had.

Samuel Lodge is growing by leaps and bounds, and the formation of a ladies' auxiliary marks a new era in the work of the lodge in getting the women interested in the principles of the order

INSTITUTION OF NEW LODGE AT NEW KENSINGTON, PA.

On December 6, 1914, New Kensington Lodge, No. 762, was instituted at New Kensington, Pa. A large number of the members of the order from Pittsburgh proceeded by special car to attend the ceremonies. Upon arrival at New Kensington they were met by a committee from the new lodge and escorted to the hall, where the public meeting was to take place. Past Grand President, Brother A. L. Solomon of Pittsburgh, presided at the meeting, and addresses were delivered by Brothers L. S. Levin and Charles H. Joseph. Both of the speakers dwelt upon the mission of the order.

Immediately after the public meeting, Mr. Abe Weil of Philadelphia, president of District Grand Lodge, No. 3, took charge of the gathering and officiated at the institution of the new lodge. A class of forty candidates was initiated, and this was followed by the election and installation of the officers. Then followed addresses by Brother Louis Sulzbacher of Braddock, secretary of the district; Brothers I. Reicenstein, H. Simon and other visiting members.

The committee responsible for the organization of the new lodge is satisfied that New Kensington Lodge will add to the strength of the district.

PUBLIC INSTALLATION BY ABR. LIPPMAN LODGE, PITTSBURGH.

A notable event in B'nai B'rith circles in Pittsburgh will be staged on January 13, 1915, on the occasion of the installation of the officers of Abr. Lippman Lodge, No. 672. Arrangements have been made for the presence of Brother Abe Weil of Philadelphia, the president of the district, and Past President, Brother Isador Sobel of Erie, Pa., president of the Erie Orphanage and Home for Friendless Children, who will be in charge of the ceremonies. In addition to the foregoing many of the Grand Lodge officers, including Louis Sulzbacher of Braddock, secretary of the district; Brothers Marcus Feuchtwanger of New Castle, and F. R. S. Kaplan, A. Edlis and Brother L. Stein of Wheeling, W. Va., members of the General Committee, will attend.

A special musical program has been arranged for the evening, and invitation has been extended to the lodges of Allegheny County and their ladies Auxiliaries to be present. Refreshments will be served at the close of the program.

VICTORIA, B. C.

A very enjoyable dance to commemorate the festival of Chanukah was held under the auspices of the Ladies' Auxiliary of Victoria Lodge, No. 758, at the Odd Fellows' Hall, Victoria, B. C., on the evening of December 16, 1914. The occasion drew one of the largest gatherings of the local Jewry of the season.

At the regular election of Victoria Lodge, held on December 15, 1914, the officers for the year were elected, as well as delegates to represent the lodge at the coming convention of the district to be held in San Francisco on February 21, 1915. The election was interesting and a very keen interest was displayed by the members.

The Ladies' Auxiliary of Victoria Lodge held its annual election of officers on Monday, December 21, 1914.

BELLINGHAM, WASH.

The annual meeting of Bellingham Lodge, No. 756, of Bellingham, Wash., was held on Sunday, December 20, 1914. The special order of business was the election of officers for the ensuing year.

Great enthusiasm exists in the lodge at the present time. At the meeting a class of ten candidates was initiated and several more are on the list.

A committee was appointed to take care of the installation ceremonies, which will take place in January. It is expected that a great many visiting brethren from surrounding cities will attend the occasion, which will assume the form of an open public installation, at the close of which an entertainment will be held and refreshments will be served.

C. YOUNG.

JULIUS HOUSEMAN LODGE, GRAND RAPIDS, MICH.

On the eve of the New Year, Julius Houseman Lodge No. 238 placed a fitting climax on a year of achieveemnt by presenting to the general public, under the auspices of the Intellectual Advancement Committee, a very remarkable stereopticon lecture by Rabbi Max J. Merritt of Evansville, Ind.

The subject was "Through the Desert of Sinai," and the lecturer took the audience, not only through every phase of his journey, but also into many personal phases of the home life and habits of the Bedouins. His slides were made from photographs which he procured himself and this, added to his natural charm of manner and presentation, made the lecture of sparkling interest to the large audience which attended.

The affair was a pronounced success from every viewpoint, and is in line with the express policy of the Lodge to produce the best for the benefit of its members.

On that occasion the lodge intends to officially launch a new movement, called the "Canadian Jewish Immigration League," the purpose of which will be to safeguard the interest of the Jewish people in Canada with reference to immigration; to prevent the enacting of restrictive legislation.

What Our Lodges Are Doing

ACTIVITY OF RAINIER LODGE.

The members of Rainier Lodge, No. 627, of Seattle, Wash., have organized the Seattle Jewish Relief Committee, which will contribute monthly toward a war relief fund.

Two of the most interesting talks the members of Rainier Lodge have had the pleasure of hearing were given at the November 30th meeting. Brother Harry Sigmund addressed the lodge on "The Development of Judaism in Spain," and Brother Simon Wiener gave an interesting account of "The Objects and Aims of the Menorah Movement."

THE B'NAI B'RITH BUILDING OF PORTLAND, ORE.

The new B'nai B'rith building is proving its value as a Jewish social center, particularly for the Jewish young people of Portland. The membership enrollment (already large) is constantly increasing, a fact which demonstrates what a longfelt want an institution of this kind has been in this city.

The gymnasium, handball courts, swimming tank and billiard rooms are being well patronized during the hours scheduled for their use. Though handicapped by the lack of apparatus which is now on the way to Portland from the Spaulding factory, gymnasium classes are being conducted by Mr. Smith, formerly of the Y. M. C. A., and whatever apparatus has already been delivered is being utilitzed. When the apparatus and steel lockers are finally installed, the gym. will be as well equipped as any gymnasium in Portland.

Boxing, wrestling and swimming are being taught by David Cohn, a recent graduate of Ann Arbor, Mich., Law School, where he established a record for himself in those events.

The following schedule of classes has been arranged:

Seniors — Classes: Monday and Thursday, 8:15 to 9:30 p. m.

Juniors and Juveniles—Classes: Monday and Friday, 4 to 5:30 p. m.

Young Ladies (who are unable to attend day classes)—Tuesday, 8 p. m. This class may have Saturday evening also if they desire.

Women's Class—Tuesday and Thursday, 2:30 p. m.

Wednesday and Saturday evenings have been left open for games, team practice and individual work.

Morning classes for women will be formed upon request. The association will also extend morning swimming privileges to women.

The furnishing of the lodge rooms is now nearing completion.

TOLEDO, OHIO.

Toledo Lodge, No. 183, I. O. B. B., held its annual dinner at the Progress Club Sunday evening, December 27th. A special meeting of the lodge preceded the dinner, at which thirty-five candidates were initiated. The dinner was served in the ballroom of the club promptly at 8 o'clock. Plates were laid for 200, with every place taken.

First Vice-President S. J. Kornhouser of Cleveland was the honored guest and speaker of the evening.

President I. Silverman introduced Brother J. H. Jacobson as toastmaster, and called upon Vice-President Kornhouser, who delivered a very interesting address on "What We Have Done in the Past and Our Responsibilities in the Future." Rabbi David Alexander spoke on "Efficiency" in the work of the lodge. Aaron Cohn on the work of the Y. M. H. A., Alfred Bellstein "Good Fellowship," Samuel Messing on "Attendance at Lodge, Boost and Work."

The surprise of the evening was the address of Brother C. K. Friedman, president of the Federation of Jewish Charities. His subject was "Charity," and in his remarks stated that "On account of industrial conditions the federation will be short over a thousand dollars to meet the needs of relief," and concluded by stating that it would crown the evening festivities if those present would donate several hundred dollars to help the federation raise the additional amount needed, and in less than ten minutes exactly $325 was collected and placed in front of the earnest president of the federation.

Toledo Lodge has made a gain of seventy-four members this year, and has a total membership of 372, with thirty-three applications on file for the next class initiation, which will take place on January 12th, on the night of the installation of the newly elected officers.

EDMONTON, CANADA.

For the second time within a short period Edmonton Lodge, No. 732, has lost the active services of one of its best and most highly esteemed members. First, it was Brother H. A. Roth, now a resident of Chicago, and this time it is Brother Charles Horwitz, president of our lodge, who, after two and a half years' residence in this city, has, for the time being at least, returned to his old home, Winnipeg.

In his departure our lodge looses not only a good president, but a member who always gave it his very best, and one who at no time spared either time or expense to make the lodge a success. To him belongs the honor of having been one of the first to realize the necessity and possibility of organizing a B'nai B'rith lodge here, and it was with untiring efforts he set to work to do so, with the result that a lodge was instituted before many months of his residence here. The rapid growth of the lodge was to no small extent due to his earnestness, enthusiasm and zeal.

On the eve of his departure a banquet was tendered him by the members of the lodge, of whom about forty were present. Brother Vice-President B. M. Goldman acted as toastmaster, and many were the expressions of good wishes for the future success of the honored guest and regret at his departure. Before the evening broke up he was presented with a gold locket with a raised emblem of the order on one side and suitable inscription on the other, as a small token of esteem from the lodge. Brother Horwitz replied most feelingly, thanking all most kindly for the expressions of good will, wished our lodge every success, and hoped that at some future date he would be amongst us again.

ROME, GA.

Rabbi Julian Miller of Chattanooga, Tenn., was the guest of Rome Lodge, No. 693, I. O. B. B., Sunday, December 27th. In the morning Dr. Miller made a short talk to the local Jewish Sunday school, which was much enoyed by the young people. In the afternoon he delivered an address to the Jewish public of Rome. Dr. Miller is a most interesting speaker, and his words were quite instructive.

WINNIPEG, CANADA.

On Thursday, December 3, 1914, Winnipeg Lodge, No. 650, held another successful social meeting, consisting of a discussion on various subjects. The announced subject of the meeting was, "Why Am I a Jew?" which brought forth a series of appropriate and interesting answers. The second subject proposed during the evening was, "Should the Jews Appeal to the Christian Neighbors Individually or to the Civic Organizations for Contributions Towards the Jewish Charitable Institutions?" A majority of those speaking on this subject were decidedly against it, basing their argument mainly on the thought that Jews should and do take care of their own poor.

Not less interesting was the report given by the chairman of the Public Institutions Committee, on the successful outcome of the opening of the new quarters of the Canadian Jewish Orphans' Home, an institution fostered by the lodge. Nearly 2,000 visitors, stated the report, availed themselves of the invitation extended to them, to see the new quarters, and had expressed themselves highly satisfied with them. The net cash proceeds of the affair being $711.50, all of which came in the shape of subscriptions to the maintenance fund; no other incentive in the shape of self-advertising methods having been resorted to.

CHANUKAH CELEBRATION BY THE NEW ORLEANS LODGES.

The joint committee of the New Orleans lodges of the B'nai B'rith arranged a Chanukah celebration for December 13th, but owing to the inclemency of the weather the program was not carried out. The entertainment, however, was held on Sunday afternoon, December 20. 1914, at the Y. M. H. A. Building, and was largely attended by the members of the order and their families and friends.

Among the features of interest was the kindling of the lights by Rabbi Meyerovitz and the singing of traditional songs by Brother J. Braunfeld. Rabbi M. Silber delivered an address, and Brother Erhard Mayer read an essay.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.

Minneapolis Lodge, No. 271, continues its unabated activity. At a well-attended meeting of the lodge held on Monday, November 16, 1914, a debate was held on the subject, "Resolved That the Establishment of an Autonomous Jewish State in Palestine Will Solve the Jewish Problem." The affirmative was to be advocated by Dr. M. E. Sherper, but owing to his absence from the city Rabbi D. C. Matt took his place. The negative was upheld by Brother Gustavus Loevinger. The decision was left to the audience and the prevailing opinion seemed to be about equally divided as to the merits of each speaker.

Nomination of officers was also held.

A well attended and interesting meeting of Minneapolis Lodge No. 271 of Minneapolis, Minn., was held on Monday evening, December 30, 1914. The program of the evening consisted of a symposium on "The Jewish Activities of Minneapolis." Other speakers were President Brother I. Waxstock, Dr. S. M. Hartman, J. B. Jaffe and Mrs. F. Osborne, representing the Ladies' Auxiliary. A REGRETTABLE CONFUSION.

An unseemly and most unfortunate competition has arisen in connection with the collection of funds in America for the relief of the Jewish victims of the foreign war. In a cause so sacred there ought to have been complete union of forces. One movement led by the American Jewish Committee is flooding the country with appeals. Another appeal has gone forth to the members of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith from its headquarters in Chicago. The result is bound to be confusion and injury. We do not care to locate the blame for this situation. It would help nothing and might cause recrimination, apathy and further loss to the common cause.

But it is imperative that all should get their bearings, that every Jew should realize his duty and be made to perform it. The Jewish Herald is the organ of nobody but a free lance with all. However, a choice is necessary and we shall not hesitate to express it. And here it is:

For more than a quarter of a century the Independent Order B'nai B'rith has been the motive power of social work in Southern Jewry. It has organized lodges, spread the doctrine of the helping hand, supported homes for the orphan, the aged and the sick. Only recently it opened the doors or a national eleemosynary institution at Hot Springs, Ark. Its activities have been beneficial, its possibilities for still greater usefulness are certain. Under these circumstances it has a moral right to the support of Southern Jews in its effort to be a factor in handling and solving Jewish problems. The members of the Order owe to it fealty in this momentous matter. The local Jewish communities owe to is nothing less. When an orphan was to be placed, the sick to be treated, the way led through the office of the B'nai B'rith secretary. And it seems to us that when the Order asks its Lodges and their communities to make it the vehicle of their bounty to our suffering brethren abroad, it has a right to be heard and to be heeded.—Jewish Herald.

The State Department has authorized the announcement to be made that the Turkish government has given assurances that it will not expel Russian Jews resident in the Ottoman Empire, but has decided to permit them to become subjects en bloc, and that 5,000 Jews in Jaffa alone have already applied for permission to take advantage of this decision. The significance of this action lies in the fact that in Palestine alone there are nearly 25,000 Russian Jews and that Turkey is now at war with Russia.

THE FUTURE OF THE JEWS IN RUSSIA.

The Novaya Gazette has published an important interview with a highly-placed Russian politician on the Jewish question.

The politician recognized that the Jews who fought so loyally side by side with the rest of the population ought to be compensated after the war. According to him, many schemes of reform concerning the Jews are now under consideration, some, in fact, had already been approved in high quarters. The projects include schemes for the abolition of the Pale, the gradual removal of the education restrictions, the opening of new Jewish secondary schools, and the abolition of the restrictions in the legal profession. Despite some opposition, it is also intended to allow Jews to become officers in the army. As far as the villages are concerned, however, it is not intended to permit Jews to buy land there.

To prevent an influx of Galician Jews, schemes are proposed to organize for the Jews a center to which they could immigrate en masse. Uganda is spoken of as such a center, or even Syria under the protectorate of England. In the event of Uganda being decided upon as the center, it will be possible to compensate England by alloting to it a German colony.

(The German has a saying, "Papier ist geduldig." Will the promises for ameliorating the condition of the Jews in Russia be carried out?—Editor.)

SUPPRESSION OF ANTI-SEMITISM IN THE PRUSSIAN RED CROSS SOCIETY.

During the first weeks of the war complaints were repeatedly raised by different Jewish sources that Jews who offered their services to the Prussian Red Cross Society were treated by the managers of several branches with anti-Semitic prejudice. Lieutenant General von Pfuel, President of the Central Committee of the Prussian National Red Cross organization at once issued a circular to the managers of the different branches of the society reminding them in strong terms of the fact that the Red Cross Society makes no discriminations on account of creeds or religious affiliations. The anti-Semitic manifestations soon ceased.

DR. PAUL NATHAN'S CRITICISM

Letter to Dr. B. Timendorfer, President German Grand Lodge

Berlin, Dec. 12th, 1914.

Most Worthy Mr. President:

It is to be regretted that the optimism which is expressed in your kind letter of yesterday is, as it seems to me, not fully justified by the November number of the B'nai B'rith News. Permit me to call attention to page 13. It is true, no objectionable editorial comments are there to be found, but communications copied from American newspapers appear there which in my opinion place the situation of the Jews in Russia in an entirely false light. For instance, communications appear there taken from the Boston Advertiser and the New York Tribune, in which it is stated that in relation to the Jews a complete change of principles has taken place in Russia. These reports are false, as we know to our regret and as we fully learn from the facts stated in the publication of the Jewish Workmen's League, which I have recently taken the liberty to transmit to you. I am reliably informed that the situation of our co-religionists in Russia is positively dreadful. Not one of the legal restrictions has been abolished and in addition to this there are increasing acts of pillage by the soldiery and little pogroms in numerous places, and finally respectable Jewish citizens in Poland, also in Galician territory which is occupied by Russia, are being condemned to the gallows and are immediately executed.

Our brethren in America are naturally not obliged to look upon the political situation from the German viewpoint. It would be entirely unjustifiable on our part to demand such a thing. We naturally have to respect the fact that our American brethren are citizens of the United States. But it seems to me that as citizens of the United States and as Jews they have only to perform a two-fold duty: They must report truthfully about the Jewish conditions in Russia. In this respect it seems to be the inclination of the News to look at the surface of things only. The second, and by far the most important duty of our co-religionists in America is that they exert the entire weight of their influence to gain an improvement in the fearful situation of the Jews in Russia. We in Germany are at present completely powerless to do anything in this regard, on account of the war. The Jews in England and France are naturally in the same position. So there remains for the most abject sufferers in Russia one source of help only, and this is the United States. If under the influence of the Russian Government circles, be it directly or indirectly, the attempt is there too made to spread the fictitious tale that a change has already taken place, or is about to be made, in the treatment of the Jews, then I consider it an extraordinary misfortune. I believe that the Jews in the United States, and through them the press of that land, must, regardless of all consequences, expose to shame the hideous crimes which the Russian Government is herself perpetrating and is permitting others to enact against her Jewish subjects. In this way only can the Russian Government perhaps be influenced, and in this way only, under the circumstances, can a way be paved for the improvement of conditions. We should not be fed on promises; these amount to nothing in Russia. The campaign against Russia must be carried on until we at last see positively that something has been done in the way of improvement of the conditions. If the B'nai B'rith in America operate on these lines they can possibly create an extraordianry blessing. But when on their part they also undertake to spread the idea that a change of conditions has already taken place or is even being prepared in Russia, then they will strengthen the opinion in the empire of the Czar that the public opinion of the civilized world can be deceived and that there is no need of doing anything, and the crushing burden of the Jews will not be lightened in the least.

I again append the publication of the foreign committee of the General Jewish League and I call special attention to the fact that it was the "Humanité" in Paris, a French paper of recognized earnest tendency, which at the present time would surely not enter into a polemic with Russia, that has first placed this publication before the public.

I must respectfully propose that America should be informed that in our opinion there is great significance just at the present moment for the future of the Jews in Russia in a truthful attitude of the American press.

The American Lodges surely have the best intentions, which fact has already been proven by the handsome donation of 70,000 marks.

In B. B. L. & H. and with distinguished high esteem,

Your

NATHAN.

The War and the Russian Jews

An Open Letter to Mr. Israel Zangwill

By B. W. Segel

(Translated from the "Frankfurter Zeitung.)

Having just now fled from Lemberg, the capital of Galicia, which is at present occupied by your Russian friends and allies (let us hope that it is for a short time only), I read in Berlin your proclamation to the Jews of the neutral states, particularly the Russian and Polish Jews of America, in which you plead for their sympathies for the holy empire of the Czar and its hordes of Cossacks. When I read your epistle I felt a burning shame, it affected me like a personal insult. Sir? Nine-tenths of the Jews of America and England still bear upon their bodies the bloody stripes which the fond caresses of the Czar and his faithful henchmen have left behind. They think with horror of the tortures which they suffered at home, of the outrages of Kishinev, Odessa, Homel, Shitomir and many other places! "Glorious" England, that is surrounded with the aureola of the creator of culture and the benefactor of nations, has now allied itself with Russia, and you come and have the insolence to present this alliance to us as a confederacy of civilization entered into in order to fight for humanity. Will civilization and humanity really gain so much when two to three million Jews in the Austrian and Prussian provinces, so hotly coveted by Russia, come under the Russian power? If you were in danger of feeling the power of the Czar on your own body, you would sing a different song. You are also a "poet." You were born in Russian Poland; but if your parents had not conceived the happy thought, while you were yet a baby, to shake off the dust of "their fatherland" from their soles, do you believe that you would today sit in the capital of the British empire, rich in honors and emoluments, and issue proclamations to foreign Jews? I will relate to you the story of a real poet, Samuel Frug, who is one of the leading lyric poets in the Russian language. There is no history of Russian literature which does not mention his name with the highest honors, but in Petrograd he is only permitted to stay as a servant of a Jewish millionaire who has placed his name on the list of the domestics of his family. As master of Russian song he would not even be allowed to step upon this holy pavement. This has given rise in St. Petersburg to the following witty remark: "Our holy Russia is the most civilized state in the world. Is there a second land where among the lackeys one finds one of the leading poets of the present age?" . . . This is the civilization and the humanity for which England went to war!

You repeat the silly, audacious lie, this war is "made in Germany." You dare to slander Germany, and to state "that her behavior in war is just as barbaric as her frame of mind in time of peace." I would have to use words as cutting as the strokes of a lash in order to fully stigmatize the whole hypocrisy which lies in the fact that you, who have forgotten to protest against the manner in which England carried on the war in South Africa, dare now, as Russia's ally, to call Germany's state of mind in time of peace barbaric. Was it in Germany, where in the midst of the deepest peace, on account of a sacred feast, the horrors of Yalta, Yekaterinoslav and Kishinev were enacted against a completely harmless and peaceful population? Was it in Germany where the most degenerate rabble and an inhuman soldiery were incited by the government to murder students, workmen and citizens when these wished to celebrate the birth of the constitution? Was it in Germany where on a winter day girls, women and boys were shot down by the hundreds with grapeshot because they were misled by a spy who was hired by the police to approach the monarch with a petition?

Is it in Germany where striking laborers are shot down like dogs and political prisoners are lashed upon the bare skin and tortured by hunger in ill-smelling ground holes, and if such prisoners happen to be girls they are violated by beastly police officials? You have never seen a pogrom and its victims with your own eyes, you have only heard of it; this is just enough to make of it interesting and sensational little dramas and novels. But one who has seen them with his own eyes will never forget the smoking mass of ruins, the gouged-out eyes of the aged, the cut-off breasts of the girls, the slit-open abdomens of the pregnant women, the speared babies, the little boys with crushed skulls. And he will know whose frame of mind is barbaric in time of peace. When, in the beginning of the war, the English press, which is given to lying, sent the thrilling tales across the ocean that entire Galicia is already in Russian hands, then thousands of stormy, desperate inquiries came from there asking whether the unfortunate report is really true.

We in Galicia have already had a foretaste of what Russian domination means. It is self-understood, I might almost say "excusable," that the Cossacks have wiped out our standing grain, destroyed cities, burned villages, turned synagogues, as well as Catholic and Protestant churches, into horse stables and outhouses, that they killed gray-headed men and peaceful women "without religious distinction," murdered children, ravished girls, for it is not necessary to act differently in war than in a pogrom. They have, besides, abolished in Lemberg the two languages of the country, Ruthenian and Polish, as well as the German language, which was understood by all educated people, and instead they have installed the Russian tongue, which is strange to all the inhabitants of the land. They have raised the Greek-Orthodox religion, which is known to only a few hundred people in the whole country, to be the predominating one, and declared Catholicism, Judaism and Protestantism, which are confessed by the "rest," consisting of more than 99 per cent of the population, as the "tolerated religions." From now on the Jew is not to move about freely in the land where his ancestors dwelt for thousands of years, but he must live in a pale of settlement only. For years the country did not hesitate to bring any kind of sacrifice in order to establish new schools. Millions and millions were expended for purposes of instruction. All these schools are being closed. Especially the Jews will not be permitted to send more students than 5 per cent of the Christian population, to the schools which they themselves have founded and supported for a hundred years, provided the new government does not confiscate the funds! But they will also be prohibited from holding teachers' positions there. The numerous Jewish men and women teachers, as well as those of them who were state officials, in rural and municipal service, in the courts and in the administration offices, in the army and on the railroads, at the post office and in financial departments, also the lawyers, doctors and druggists can cheerfully grasp the beggar's staff. The Jews are forbidden to buy land and whatever land they possess they must sell as quickly as possible. From now on they the citizens of the fourth class.

In order not to have the slightest doubts in regard to the course which will from now on reign in East Galicia the Russians have already instigated hard, bloody pogroms in the genuine Russian style on the Jewish new year's feast in many cities, especially in Lemberg and Kolomea. Will you now understand, Mr. Zangwill, why the reader of the great synagogue at Brody committed suicide when he was ordered by the Russian authorities to recite on the coming new year's feast and Day of Atonement the prayer for the Czar instead of the usual prayer for the Emperor Francis Joseph, and why all the synagogues in all the cities occupied by the Russians remained deserted on these holy days?

You revile Prussian "militarism." Have you ever pondered over the fact that under this Prussian militarism thousands and thousands of Russian Jews have for more than thirty years found refuge and protection from the bandits hired by the Russian civilization? Russian civilization excluded them from the high schools of their home and under Prussian militarism they were permitted to satisfy their thirst for knowledge in German institutions of learning. Which then are the noble spiritual powers which your ally places against Prussian militarism? Corruption and treachery! The successes in Galicia are solely due to the mastership in these arts. Russia did not hesitate to corrupt an entire people, her kin in race, and to mislead it by systematic bribery to treason and treachery. What has been achieved in this line stands in history as unique. You act so very importantly and you hint so mysteriously that Sir Edward Grey has promised you that in the future he will intercede with his noble Russian ally for a better treatment of the Jews. But when you assure us that England will civilize Russia and the Russians then one may ask why did she wait so long to do it? Judging by the sad example France is giving us it is more to be feared that England will more likely be made barbarian by Russia instead of her civilizing the Russian people. You say that the white fighting forces of Germany are fighting for a black purpose, but the black troops which England is bringing into the war are fighting for a white purpose. I forgive you this witty sally. In your books you have expressed some witticisms which were much worse than this. But I think that the purpose for which England fights is not at all white but yellow. It is the gold which the present generation of Englishmen worships as the foundation of culture, and the time is perhaps not far off when England will again lead black fighting forces into the field, but not at the side of her present ally but against her. Then you will justly call the whole world to help you against barbarism and despotism. And you would do well to prepare your proclamation now in which you will appeal to the American Jews for their sympathy for England against Russia. But the time is perhaps nearer at hand when the English people will think with disgust of this aberration which has made her an ally of Russia against the European culture. Then you will also be asked the question, why you, a descendant of the prophets of Israel, have not given the honor to truth and justice instead of throwing sand into the eyes of the world by slandering and reviling your adversary.

RUSSIAN HORRORS IN SADAGORA

(Translated from Bloch's Wochenschrift

The following letter, kindly loaned to us for publication by the recipient, gives some faint idea of the atrocities inflicted upon the defenseless Jewish population of Sadagora by the Russian vandal soldiers during the short period when that city was under control of the Russian army.

Sadagora, December 10, 1914.

My Dear Friend:—

At last I have the opportunity to send you a letter by way of Roumania, and to inform you of the destitute situation in which I have been placed, the same as have been all other Jewish inhabitants of Sagadora. It would be impossible for me to fully describe the extent of our misfortune, as the horrors we have undergone beggar all description, and my pen is too weak for that task. What little I do write in this letter is indited with my heart's blood. It would prove utterly impossible for any normal and moral human being to do full justice in a description of the atrocious horrors inflicted upon the innocent inhabitants of Sadagora. I can safely add, that all those living in Vienna may thank God and praise him for not having had to experience on their own bodies what the Russian domination really means.

As you are aware, about 80 per cent of the entire population fled from Sadagora in the night of August 30, when the bridges were blown up, without aim or definite plans whither they were heading. The panic was indescribable, and they who have not witnessed this demoralized flight cannot possibly have any adequate conception of the dreadful picture presented by these fugitives. There were the more or less well-to-do, who could afford to hire some sort of conveyance, even if they had to pay four or five times the customary rates. Then followed the younger men afoot, marching along in military step. The rear guard was made up of old people, weak women, small children and cripples, none of whom had been able to carry any part of their limited property with them. This woeful picture defies all description. These unfortunates dragged their weary feet mile after mile, hungry, miserable and fagged out. If they had hoped to find a resting place on their way or to secure some food and drink, they were sorely disappointed, as wherever they went they found the same condition of panic and all the inhabitants in flight. The Jews of the Zastawna district, like those of Sadagora, had all taken to flight and they were all running toward the Wischnitz route or for Stanestie. There a second unforeseen disaster was met, the bridges crossing the river Put at Waszkontz had been destroyed. There was no choice but to try to reach the other shore by attempting to ford the river where the water seemed the shallowest.

My dear Friend! It is impossible for me to describe this scene of horror. Many women, trying to carry their children safely across, lost them on the way over; they had taken the precaution to wrap the children in bedding or clothes, and did not discover their loss until they reached the other shore. Many women lost their footing during the crossing, drifted into deep water, and were saved only through the quick action of coolheaded men although in spite of the best efforts several persons lost their lives. Thus these unfortunates wearily dragged themselves along during the entire night and the next day—this was Monday—until all of them dropped out at some place or other from sheer weariness.

On Tuesday, September 1, some 15 wagons from the several towns in Russia adjoining the frontier arrived. These wagons were driven by Russian farmers, who were animated by the desire to obtain booty and who tried to force entry into the stores. The Jewish young men, still remaining in Sadagora, by valiant resistance managed to drive off these evildoers. On the prior evening the first Russian mounted patrol arrived in the city and made a fearful impression upon the inhabitants. This body of soldiers consisted of some fifteen Tscherkessians of the wildest type; their very appearance was sufficient to terrify and create apprehension. At the same time the first twenty-four hours passed in comparative quietness. Early on Wednesday, Sept. 2 there arrived a large number of Ruthenian farmers with empty wagons partly from Russia and partly from the adjoining villages, and a systematic plundering of all the Jewish houses was instigated. The first victims were the farmhouses of Fischbach and Rubel in the suburb of Zuczka, then the store of Picker, and last the motormill, all of which were thoroughly plundered and afterward destroyed. Then the mob took possession of Sadagora and pillaged to its heart's content, and under FULL MILITARY PROTECTION and assistance during the entire day.

Everything not nailed down was taken from the dwelling houses; the furniture was loaded upon the waiting wagons, beds, clothing, ornaments, and even the tableware and kitchen utensils were carried off and taken into Russia on the wagons.

Finally, towards 5 P. M., some fifteen soldiers arrived, sent at the request of the citizens of Czernowitz after the occupation of that town by the Russian commander thereof, with the instruction to restore order and peace. The following day a Russian General took possession of Sadagora with a larger force and issued a proclamation promising to protect the lives and property of the inhabitants, but excepting from that protection the uninhabited houses. The report of this proclamation was quick to reach the fugitives, most of whom attempted to return to their homes. Gradually we became accustomed to the Russian regime. A lively trade developed, and soon approximately ninety per cent of the original population had returned. When the valiant Austrian army regained Czernowitz on the 20th of September and the Russians were driven from that town, they wreaked their wrath upon poor Sadagora. Then came for us the days of terror. The road to Czernowitz was barred. With but few exceptions there were daily skirmishes and battles between the Austrian and Russian forces, generally ending in the defeat of the Russians. This brought in its train, that the Russian soldiers, too cowardly to face the Austrians in a fair fight, tried to prove their valor by vanquishing the defenseless population of Sadagora. The citizens of that unfortunate town were subject to systematic murder, robbery and pillage.

This time the Christians, too, were made the victims of the incendiaries. Not one house remained exempt. Since then Sadagora is only a city of ruins. Even the most hidden cellar dwellings were invaded, the inhabitants thereof cruelly maltreated and robbed of all their belongings. Many highly esteemed citizens were murdered on that day, among them Kalman Leib Retter, Meier Liquornik, Berisch Hermann and Abraham Rudich. Also the patriarch, Abraham Bendit, 90 years of age, and his wife. Greed for money was not the only motive for these cold-blooded murders, for the inhabitants freely gave up all their money and other valuables upon the mere demand of the soldiers. The murderers were not satisfied with booty alone, but they were after raping the women and young girls. Whoever tried to protect his womenfolks was killed without mercy. In fact, nearly all the women and some very young girls became the victims of these beasts. Only some 200 younger women and girls, who had assumed masculine clothing and who had succeeded in finding a hiding place, were saved thereby. It has been reported that many of the girls thus brutally raped have committed suicide in order to escape the disgrace. Kalmann Leib Retter was murdered for the sole reason that he tried to protect his wife and daughter against these beastly attacks. In his house was found the sum of 400,000 Kronen and a large amount of merchandise, all of which was stolen by that rabble of soldiers. He had been the benefactor of all the poor of the city, he was the treasurer of the congregation, and now all his property is gone, so that there does not remain sufficient cloth to shroud his dead body. The unfortunate victim of Russian brutality left nine children to mourn him. All the booty was taken into Russia. Not one house has been saved from destruction, and two hundred human beings are badly wounded or maimed!!! Since then we live in the cellars and some hidden dwellings outside of the town, and we do not dare to come out of our hiding places even to buy bread when hunger demands to be appeased. You will readily understand that the terror has driven many to insanity, while others have become insane through the suffering they have undergone. If one is brave enough to face the danger in order to buy bread, now paying Kr. 1.20 for a loaf that formerly sold at 50 Heller, he must risk meeting a Russian soldier, who will take the purchase away from him without ceremony. Even the clothes on one's back are not safe. Wolf Sandmann had his overcoat and his boots taken away from him on the street. Feibisch Weissbach and Feibisch Koerner had their boots pulled off their feet when the snow was three feet deep and the thermometer about 20 below zero, and at that they had to submit to cruel maltreatment.

I have written this while shedding tears; my indignation is so great that I cannot continue. Hy heart almost breaks when I think of what we have had to suffer. Only God knows what the outcome of all this trouble will be. In the whole town there is no bread to be had, no firewood left, and no money available. You can imagine the situation when I tell you that the corpses of the murdered remained for four days without receiving any attention, as no one dared go near them to prepare them for burial, and that in the whole town there was not sufficient cloth for the decent shrouding of these martyrs. We are cut off from the whole civilized world, and only God knows what will be our end. Possibly the horrors, hunger, or the extreme cold, will drive us to seek the termination of our troubles by suicide. Even now, when Czernowitz is again in the possession of the Russians, they do not permit us to leave Sadagora and escape from their clutches.

I send you my best greetings, and I do hope to meet you once more, although I hardly look to realizing that wish. My strength fails rapidly, and man is not made of iron. Unfortunately, I am not the only sufferer, and there are many more sharing my fate. Maybe God will, in His mercy, deliver us, or some kind people aid and assist us so we may not all die of hunger.

Your unfortunate friend,

J—— L——.

PREPARATION FOR CONVENTION OF THE ORDER IN SAN FRANCISCO.

By Eugene B. Block.

San Francisco, Cal.—A nation-wide campaign will be launched in San Francisco early next week to bring as many members of the Independent Order B'nai B'rith as possible to the Panama-Pacific International Exposition during May, 1915, when the Constitution Grand Lodge will be in session here. May 5 has been set aside by the exposition officials as B'nai B'rith Day and those in charge of the entertaining of the visitors aim to bring many members of the order to San Francisco for that event.

The campaign is in the hands of the Publicity Committee of the General 1915 Entertainment Committee, composed of members of various subordinate lodges in District Grand Lodge No. 4. Plans have been formulated, details have been perfected and all is in readiness to spread the word of the 1915 convention and of B'nai B'rith Day to every Jewish community throughout the United States. Information concerning the importance of B'nai B'rith Day to Western Jews in general and to the Order B'nai B'rith in particular will be sent broadcast and every member of the order will be urged to be in San Francisco, if possible, to join in the observance of B'nai B'rith Day.

That the day will carry a deep significance is the opinion of those preparing for it. They point out that its observance will be marked by the presence in San Francisco of the world's leading Jews, gathered here to attend the Constitution Grand Lodge Convention.

"We want as many members of the order in San Francisco to participate in B'nai B'rith Day as possibly can come," said Henry Zekind, chairman of the publicity committee of the General 1915 Committee, a few days ago. "We are to spread the announcement of B'nai B'rith Day throughout the country. Truly it will be a great occasion, and the fact that the exposition authorities have seen fit to devote a day specially to our order reflects the high regard that is felt for the B'nai B'rith.

"We want as many members as can to share in the observance of this occasion, and no pains will be spared to urge them to come."

Meanwhile the general committee is continuing its preparations to entertain the Constitution Grand Lodge delegates and their families. Extensive entertainment is promised and various sub-committees now are busily at work completing the many details connected with the work.

THE GERMAN SECTION OF THE I. O. B. B.

By an Occasional Correspondent.

Berlin, Nov. 27, 1914.—Few in America know of the wide extent and activity of the German branch of the I. O. B. B., technically known as District No. 8. This answers to a special need of German Jewry, which gives it a function corresponding largely to that which the parent body performed in the early days in America itself. Anti-Semitism has practically excluded German Jews from all clubs, and the various local sections of the German I. O. B. B. largely fulfills the function of clubs as well as pursuing the general interests of Jews which they share with other representative bodies like the Verband and the Verein. But in their club activities, the members of the German I. O. B. B. are unique. This is especially noteworthy at the head center of the district in Berlin, where has recently been erected a superb building at a cost of two million marks that vies in splendor with any club house in Berlin, though the German metropolis has grown to be so prolific a center of these modern homes of luxury.

Here in the Berlin adjoining the Thiergarten members can meet and discuss things Jewish. The hall of the Grand Lodge resembles that of a medieval German castle and is provided with huge and decorative insignia worthy of the dignity of so august a body. But other parts of the building are less austere in appearance and application. At the time of our visit, in company with Dr. Maretzki, the genial ex-president of the District, there were no less than two wedding parties and dinners being carried out in the home of the Grand Lodge. Other members of the Order were enjoying their Pilsener and like refreshments in the shady courtyard of the building, while other rooms of the ten-storied building presented the usual come-and-go of a high-class club.

But District No. 8 does not confine itself to supporting the outer, or may we say, the lower, man. It has all sorts of supernumerary and subsidiary activities, dealing with employment for members, with the education of backward Jewish children, with the upbringing of orphans, especially those from Russia, whose parents were victims of the pogroms, and devotes especial attention to the struggle with the infamous white slave traffic, and in hundreds of other ways shows itself active in the cause of Israel.

Still more striking is the contribution the I. O. B. B. of Germany makes to the more spiritual interests of Israel. The Grand Lodge has a library of its own which is increasingly useful to the more student-like of its members. It is trying to get together all the local archives of German Jews, as a preparation for a proper history of Jews in Germany which at present does not exist. It is taking care of works suitable for Jewish youth, and has organized a union of youthful associations for Jewish study. It is needless to say that almost every one of the local centers, both in Germany and Austria, have a series of lectures not only on Jewish subjects but on matters of general cultural interest.

One activity of the German I. O. B. B. in this regard deserves special mention. For the last ten years there has been maintained in Berlin a Bureau of Jewish Statistics, which publishes a bi-monthly journal and also a series of monographs on the conditions of Jews in the various countries of Europe. This at first sight seems an activity far remote from any interest of the I. O. B. B. But Germans are Germans even if they are members of the I. O. B. B. and recognize the practical value of systematic and quantitative knowledge with regard to Jewish affairs. Accordingly, the Grand Lodge has consistently and continuously supported the Bureau and has contributed the expenses of publication of several of its monographs, while the leader of the Bureau, Dr. Bruno Blau, is as distinguished for his connection with the I. O. B. B. as for his legal acumen and his knowledge of statistical methods.

Altogether, the German District of the I. O. B. B. represents a remarkably wide field of activity. Its local lodges serve as clubs, as educational establishments, as meeting places for literary clubs and debating societies; its Grand Lodge at Berlin shares in most of the larger issues of German Judaism and takes into its special charge the fight against the white slave traffic, the study of German Jewish local history, and the collection of Jewish statistics. This is a record of which any organization might well be proud, and of which District No. 8 of the I. O. B. B. has shown its pride by extending the sphere of its operations.—American Hebrew.

THE KEHILLAH

XIV.

BY PROF. GOTTHARD DEUTSCH, Ph.D.

While it was my object originally to speak of persons and conditions that I have seen, and to record personal recollections of people whom I have known, it would seem also instructive to go somewhat farther back into history in order to gain a proper view of the background of the historic places which witnessed so much of old Jewish life.
